During the Cardinal of Wincheſter's Abſence, the Duke of Gloceſter created him Troubles, which gave him no ſmall Uneaſineſs. The Duke told the Council, that the Cardinal intended to leave the King, and return to his Place in the Council, with deſign to raiſe Troubles in the Kingdom; that his Intention was the more criminal, as he meant to make uſe of the Pope's Authority, to free himſelf from the Obligation to aſſiſt the King in France; which was viſibly ſubjecting the Orders and Regulations of the Council, to a foreign Power. Upon theſe Complaints, the Council iſſued out a Proclamation, prohibiting all the King's Subjects, of what rank ſoever, on pain of Impriſonment, to attend the Cardinal, if he left the King without Leave.

Truce with Caſtile, p. 473. and Scotland. p. 482—487.

On the 8th of November, a Truce of one Year was concluded at London with the King of Caſtile, to commence May the 1ſt, 1431.

About the middle of December, the Ambaſſadors of England ſigned, at Edinburgh, a five years Truce with Scotland, to begin the ſame Day, with that made with Caſtile.

1431. Joan having been in the Hands of the Engliſh, ever ſince the Siege of Compiegne, the Duke of Bedford had ordered her to be carried to Roan, where he intended to ſacrifice her, to the Vengeance he believed due to the Engliſh Nation. There was, doubtleſs, great Policy in this Reſolution. All France was poſſeſſed with the Notion, that ſhe was ſent from God; and the Engliſh Soldiers imagined, that in fighting againſt her, they had to deal with the Devil. Wherever ſhe appeared, they deemed the French Troops invincible. At leaſt, the Terror that had ſeized their Souls, and the ſtrange Alteration thereby wrought in them, cannot be aſcribed to any other Cauſe: It was therefore of the utmoſt Importance to undeceive them. The taking of Joan, had already begun to produce this Effect. It was very naturally inferred, that had ſhe acted by God's Command, there was no probability of her falling into ſuch a Misfortune. But, to confirm this firſt Impreſſion, it was not improper to inſinuate to the terrified Engliſh, that ſhe had done nothing, but by way of Witchcraft and Sorcery. It may be, the Duke of Bedford was himſelf of that Opinion, as may be concluded from his Expreſſions, in the fore-mentioned Letter to the King. However this be, (for I do not pretend, either to blame or juſtify the Prince, that it was done out of Policy or Vengeance) he ſo managed, that the King, by the Advice of his Council of France, ordered Joan to be tried for a Witch. Purſuant to this Order, ſhe was delivered over to Eccleſiaſtical Judges (11), who, after a long Examination, condemned her as a Heretick, to do Penance upon Bread and Water, all the Days of her Life. Some time after, under colour of a Relapſe into her former Errors, ſhe was tried again by the ſame Judges, who delivered her over to the ſecular Arm to be burnt alive. This Sentence was executed in the old Market-Place at Roan, the 30th of May, 1431 (12).

1431. Various Opinions about her.

Thus far the French and Engliſh agree. It cannot be denied, that Joan performed great Exploits, and inſpired the French with Courage, and the Engliſh with Terror. But the French aſcribe what appears wonderful in her, to the immediate Power of God, and the Engliſh to the Artifices of the Devil. What then ſhall we believe? Perhaps Neither are in the right, and indeed there is a third Opinion, which wants not plauſible Reaſons. As the Examination of theſe three Opinions would be a too great interruption of the Thread of the Hiſtory, I ſhall not ſtay to diſcuſs them here. They who deſire to be more fully informed concerning this Matter, may read a Diſſertation, inſerted at the end of this Reign, where I ſhall endeavour to give this Affair all the Light it is capable of.

The extreme Weakneſs of the two Kings.

Notwithſtanding his Advantages, King Charles ſaw himſelf little able to continue the War. Moſt of the Places he had taken were ruined, and conſequently incapable of giving him much Aſſiſtance. Beſides, as they had voluntarily ſurrendered, he was unwilling to preſs them, for fear they ſhould return to the Engliſh. They might have done it with the ſame eaſe, ſince it was not in his power to place there, Garriſons ſtrong enough to keep them in Awe. On the other hand, the Engliſh, humbled by ſo many Loſſes, were not better able to keep Armies in the Field. So, during the reſt of this Year, the War was continued only by Parties, and ſurprizing of Places, moſt of which were but weakly guarded.

The French ſurprize Chartres. Monſtrelet. Hall.

In this manner, the French became Maſters of Chartres, by means of a Cart loaden with Wine, which they cauſed to be overturned juſt under the Port-cullis. On the other hand, the Engliſh took Montargis, by holding Intelligence with a young Woman, who perſuaded a Barber, her Lover, to introduce them into the Town.

The Fair of Caen plundered. J. Chartier.

Loré, a French Captain, made an Inroad to the very Gates of Caen, upon a Fair-Day, and carried away two thouſand Perſons, with a very great Booty. After that, he retired to Silley, a ſmall Town in Maine, where he was beſieged by the Earl of Arundel. But the Duke of Alenſon, ſuddenly coming to his relief, obliged the Engliſh to retire.

Other Exploits of the two Parties. Monſtrelet.

This Year, Xaintrailles and Gaucour, who were ravaging Normandy, were defeated and made Priſoners. A Party of Engliſh took alſo Villeneuve lez-ſens from the French. This is all that paſſed worth noting in France, between the two Parties. But a more important Affair happened in Lorrain, wherein King Charles and the Duke of Burgundy were concerned, and which therefore it will not be amiſs briefly to mention.

War of Lorrain. Monſtrelet. Hall.

Lewis, Cardinal of Bar, and Marquiſs of Pont-a-Mouſſon, being the laſt Male of the Houſe of Bar, the Children of Violante his Siſter, Queen of Arragon, were to be his Heirs. Among theſe Children, Violante of Arragon had married Lewis II, King of Sicily, and Duke of Anjou, and by him had three Sons, Lewis, René, and Charles. Of theſe Princes, the Cardinal Duke of Bar choſe René for his Heir, and married him to Iſabella, third Daughter of Charles Duke of Lorrain, who had no Iſſue-Male. It is ſaid, Iſabella's two elder Siſters had renounced the Succeſſion of the Duke their Father. René being Duke of Bar, by the Death of the Cardinal his Uncle, would likewiſe have taken poſſeſſion of Lorrain, upon the deceaſe of the Duke his Father-in-law; but Anthony Earl of Vaudemont, Son of Frederic, younger Brother of Duke Charles, diſputed the Succeſſion with him. This occaſioned a War between theſe two Princes, wherein King Charles ſupported René his Brother-in-law, and the Duke of Burgundy, the Earl of Vaudemont. On the 2d of July, this Year, the two Competitors fought at Bulegneville a bloody Battle, where René was vanquiſhed, taken Priſoner, and carried to Dijon. There were twelve hundred French ſlain in this Action. This Loſs, no doubt, helped to hinder King Charles from continuing his Progreſs.

An Attempt to take the See from the Biſhop of Wincheſter.

The Affair concerning the See of Wincheſter, of which the Duke of Gloceſter would have deprived the Cardinal, was rather ſuſpended, than determined in 1429, by an Order of Council to the Prelate, to forbear, for that time, officiating as Biſhop on St. George's Day. The Duke, willing to take Advantage of the Cardinal's Abſence, who was with the King at Paris, cauſed, about the end of this Year, the Affair to be again brought upon the Board. On the 6th of November, the King's Attorney General appearing before the Council, required, that the Cardinal ſhould be deprived of his See; affirming, that by the Laws of the Land, the ſame Perſon could not be Cardinal and Biſhop in England. He ſupported his Aſſertion with the Examples of Simon Langham, and Robert Kilwarby, formerly Archbiſhops of Canterbury, who, upon their being made Cardinals, reſigned the Archbiſhoprick. When he had done ſpeaking, the Duke of Gloceſter, addreſſing himſelf to the Biſhop of Worceſter, required him to ſay, upon his Oath of Allegiance to the King, whether it was not true, that the Cardinal had obtained of the Pope, an exemption from the Juriſdiction of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, for himſelf, for the City, and for the whole Dioceſe, of Wincheſter. His Aim was to ſhew, how inconvenient it was, to ſuffer a Cardinal to hold a Biſhoprick in England. The Biſhop of Worceſter replied, after ſome Intreaty, that the Biſhop of Lichfield being at Rome, had ſued for, and obtained this Exemption for the Cardinal, who had reimburſed all the Charges; and that he had this from that Prelate's own Mouth. This Affair having been long debated, by reaſon of the two Parties in the Council, it was at length reſolved, that, before any Deciſion, the Cardinal ſhould be heard, and the Judges conſulted. Thus it was not yet poſſible for the Duke of Gloceſter to compaſs his Ends. 1431.

Conference about a Peace. Monſtrelet.

Whilſt Henry was in France, Pope Eugenius II, Succeſſor of Martin V, ſent thither the Cardinal of Santa Cruz, to try to perſuade the two Kings to a Peace. This Legate prevailed with them at laſt, to ſend their Ambaſſadors to Auxerre, but this Congreſs was fruitleſs. They did not ſo much as enter into a Conference, becauſe, if we may believe the French Authors, the Ambaſſadors of England refuſed to acknowledge King Charles's for Ambaſſadors of France. The 31ſt of March, the next Year, was however appointed for their Meeting; but it was in vain, ſince there was no place appointed for holding the Congreſs. The Court of England had named, for Plenipotentiaries, the Biſhop of Rocheſter, and ſome others (1).

Act. Pub. X. p. 500, 514, 530.

1432. Henry returns to England.

Henry returned into England the beginning of the Year 1432 (2), being full ten Years of Age. As his Journey into France produced no great Effects, his return made no Alteration in his Affairs. They were ſtill managed by the Duke of Bedford in France, and by the Duke of Gloceſter in England. The Government of two Kingdoms was no light Burden for theſe Princes, at a time when the King's Affairs were manifeſtly going to decay. The Duke of Bedford was obliged to be always on his Guard, to reſiſt Enemies, now grown very formidable. But this was nothing, in compariſon of the Trouble, occaſioned by his perpetual diſtruſt of his own Friends, or thoſe who pretended to be well-affected to him. The Duke of Burgundy's ambiguous Proceedings, juſtly made him uneaſy. The Duke of Bretagne was no ſurer Friend. In ſhort, ſince the decline of the Affairs of the Engliſh, the Towns which ſeemed to ſide with them, were faithful, only in proportion to thē Strength of their Garriſons. The Regent, by ſad Experience, had been convinced of this Truth. Paris herſelf, the Metropolis, on which, as I may ſay, all depended, was not ſo well diſpoſed, as that her Fidelity could be relied on; or at leaſt her Attachment to the Intereſt of England wholly depended on the Duke of Burgundy's. Add to this, the inconſiderable Aids of Men and Money, received by the Duke of Bedford from England, at a time when they were moſt wanted. To complete his Misfortune, the Regent found himſelf almoſt alone, burthened with the Weight of the publick Affairs, as well Military as Civil; thoſe who had aſſiſted him in the beginning of his Regency, being for the moſt part either dead, or Priſoners in the Hands of the Enemy. In this Perplexity, he reſolved to propoſe to King Charles, the Exchange of Talbot for Xaintrailles, and his Offer was accepted. As he durſt not leave Paris, and the War was carrying on in ſeveral Parts of the Kingdom, he could not be without ſuch a General as Talbot; though to procure him, he was forced to give his Equal to the Enemy (3).

Continuation of the Quarrel between the Duke of Gloceſter and the Cardinal.

If the Affairs of the Engliſh were upon an ill foot in France, they were upon no better Terms in England. Subſidies were granted by the Parliament with great reluctance, for continuing ſo deſtructive a War, which began to be tireſome, ſince it proſpered not as formerly. On the other hand, the Quarrel between the Duke of Gloceſter and the Cardinal ſtill continued, with greater Bitterneſs than ever, and began to turn to the Duke's diſadvantage. In the laſt Year's Parliament (4), the Cardinal had found means to gain the Commons to his Intereſt, and give his Adverſary a grievous Mortification. The Houſe, willing to ſhew him Marks of their Favour,

preſented

1432. preſented a Petition to the King (1), praying him, in conſideration of the Cardinal's great Services to the State, to give him a full Pardon for whatever he had done, contrary to the Laws, particularly with regard to the Statute of Præmunire. This was a mighty Advantage for the Cardinal, ſince the Commons Petition being granted, he was skreened from all Proſecution. However, the Duke of Gloceſter did not deſiſt. He pretended, that, notwithſtanding the Pardon, he had ſufficient Evidence to prove the Cardinal guilty of High-Treaſon, a Crime which could not be ſuppoſed to be included in the Letters of Pardon. The Cardinal, who was then in Flanders upon the King's Affairs, ſpeedily repaired to London, without asking leave, and thereby gave his Enemy a Pretence to ſeize his Baggage (2). The next day after his Arrival, he went to the Houſe of Lords, and ſaid, he was come to clear himſelf of the Crimes, pretended to be laid to his Charge, and vindicate his Innocence, againſt whoever ſhould offer to be his Accuſer. The Duke of Gloceſter not thinking proper to ſupport what he had advanced, the Prelate was anſwered, that as none appeared to accuſe him, he was acknowledged for a loyal Subject. He thanked the Houſe for this Declaration, and deſired it might be drawn up in Form, which was granted. Then he complained, that at his arrival at Sandwich, his Baggage was ſeized, and petitioned the Reſtitution. He maintained, that the Seizure was made without Cauſe, and offered to lend the King ſix thouſand Pounds, for ſix Years; on condition, that if, in that time, the Seizure appeared to be lawful, the Money lent ſhould be forfeited to the King's Uſe. He offered moreover to lend him the like Sum, and to defer the Demand of the thirteen thouſand Marks, due to him on another account, provided the payment of the whole ſhould be aſſigned out of the next Subſidy granted to the King. His Aim was, to ſhew his regard for the King's and the People's Wants. His Offers were accepted, and the Seizure reſtored. Thus the Duke of Gloceſter, inſtead of hurting his Enemy, had the Mortification, to ſee him receive the Applauſes of both Houſes. Mean while, this Diſcord produced very ill Effects. As the Duke of Gloceſter had Friends and Adherents in the Council, the oppoſition generally between the two Parties, could not be very prejudicial to the King's Affairs. Whilſt the Duke and the Cardinal thought only of their own private Concerns, the War in France was neglected, though it was more neceſſary than ever, to ſupport it with the greateſt Efforts.

Indolence of King Charles.

If England had known how to improve her Advantages, ſhe had a very favorable opportunity to repair ſome of her Loſſes. King Charles languiſhed in the Arms of Agnes Sorrel his Miſtreſs, and left to the Care of his Miniſters and Generals, his moſt important Affairs. Nothing affected him but his Pleaſures. It was with extreme reluctance, that he beſtowed a few Moments upon the War, and the Affairs of State. So impatient was he to return to his Pleaſures, interrupted by theſe troubleſome Cares, that he only ſought to intruſt with others, whatever might embarraſs him. La Trimouille, his Favorite, was generally accuſed of ſoothing him in this Supineneſs. But it was perceived by Perſons of Penetration, that the King began to grow weary of him, and was uneaſy under a Yoke he had impoſed upon himſelf. The Conſtable, though abſent, was ſoon informed of it. His Spies at Court were too watchful, for ſo important a thing to be long concealed from him. As he was of a proud and violent Spirit, he could not bear, without Indignation, to be ſurpaſſed by La Trimouille; and had formed a Deſign to ſerve him, as he had done Louvet, De Giac, and Beaulieu. When he knew, the King no longer looked upon La Trimouille with the ſame Eye as before, he immediately reſolved to ſet Hand to the Work. But as in ruining La Trimouille, he did not find himſelf ſo far in the King's Favor, that he could hope for his Place, he projected to introduce Charles of Anjou, the Queen's Brother, into this Poſt. Strange Project, haughtily to attempt to take from a Prince one Favorite, and give him another againſt his Will, or at leaſt without conſulting him! As ſoon as the Conſtable had made all his Cabals at Court, and matters were ripe for Execution, La Trimouille was ſeized in his Bed, in the King's own Houſe, who was then at Chinon and carried to Priſon at Montreſor. Charles was enraged at the News, and would immediately have taken Vengeance, but when he ſaw all the Princes of the Blood, and the great Men at Court, declare againſt La Trimouille, he durſt not venture to proceed. He remembred, with dread, the Confederacy formed againſt him, when he would have ſcreened Louvet, and was afraid of the like. Beſides, his diſguſt for the Favorite, who was only ſo in Name, being added to that political Reaſon, he abandoned him without much Concern. Charles of Anjou came to comfort him, and ſucceeded ſo well, that, according to the Conſtable's Project, he became the Favorite, and La Trimouille was forgot.

1432. and Charles of Anjou becomes Favorite.

It is eaſy to judge, that a Prince of Charles's Character, who had an Averſion for War, would not have been very formidable to the Duke of Bedford, if the Supplies from England had been ſufficient, to enable him to make ſome conſiderable Attempt. But he had not for ſome time been able to bring an Army into the Field, without diſgarniſhing his Towns, and expoſing them either to be ſurprized, or tempted to follow the Example of thoſe, that had voluntarily ſurrendered to King Charles.

Lagni taken by the French. Monſtrelet. J. Chartier.

About the end of laſt Year, Foucaut had conquered Lagni upon him, a Place often taken and retaken, and which the Neighbourhood of Paris rendered extremely important. A little after, the Regent unſucceſsfully attempted to retake it. In the beginning of this Year, the Marſhal de l'Iſle-Adam, and the Earl of Arundel (3) attacked it in vain, being forced, by a vigorous Sally from the Town, to abandon their Enterprize. At laſt in the Begining of Auguſt, the Duke of Bedford beſieged it himſelf with an Army of ſix thouſand Men. But, on the 10th of the ſame Month, the Baſtard of Orleans, in ſpite of the Duke's Precautions and Vigilance, introduced a Convoy (4), and then paſſed the Marne. The Duke, fearing by this March, that he held ſome Intelligence in Paris, ſuddenly raiſed the Siege, to prevent his Deſigns. Thus Lagni was beſieged three times in vain, within the Space of ſeven or eight Months.

On the other hand, a ſmall Body of French, drawn out of the Garriſons near the Loire, ſurprized Montargis. In Normandy twelve hundred Engliſh inveſted la Hire in Louviers, and after a three Months Blockade, conſtrained the Place to capitulate.

Death of the Ducheſs of Bedford. Monſtrelet. Hall.

Theſe were Events of little Importance. But, on the 13th of November, there happened one of much greater Conſequence, namely, the Death of Ann of Burgundy, Ducheſs of Bedford (5). This Loſs was not peculiar to the Duke her Spouſe, but common to all the Engliſh, ſince it broke the Bond of Union between the Dukes of Bedford and Burgundy, and by the Coldneſs which ſucceeded, proved very fatal to England.

Embaſſy to the Council of Baſil. Act. Pub. X. p. 515, 519, 525, —534.

The Council of Baſil had been aſſembled ſince the laſt Year, but England had ſent no Ambaſſadors. About the end of this Year, the Pope and Council, who were diſputing concerning Pre-eminence, ſending, each a-part, Legates to the King, the Archbiſhop of York, the Biſhop of Rocheſter, the Earl of Huntington (6), and ſeveral others, were appointed to go to the Council.

1433. Inſurrection in Normandy. Monſtrelet. J. Chartier.

In the Beginning of the Year 1433, there was a dangerous Inſurrection in Normandy, which would have been no leſs fatal to the Engliſh, than the raiſing of the Siege of Orleans, if by their Diligence they had not timely prevented Part of the Miſchief, which might have enſued. Sixty thouſand Peaſants of that Province having taken Arms, divided themſelves into two Bodies, one whereof conſiſting of forty thouſand Men, marched into Vexin, and the other towards Caen. Had Charles's Army been near enough to ſupport them, he would doubtleſs have conquered all Normandy. The Rebels ſoon became Maſters of Caen, Harfleur, Dieppe, and Lillebonne. Probably they would have made a much greater Progreſs, if the Earl of Arundel (7) had not, with the utmoſt Expedition, marched againſt thoſe that were aſſembled in Vexin. As theſe Men had no eminent Leader, they ſuffered themſelves to be ſurprized in the Night, and eaſily yielded him a Victory, more advantagious to his Maſter than glorious for him. Thoſe of Caen, though not ſo numerous, would have given him more Trouble, becauſe the Marſhal of

The Duke of Bedford marries Jaquelina of Luxemburg. The Duke of Burgundy is offended at it. Monſtrelet. Hall.

This ſame Year, another Event helped to diſconcert the Affairs of the Engliſh. The Duke of Bedford being a Widower, married in March, Jaquelina of Luxemburgh (1), Daughter of Peter of Luxemburgh (2), Earl of St. Pol. The Duke of Burgundy was extremely offended, that this Marriage was made without his Knowledge. He thought the Duke of Bedford ſhould have ſhewn him more reſpect, ſince, beſides the Conſideration of the many Ties by which they were united, he married the Daughter of one of his Vaſſals. The Duke of Bedford, who was very prudent and circumſpect, had doubtleſs his reaſons for haſtening his Marriage, without imparting it to the Duke of Burgundy. However, as it greatly concerned him not to anger that Prince, he paid him ſome Compliments by the Cardinal of Wincheſter, who even procured an Interview at St. Omer, where the two Princes met in April. But an unhappy Diſpute about Precedency hindered their Reconciliation, and cauſed them to part extremely incenſed with each other. Theſe two Princes had frequently met without any Conteſt upon that account. But the Duke of Burgundy was obliged to ſtart ſome Diſpute now, for a Cloak to the Steps he intended to make. He owned Henry for King of France, and the Duke of Bedford for Regent, and Uncle of the reigning King, how therefore could he pretend to take place of him?

The Duke of Burgundy takes ome Places from the French. Monſtrelet. Hall.

During this Year, nothing of Moment paſſed, with regard to the War. Charles ſeemed to have wholly relinquiſhed all Care of his Affairs, the better to reliſh the Pleaſures of Love and Eaſe. The Duke of Bedford was weak, and as he received no farther Supplies from England, thought more of keeping what he had, than of making new Conqueſts. Mean while, though the Duke of Burgundy purpoſed to make a ſeparate Peace with Charles, he believed it would be the more advantagious, if he could do it with full hands. To that end, he became Maſter of St. Valery, which Gaucour had taken by Surprize. The Town of Ham, defended by the Baſtard of Orleans and Xaintrailles, with Laon and Provins, were alſo taken by him. On the other hand, the Earl of Arundel, beſieging Silley-le-Guillaume in Maine, the Conſtable Richemont obliged him to raiſe the Siege, but the French were ſcarce gone when the Earl returned and took the Town (3).

The Duke of Orleans offers to mediate a Peace. Act. Pub. X. p. 549, 556.

Mean time, the Council of England were more intent, how to procure a Peace, than to recover what the King had loſt in France. The Duke of Orleans, ſtill a Priſoner at London, had made the firſt Overtures, and offered to uſe his utmoſt Endeavours, to finiſh an Affair, on which depended his Freedom. To compaſs his ends, he had propoſed to bring to Calais, or any other place the Council ſhould name, the Queen Dowager of Sicily, Charles of Anjou her Son, the Duke of Bretagne, with the Earls of Richemont and St. Giles his Brothers, the Duke of Alenſon, the Earls of Armagnac, Foix, Perdriac, Clermont, and the Archbiſhop of Rheims, to treat with the Ambaſſadors of England. He deſired likewiſe Permiſſion to be at the Congreſs, to promote, to the utmoſt of his Power, the Concluſion of a Peace. As his Aim was, to engage the Court of England to enter into Negotiation, he demonſtrated, that the Engliſh would reap great Advantages, whether this Treaty broke off, or ſucceeded. Theſe are the two Articles he propoſed to the Council concerning himſelf.

His Offers. Ib. p. 556.

I. In caſe a Peace was concluded between Henry and the Dauphin, (for ſo he called King Charles) he promiſed to do Homage to Henry whenever required, and never to own any other King of France, than him, or his lawful Succeſſors.

II. He promiſed the ſame thing for all his Vaſſals, for the Duke of Alenſon, for the Earls of Armagnac, Perdriac, Angoulême, and the Dukes of Milan and Savoy.

In another Article, he ſuppoſed the Dauphin would be contented with an honorable and conſiderable Appennage, which was the very thing the Engliſh aimed at in this Negotiation.

But, as a Peace might happen not to be concluded, in 1433. that caſe, the Duke engaged to acknowledge Henry for ſole and true King of France. He promiſed moreover to deliver to him Blois, Orleans, and all his demean Towns, with Rochelle, Mont St. Michel, Limoges, Bourges, Chinon, Poictiers, Tournay, Beziers, Saintes, and Loches, or what other Places he pleaſed inſtead of theſe, except Rochelle and Mont St. Michel, which were not to be changed.

That if the King ſhould grant him any Demeſns in England, he would own him, as King of England, for his Liege-Lord, and as ſuch, ſwear Fealty to him.

That he would do his utmoſt, to put the King in poſſeſſion of the Countries and Cities of France, which did not yet acknowledge him, and would ſerve him at his own Expence.

That in caſe the Treaty did not ſucceed, he promiſed to return a Priſoner to England, till all the Articles were performed on his part, on condition he ſhould afterwards be releaſed without Ranſom (4).

They are accepted. Act. Pub. X. p. 561.

Theſe Articles, which had been before concerted between the King's Commiſſioners and the Duke, being approved by the Council, the Duke ſigned and ſealed them, and ſwore to obſerve them. Then Paſſports were prepared (5) for the Queen Dowager of Sicily, and the reſt mentioned in the firſt Article, that they might repair to Calais in October. The Council appointed alſo Plenipotentiaries, to treat with the French, Reaſons why the Duke of Orleans acted not ſincerely.

When the Engagements here entered into by the Duke of Orleans are conſidered, they are a clear Evidence of his joining with the Court of France, to impoſe upon the Court of England. This plainly appears, in the hopes he gave that Charles would be ſatisfied with a bare Appennage: A thing moſt certainly far enough from that Prince's Thoughts, and which was inſinuated, only to cauſe the Engliſh the more readily to fall into the Snare. Moreover, in promiſing to bring to Calais the Queen of Sicily, and the other French Princes and Lords, he would have intimated, that it was their Intention to conclude a Peace upon that foot; which was however, as afterwards appeared, directly contrary to their Deſign. In the next Place, the Duke's ſervile Expreſſions to the King of England, calling him, in the Articles, his King and Sovereign Lord, manifeſtly ſhews, he flattered him only to deceive him. In ſhort, he promiſed things that were beyond his Power: For Inſtance, to deliver Places which belonged not to him. But this was preciſely wherein conſiſted the Fraud, becauſe his Aim was to intimate, that he was impowered, tho' the Court of France did not think proper to diſcover themſelves openly. Theſe are not bare Conjectures. The Sequel of this Negotiation will plainly ſhew, the Duke did not act with Sincerity. This however is the ſame Duke of Orleans, whom the French would repreſent as a Saint, and upon whoſe account Joan pretended to have ſeveral Revelations.

The Congreſs is to be held at Arras.

It is very eaſy to perceive, the Duke of Orleans acted in 1434. concert with the Court of France, when it is conſidered, that Charles was now reconciled with the Duke of Burgundy, who only wanted a pretence to break with England. The Conſtable Richemont had finiſhed a ſeparate Treaty, in a Conference with the Duke at Nevers. He repaired to that City, under colour of adjuſting a Difference between the Duke of Burgundy and the Earl of Clermont. Here all the Articles of the ſeparate Peace were ſettled with the Duke. All he wanted, was to furniſh an occaſion to take this Step; and to this the Project of a Conference for a general Peace was made ſubſervient. It was well known, the Engliſh would not agree to the Terms that ſhould be propoſed to them, and their Refuſal was to be the Duke of Burgundy's Pretence to make a ſeparate Peace. This was the real Motive of the Duke of Orleans's large Offers to the King of England, in caſe a Peace was not concluded. The Deſign was, to engage Henry's Council in this Negotiation, by putting them in hopes, that, whether the Conference ended in a Peace, or came to nothing, England would ſtill be a great Gainer. The Duke of Bedford and the Council of England, who knew nothing of what had paſſed between King Charles and the Duke of Burgundy, fell into the Snare. As ſoon as they had conſented to the propoſed Negotiation, the Duke of Burgundy pretending to be ſtill ſtrictly united with the Engliſh, ſo ordered it, that inſtead of Calais, the City of Arras was appointed for the Place of Congreſs, where all the Parties concerned were to ſend their Ambaſſadors. We ſhall ſee preſently what paſſed in this Aſſembly.

1434. Continuation of the War in France. Monſtrelet. Hall.

Mean while, the War in France degenerated into real plundering and robbing. Both Kings being too weak to keep great Armies on foot, only ſmall Bodies and Parties acted on either Side. The moſt remarkable Occurrences of this Year were theſe. The French having ſurpriſed Rue in Picardy (1), the Earl of Arundel poſted thither (2) to retake the Town. Whilſt he was upon the March, he heard, the French were fortifying Herberoy near Beauvais, and thought he ſhould drive them from thence, before their Works were finiſhed. Accordingly he appeared before that Place, but upon notice that Vignoles and Xaintrailles were approaching with twelve hundred Men, raiſed the Siege, to go and meet them. A bloody Battle enſued, where the Earl of Arundel was mortally wounded, and made Priſoner. He died within a few Days, to the great Grief of the Duke of Bedford (3).

Death of the Earl of Arundel. May 13. Monſtrelet. Hall.

About the ſame time the Earl of Clermont, now Duke of Bourbon by his Father's Death, became Maſter of Corbeil and Brie Compte-Robert, which were ſold him by the Governors. A Scotch Officer found likewiſe means to take Vincennes, but could not keep it.

Talbot arrives in France, and retakes ſeveral Places. Monſtrelet. Hall. Stow.

Mean time, Talbot being arrived from England with three or four thouſand Men (4), to whom he joined ſome other Troops, drawn out of the Garriſons, was in ſuch manner Maſter of the Field, that all the French vaniſhed before him. So, without much Oppoſition, he retook Beaumont upon Oyſe, Creil, Pont St. Maxence, and Clermont in Beauvoiſis. He even began the Siege of Beauvais, but the bad Weather obliged him to deſiſt. During theſe little Exploits, King Charles went into Languedoc and Dauphiné.

Charles's Advantage in the Continuation of the War. Stow.

The Froſt, which was very ſevere about the end of this Year, and the beginning of the next, hindered not the two Parties from continuing the War all the Winter, by Sieges, and Surprizings of divers Places. The French had a great Advantage, in that moſt of the Engliſh Towns thought of returning to the Obedience of King Charles, ſince the Affairs of the Engliſh were gone to decay. But it was not from theſe Progreſſes, ſo inconſiderable in themſelves, that Charles expected the Concluſion of the War. It muſt have been long, before he could have taken one by one all the Places poſſeſſed by the Engliſh in France. The Congreſs which was to be at Arras, promiſed him much more advantagious Succeſſes, ſince he was ſure of making a Peace with the Duke of Burgundy.

1435. Congreſs of Arras. Monſtrelet. Hall.

The News being ſpread over Europe, that a Peace between France and England, was going to be negotiated at Arras, there was ſcarce a Sovereign Prince, but what was deſirous to ſend his Ambaſſadors. Pope Eugenius II and the Council of Baſil, who were ſtill at Variance, ſent theirs alſo, but ſeparately. From the Pope came the Cardinal Santa Cruz, and from the Council the Cardinals of Cyprus and Arles. King Charles ſent ſeventeen Plenipotentiaries; at the head of whom was the Conſtable Richemont. Henry appointed twenty ſeven for France and England; of whom the Duke of Burgundy was the firſt (5); with Power to eight of them, viz. four Engliſh and four French (among whom were to be the Duke of Burgundy and the Archbiſhop of York) to ſign the Peace. Afterwards the ſame Power was given to the Cardinal of Winchester. Hitherto the Duke of Bedford and the Council of England were perſwaded of the Duke of Burgundy's Sincerity. This appears, in his being truſted with the Secret of the Embaſſy, ſince nothing could be treated, or concluded, without him. It muſt be confeſſed, this Prince acted a baſe part in this Congreſs. However, ſhortly after, private Intelligence was received in England, that he had deſired the Pope to abſolve him from his Oath to Henry V. Whereupon the King writ to the Pope to know the Truth. Eugenius anſwered, no French Prince had ever applied to him for any ſuch thing; that he had never granted any ſuch Diſpenſation, and for the future, would behave in that reſpect, ſo as the King ſhould have reaſon to be ſatisfied. We ſhall ſee in the Sequel, how he performed his Promiſe.

Charles's Propoſals for Peace. Du Tillet. Hall.

The Congreſs of Arras was opened on the 6th of Auguſt. It began with King Charles's Propoſals. His Ambaſſadors offered, in his Name, to the King of England, Normandy and Guienne, provided he would quit the Title of King of France, and do Homage for thoſe two Provinces: That is to ſay, he offered as a Favour the two Provinces which the King of England was entirely poſſeſſed of; a Favour, which he was to purchaſe with the Reſignation of the Title of King of France, and a great Part of the Kingdom ſtill in his hands. Though there were no other Proof of Charles's being certain of gaining the Duke of Burgundy from the Engliſh, this alone would be ſufficient. For on what other Foundation could Charles, who, for three Years paſt, was unable to bring an Army into the Field, make ſuch a Propoſal? But, as was obſerved, his Intent was, not to conclude a Peace with the Engliſh, but only to afford the Duke of Burgundy a colour to proceed as he had reſolved. The Ambaſſadors of England, ſurprized at an Offer ſo remote from what the Duke of Orleans had made them expect, ſuddenly broke off the Conference, and withdrew (6) extremely diſſatisfied, without vouchſafing an Anſwer. Here it is that ſeveral French Authors diſplay their Eloquence, to ſhew to what Height the Engliſh had carried their Pride and Inſolence, ſince they rejected ſo reaſonable Offers. A remarkable Inſtance of the uſual Prejudice of Hiſtorians in favour of their own Nation.

The Engliſh withdraw with Indignation. Monſtrelet.

The Retreat of the Engliſh ſurprized neither the Duke of Burgundy, nor the French Ambaſſadors. They muſt have foreſeen, that ſuch Offers would be refuſed. Nay, it may be affirmed on the contrary, that in making ſo unreaſonable a Propoſal, conſidering the Poſture of Affairs, their ſole Aim was to induce the Engliſh Ambaſſadors to withdraw. This abrupt Departure however, was highly exaggerated, and repreſented as a clear Evidence, they never intended to make Peace. It was this likewiſe, that gave the Duke of Burgundy a Pretence, to conclude a ſeparate Treaty with King Charles. He pretended, he was not obliged to follow their Humour, or render the War everlaſting for their ſake. Upon this Foundation, the Pope's Legate abſolved him from all his Oaths, as well to the late, as the preſent King of England. After that, as all the Articles were before ſettled, his ſeparate Peace was ſoon concluded (7). Never had King of France made ſo diſhonourable a Peace. Charles was bound by this Treaty, to diſown the Murder of Duke of John, to deliver up the Murderers, or if they were not in his Power, to baniſh them the Realm: He promiſed to found certain Chapels, where the Soul of the Deceaſed was to be prayed for, Day and Night. He agreed, that the Duke of Burgundy ſhould nominate the Prieſts that were to officiate, and a Croſs ſhould be erected on Montereau Bridge, for a ſtanding Monument of the Reparation of the Murder. He was obliged moreover, to pay fifty thouſand Crowns of Gold for Duke John's Equipage, which was pillaged, and reſign to the Duke of Burgundy certain Towns, to ſatisfy him for the Charges of the War. Laſtly, he freed him from all Homage during Life. The Duke conſented on his Part, that the King might redeem the Towns of St. Quentin, Peronne, Amiens, Corbie, ſituated on the Somme, for four hundred thouſand Crowns. By this Article it appears, the Duke was not very ſcrupulous, ſince he ſold to France Places, held only by the Bounty of the King of England, purſuant to his Engagement with the Duke of Bedford. It may be proper farther to remark, that the Service done by the Duke of Burgundy to France, in making a ſeparate Peace, greatly outweighed, in the Opinion of the French Hiſtorians, all his Proceedings againſt her. This has made them very cautious in their Expreſſions, before the Treaty of Arras, for fear their Language ſhould not agree with what they had to ſay afterwards. But after this happy Peace, they have extolled to the Skies, his Goodneſs, Wiſdom, and Probity. This was however the Man, who for the ſake of Revenge, had ruined France; and found no other way to repair the Fault, but by a notorious Treachery to England. What would the French have ſaid, if he had always continued firm to the Engliſh? I am ſorry to be obliged to ſpeak thus of a Prince, to whom was given the Sir-name of Good. But it ſerves to ſhow, how the Sir-names and Encomiums beſtowed on Princes, happen ſometimes to diſagree with their real Character.

I ſay nothing of the Diſpenſation granted to the Duke of Burgundy. Every one may make what Reflections he pleaſes. I ſhall only add, that in November was publiſhed in England, Pope Eugenius's fore-mentioned Letter, atteſted by the King. Probably, it was deſigned for an indirect Information of the Court of Rome's Sincerity.

On the other hand, the Towns upon the Somme, reſigned to the Duke of Burgundy, being now againſt them, they were under a neceſſity to provide for that Quarter, for fear they might be uſed to invade the neighbouring Provinces. So, their whole Attention was confined to the Preſervation of Normandy and Paris, it being impoſſible to take care of all, amidſt the continual Defection of the Towns truſted to the Inhabitants. Houdan, St. Denis, Pontoiſe, Melun, Pont St. Maxence, Meulant, voluntarily ſurrendered to the French, during the Congreſs of Arras, or a little before. The Duke of Bedford retaking St. Denis (1), razed the Walls. Then he ordered Meulant to be inveſted, but the Baſtard of Orleans raiſed the Siege. The Lord of Chatillon, Governor of Epernay for the Engliſh, going out of the Town, found the Gates ſhut againſt him at his Return; and the Inhabitants called in the French.

Death of Queen Iſabella of Bavaria. Monſtrelet.

Iſabella, Queen Dowager of France, ſeeing the proſperity of the King her Son, whom ſhe mortally hated, and the deſperate Condition of the Engliſh, died at Paris with Grief and Vexation, twelve Days after the Concluſion of the Treaty of Arras (2). She was univerſally hated by the French, who conſidered her as the principal Cauſe of the Ruin of the Kingdom. The Engliſh did not much eſteem her; at leaſt, they ſhewed but little regard for her, ſince ſhe was become unſerviceable to them.

Death of the Duke of Bedford. Hall. Sandford.

Her Deceaſe was of little Conſequence to either Party. But the Death of the Duke of Bedford, on the 14th of the ſame Month, at Roan, was of infinitely greater Importance. Very probably, his Indignation to be thus impoſed upon by King Charles, and the Duke of Burgundy, helped to throw him into the Sickneſs, of which he died, four Days before the Concluſion of the Treaty of Arras, the fatal News whereof, he expected every Moment. He foreſaw with a mortal Concern, the Affairs of the King his Nephew, were going to be irretrievably reduced to a very wretched Condition. During the whole Courſe of his Adminiſtration, he behaved with that Wiſdom and Prudence, as juſtly ranked him with the greateſt Men of his Time. His Valour, and other martial Virtues, ſhone with no leſs Luſtre on all Occaſions, where he commanded in Perſon. Had he been well aſſiſted by England, he would have, probably, ended the War to his own Glory, and the young King's Advantage; ſince he wanted no Qualification proper to accompliſh the greateſt Undertakings. But unfortunately for him, he was abandoned, when he ſtood moſt in need of Aſſiſtance. The only thing he could be taxed with, was his ſuffering himſelf to be ſurpriſed, in the Affair of the Congreſs of Arras. But where is the Man, that can always be upon his guard againſt Treachery? Nothing better ſhows the Eſteem, due to this illuſtrious Prince, than the Regard Lewis XI, Son of Charles VII; expreſſed for him, when he could have no Inducement to flatter him. Lewis being one Day in the Church of Roan, and looking upon the Duke of Bedford's Tomb (3), a certain Lord of his Retinue, adviſed him to demoliſh that ſtanding Monument of the Diſhonour of the French; No, replied the King, Let the Aſhes of a Prince reſt in Peace, who, were he alive, would make the boldeſt of us tremble. I rather wiſh, a more ſtately Monument were erected to his Honour.

His Elogy.

The Duke of York appointed Regent of France. Act. Pub. X. p. 674. Hall. Stow.

Immediately after the Duke of Bedford's Death, the Duke of York (4), was appointed Regent of France. But Edmund Beaufort (5), who aſpired to that Dignity, ſo managed it by his Intrigues, that his Rival's Patent was long deferred. Probably, he was in hopes to obtain a change in his favour. This Delay proved extremely prejudicial to the King's Affairs, as will be ſeen in the Relation of the next Year's Occurrences (6). 1435.

All England was exceedingly moved at the News of the Duke of Burgundy's Defection. The moſt opprobrious Names were there liberally given him. Mean while, the Duke willing to ſhow ſtill ſome regard for Henry, ſent two Heralds to make his Excuſe, for concluding a ſeparate Peace, on pretence, his Subjects were grievouſly oppreſſed by the continuance of the War. This is the common pretence for a Peace, though generally when a War is undertaken, the Intereſts of the poor People are little regarded. The Duke offered at the ſame time his Mediation to Henry, if he deſired to conclude a Peace with King Charles. This offer was looked upon as a freſh Inſult. The truth is, what could be expected from the Mediation of a Prince, who had ſo openly ſacrificed the Intereſt of England to his own Advantage? Accordingly, no Anſwer was vouchſafed to his Letters, which, beſides, were writ in a Stile very different from what he was wont to uſe (7). His Heralds were received with Indignity. The Law of Nations had like to have been violated on their account, and all the Flemings and Burgundians then in England, torn in pieces by the Populace; ſo incenſed were they againſt their Prince. But ſuch Behaviour was to him very ſerviceable. He wanted a Pretence to join his Forces with the French, and did not fail to find one in the Inſults upon his Heralds and Subjects. For in May, this very Year, he ſent the Conſtable Richemont five hundred Lances, under the Command of the Earl of Lalain, and thereby, openly declared himſelf an Enemy to the King of England. 1436. The Duke of Burgundy tries to excuſe himſelf in England. Monſtrelet. Du Tillet. Hall. He offers his Mediation. It is rejected. Act. Pub. X. p. 636. He declares againſt England. Monſtrelet.

The Conſtable joining this Aid to ſix or ſeven thouſand Men, drawn together from other Places, approached Paris, where remained but fifteen hundred Engliſh, under the Command of Sir Richard Woodville (8). Beſides that this Garriſon was very weak, for the Defence of ſo large a City, the Conſtable held Intelligence with the Inhabitants, who being almoſt all Friends of the Duke of Burgundy, ſided with England, only out of regard to that Prince. Whilſt he adhered to the King of England, Paris wanted no other Guard, but her own Citizens; but upon his declaring for King Charles, they all changed with him. So, it was no wonder, if fifteen hundred Engliſh could not keep them in Awe. The Death of the Duke of Bedford, the Abſence of the new Regent, and the little care taken, to ſend Succours from England, diſabling the Engliſh to keep an Army in the Field, the Conſtable met with no Oppoſition in his March. He took ſeveral ſmall Places near Paris, and ſlew five hundred (9) of a Detachment, ſent by the Governor to throw themſelves into St. Denis. After that, he encamped at the very Gates of Paris, with his little Army. Whilſt he was in this Camp, there were continual Parleys between the Burghers and Beſiegers, without the Governor's being able to help it. At length, April the 13th the whole City riſe in Arms, whilſt the Marſhal de l'Iſle Adam ſcaled the Walls (10). The Garriſon advancing to repulſe the Aſſault, found themſelves pelted with a Shower of Stones from the Windows, whilſt all the City reſounded with Long live the King, and the Duke of Burgundy. The Governor, perceiving there was no reſiſting ſo many Enemies, choſe to retire into the Baſtile, with all his People. Immediately all the Streets were chained, for fear he ſhould think of returning. Mean time, l' Iſle Adam entered the City with eaſe, and opened the Gates to the Conſtable. Thus The Conſtable approaches Paris, Monſtrelet. Hall. and takes it.

See above, p. 540, Note (1). But the Perſon here meant, was, Edmund, third Son of John Beaufort, Earl of Somerſet. This Edmund bore the Titles of Earl of Mortagne in Normandy, and Lord of Chirkland in the Marches of Wales. Paris

1436. Paris was taken for King Charles by the ſame l'Iſle-Adam, who had ſurpriſed it in like manner, ſeventeen Years before, for the Duke of Burgundy. The Baſtile, which might have held a long Siege, had it been well ſtored with Proviſions, was ſo deſtitute, that it could hold out but three Days. It was very well, the Governor could obtain an honorable Capitulation.

England thinks of a Peace.

As the Affairs of the Engliſh ſenſibly declined, the Council of England were extremely deſirous of a Peace. The War in France no longer concerned the Conqueſt of that Kingdom, as in the Reign of Henry V, and till the raiſing of the Siege of Orleans, but only what part the King of England could poſſibly keep; and the little that could be expected to be preſerved by a vigorous War, coſt England immenſe Sums. This was a very plauſible Reaſon, to perſuade the Publick, it was neceſſary, ſeriouſly to think of a Peace. I ſay, a plauſible Reaſon, becauſe it was not the real Motive of the Council's Proceedings. The Cardinal of Wincheſter had for ſome time gained ground upon the Duke of Gloceſter his Rival. The Council by degrees, was filled with his Creatures, who, no more than himſelf, found their own private Advantage in the Continuation of the War; which, ſince it was unſucceſsful, rendered them odious to the People. Coin was grown exceeding ſcarce in England, and yet the Council was forced to be continually deviſing means to raiſe Money, which could not be done without cauſing great Murmurings. On the other hand, the Cardinal hoped to ruin his Enemy with more eaſe, during a Peace, becauſe the War, and the unexpected Accidents thence ariſing, rendered the Perſon and Counſels of the Duke of Gloceſter abſolutely neceſſary. In ſhort, as the Duke was ever of Opinion, that vigorous Endeavours ſhould be uſed to recover what was loſt in France, this was an Argument for the oppoſite Party to inſiſt, with the ſame Earneſtneſs, upon the neceſſity of concluding a Peace. This Opinion prevailing in the Council, the Duke of York, whoſe Commiſſion to be Regent of France, was at length ſigned, had Inſtructions, and full Power, to treat with King Charles, if he ſaw any appearance of Succeſs. Moreover, on ſuppoſition of a Negotiation, the Council impowered the Cardinal of Wincheſter, and the Duke of Burgundy, jointly to treat of the King's Marriage with one of his Adverſary's Daughters.

He drives the French out of Normandy. Monſtrelet.

Shortly after, the Duke of York departed for France, and in Normandy landed a good Body of Troops (1), with which he retook many ſmall Places or Caſtles ſeized by the French, ſince the death of the Duke of Bedford. Feſcamp was among the Places recovered by the Regent, but preſently after retaken by Scalade.

The Duke of Burgundy prepares to beſiege Calais. Monſtrelet. Hall.

Though the Duke of York was maſter of the Field in Normandy, and about Paris, he was concerned for Picardy. He heard from all Parts, that the Duke of Burgundy was drawing all his Forces together, and making great Preparations for a Siege. As theſe Preparations could be deſigned only againſt Calais (2), he ſent notice to the Council of England, that they might provide in time, againſt the threatened Siege. Indeed, a powerful Fleet, a great Train of Artillery, and an Army of fifty thouſand Men, aſſembled by the Duke of Burgundy, were clear Evidences of his extreme Deſire to ſucceed in his Enterprize, and of his Reſolution not to be diſappointed. This News flying to England, the whole Nation was alarmed, and grew more incenſed againſt the Duke of Burgundy. The Council trembling for Calais, the firſt Conqueſt of the Engliſh in France, reſolved to uſe all poſſible Endeavours to ſave it. To that end, they ordered fifteen thouſand Men to be raiſed, and petitioned the Duke of Gloceſter to take upon him the Care of relieving that Place. Fifteen thouſand Men were little enough for ſuch an Undertaking. But, beſides that it was reckoned, the Regent would join the Duke of Gloceſter with all his Forces, the Enemy's Army was known to conſiſt almoſt entirely of the Militia of Flanders, who were not much valued.

Act. Pub. X. p. 646. The Duke of Gloceſter goes to its Relief.

Henry diſpoſes of Boulogne and Flanders. p. 649, 652.

Whilſt the Troops were levying with the utmoſt Diligence, the King, by Advice of his Council, reſolved to expreſs his reſentment againſt the Duke of Burgundy, in granting, by Letters under his Great Seal, the Earldom of Boulogne, to the Lord Beaumont, and Flanders to the Duke of Gloceſter. But it was eaſier to give them in Parchment, than wreſt them out of the Hands of the Poſſeſſor.

Every thing being ready for the departure of the Army, deſigned for the relief of Calais, the Duke of Gloceſter ſet Sail, and landed in Normandy the beginning of October (3). The Duke of Burgundy had now been before Calais ſix Weeks, with his numerous Army. He carried on the Siege vigorouſly, and the Beſieged made as brave a Defence. Mean time, the Duke, who hoped to acquire immortal Fame, by taking one of the ſtrongeſt Places in Europe, was yet very far from his Aim. Nay, he began to perceive, the Attempt was beyond his Power. His Fleet (4), by the unskilfulneſs of the Pilots, or ſome other Accident, coming too near the Town at low Water, run on ground, and was reduced to Aſhes before his Eyes, by the Beſieged. This was a very mortifying Accident, but a worſe befell him quickly after. A Rumour being ſpread in the Army, that the Duke of Gloceſter was approaching to relieve the Town, the Flemings, diſcouraged by the Fatigues of the Siege, and terrified at the approach of the Engliſh, ſuddenly unpitched their Tents, and began to retire. In vain did the Duke endeavour to remove their Fears. The Scouts of the Engliſh Army beginning to appear, it was ſtill leſs practicable for the Duke to ſtop his frightned Troops, who ſought only to avoid a Battle. So, the Duke ſeeing he could not prevail, was forced to follow them in their Retreat, which was made in great diſorder, though timely enough to prevent the Engliſh from taking any Advantage. He had the further mortification to receive a Defiance from the Duke of Gloceſter, offering him Battle, and not to have it in his power to accept it, though his Army was much ſuperior to that of his Enemy. But this was not yet all. Hardly was he returned into his own Country, when the Towns of Flanders revolted againſt him. He was even in danger of loſing his Life at Bruges, in a ſeditious Tumult of the Citizens. He was himſelf wounded, after ſeeing, with Grief, l'Iſle Adam torn in pieces by the mutinous Populace. Mean time, the Duke of Gloceſter improving this Juncture, overran Artois, Flanders, and Hainault, and carried away twelve hundred Waggon-Loads of Booty. From thenceforward the Duke of Burgundy had ſo much trouble at Home, that he was but little ſerviceable to King Charles.

1437. Death of the two Queen Dowagers of England. Catherine marries Tudor. Sandford. Hall. Stow.

The beginning of the Year 1437, was remarkable for the Death of Joan of Navarre (5), and Catherine of France (6), both Queen Dowagers of England, one Widow of Henry IV, the other of Henry V. The laſt had married Owen Tudor, a Welſh Gentleman, deſcended, as it is ſaid, from the ancient Kings of Wales. I do not know, whether, in thoſe Days, this Deſcent was much regarded, or was endeavoured to be traced, till after the Crown was devolved to the Family of the Tudors, by the Advancement of Henry VII to the Throne. However that be, when Queen Catherine eſpouſed Owen Tudor, the Marriage appeared ſo unſuitable, that all England was offended at it; and the more, as it was made unknown to the Duke of Gloceſter, who was then Protector. But that Prince's Veneration for the Memory of the King his Brother, prevented him, from giving the Queen his Siſter-in-law any Trouble. When ſhe was dead, the Council had not the ſame regard for her ſecond Husband. They thought it their Duty to puniſh him for his raſhneſs, in daring to eſpouſe the King's Mother, without the Conſent of thoſe who governed the Kingdom, and ordered him to be ſent to the Tower. Some time after, Tudor made his Eſcape, but was taken, and put under cloſer Confinement. Some ſay, he found means to eſcape a ſecond time, but being retaken, loſt his Head. Others affirm, he was not beheaded till 1460, upon being taken in Battle, fighting for the Houſe of Lancaſter. I don't know, whether it be certain, that Tudor was put to Death, but it may be affirmed, that thoſe who ſay, it was in 1460, were guilty of an Error, by taking Owen Tudor, his third Son (7), for Owen Tudor the Father.

Beſides, it was made not only without the King's Licenſe, but alſo contrary to Jaquelina's expreſs Oath, not to marry without his Permiſſion. So, both the Bride and Bridegroom, would have been liable to the rigour of the Law, had not the King been pleaſed to forgive them (2).

1437. Death of the King of Scotland. Buchanan. Monſtrelet. Act. Pub. X. p. 679.

On the 19th of February, James I, of Scotland, was murdered in his Bed, by Aſſaſſins ſuborned by the Earl of Athol (3) his Uncle. James II, his Son, ſeven Years old, ſucceeded him, under the Guardianſhip of Joan of Somerſet his Mother, who was herſelf wounded, by endeavouring to ſave the King her Husband. It is time now to return to what paſſed in France.

The Affairs of the Engliſh in France begin to have a better Face.

After the Arrival of the Duke of York from England, the Affairs of the Engliſh began to be upon a better foot. King Charles, ever a Slave to his Pleaſures, had no conſiderable Body of Troops in the Field; and the Revolt of the Flemings, hindered the Duke of Burgundy from ſending him any Aſſiſtance. It is true, the Towns that had voluntarily ſurrendered to him, had ſtrengthned his Party conſiderably, but withal, his Army was much weakened, on account of the Garriſons he was obliged to keep there. As Matters then ſtood in France, both Kings had almoſt equal Reaſon to fear the Diſloyalty of their Adherents; who, for the moſt part, were attached rather to the Fortune of him they ſerved, than to his Perſon, or the Juſtice of his Cauſe. Thus, the Preſervation of the Towns they were poſſeſſed of, entirely depended upon the Strength of the Garriſons.

Talbot takes Pontoiſe. Monſtrelet. Hall.

The firſt Months of this Year, the Cold was ſo exceſſive, that it ſeemed to leave the Generals on both Sides, no deſire to form any Enterprize, till it ſhould be abated. Mean while, Talbot, who found nothing impoſſible, reaped a conſiderable Advantage from the Security of the French, cauſed by the Sharpneſs of the Seaſon. On Shrove-Tueſday at Night, he ſcaled Pontoiſe, by help of the Ditches being frozen (4), and carried it, whilſt the Garriſon and Townſmen were wholly intent upon their Diverſions. The taking of this important Place, was a great Blow to King Charles. Eſpecially, it very much annoyed the Pariſians, who were expoſed to the continual Incurſions of the new Engliſh Garriſon, to the very Gates of Paris.

Monſtrelet.

The French made themſelves ſome amends for this Loſs, by the Acquiſition of Dreux and Chevreuſe, ſold them by the Governors.

The Duke of Burgundy reaſks King Charles.

The Superiority the Engliſh had recovered in France, made the Duke of Burgundy apprehenſive of ſome fatal Revolution. He was ſenſible that, without his Aid, King Charles could never end the War; and as he had openly declared againſt the Engliſh, it was his Intereſt that they ſhould be entirely expelled the Kingdom. Mean time, it grieved him to act alone for the Benefit of a Prince, whoſe Indolence kept him from all the Enterprizes, where he ought to have been the chief Actor. The Duke, deſigning therefore to rouze him out of this Lethargy, repreſented to him, that his Honour and Intereſt called upon him to aſſemble all his Forces, put himſelf at their Head, and approach Paris, in order to drive his Enemies out of the Heart of the Kingdom. At the ſame time, he offered to make a powerful Diverſion in Picardy, to favour his Undertakings.

Charles heads his Army. Monſtrelet.

Never was Prince leſs inclined to War than Charles VII, and yet never did King of France make greater Conqueſts than he, ſince he may be ſaid to conquer his whole Kingdom. But it was chiefly by means of his Generals, who, for the moſt part, were Men of eminent Merit. The Duke of Burgundy's Remonſtrances and Offers having raiſed him from his Sloth, he drew all his Forces together, to approach Paris, where he was much wanted. By the Way he attacked Montereau-Faut-Yonne (5), whilſt the the Duke of Burgundy beſieged Crotoy, a ſtrong Place in Picardy.

It was about the end of Auguſt (6), when the Duke of Burgundy inveſted Crotoy with a ſtrong Army (7), whilſt four French Ships blocked up the Place by Sea. The Duke of York being recalled, by the Intrigues of the Earl of Somerſet his Enemy, was about to depart, and only waited for the Arrival of the Earl of Warwick, who was to ſucceed him in the Regency. For this cauſe, not being able to take upon him to relieve Crotoy in Perſon, he commiſſioned the brave Talbot for that purpoſe (8), whoſe Name alone was ſufficient to ſtrike Terror into the Enemies of the Engliſh. Talbot, at the head of five thouſand Men, boldly advanced towards Crotoy, in order to relieve it, though the River Somme parted him from the Duke of Burgundy's Camp round the Town, which was on the other Side. When the Duke was informed of his March, he left part of his Troops at the Siege, and with the reſt poſted himſelf on the River-ſide, to oppoſe his Paſſage. The Hatred conceived by the Engliſh againſt this Prince, was ſo violent, that they thought nothing impracticable, when an Opportunity offered to be revenged. Talbot, improving this Diſpoſition, ruſhed firſt into the River, Sword in hand, and by his Intrepidity inſpired his Troops with ſuch Courage, that they inſtantly followed him. The more bold, or rather raſh this Action was, the more it aſtoniſhed the Burgundians, who imagining they had to deal with Devils rather than Men, took to Flight, without expecting their Enemies. Their Terror infecting thoſe, that were left at the Siege, the whole Army ran away; and it was not in the Duke of Burgundy's Power to rally them. At the ſame time, the Duke of York appeared with ſeven Men of War in Sight of four French Ships, and chaced them ſo briskly, that it was with great Difficulty they eſcaped to St. Valery. Talbot entered the Town in Triumph, and after levelling the Trenches of the Beſiegers, marched back to Normandy. In his Return he conquered five or ſix ſmall Places in Picardy, and retaking once more Tancarville in Normandy, entered Roan covered with Glory.

Succeſs of the Siege of Montereau. Monſtrelet. Hall.

The Succeſs of the Siege of Montereau was not ſo favorable to the Engliſh; nevertheleſs it was not inglorious. Thomas Gerard Governor of that poor Place, long defended it, in ſpite of the vigorous Efforts of the Beſiegers, though he had but four hundred Men. Hitherto King Charles was not very eminent for his Valour, but at this Siege he performed ſuch Exploits, as began to breed a higher Idea of his Courage. After a pretty long Siege, he carried the Town by Storm, having been himſelf one of the firſt to mount the Breach, and fight hand to hand with thoſe that defended it. Doubtleſs he had been told, that it was neceſſary to procure the Eſteem of his Subjects, by ſome extraordinary Action. The Intrepidity he ſhewed on this occaſion, turned greatly to his Advantage. From thenceforward, his Friends as well as Enemies, had very different Thoughts of him from what they had before. Mean while, the Garriſon retiring into the Caſtle, a ſecond Siege was to be formed. Charles ſatisfied with the Glory acquired in the firſt, and perhaps diſcouraged with the Fatigues he had indured, left the Management of this to the Dauphin his Son. Gerard, who was no leſs brave than experienced, held out fifteen Days longer, and then was forced to capitulate. When he came before the Dauphin, he very politely told him, that againſt any other but him, he ſhould have been able to make a longer Defence. This Compliment was well received by the young Prince, who was pleaſed to ſee himſelf ſet in ſome Meaſure above the King his Father. But Charles, who was told of it, ſeemed extremely mortified. It is ſaid, he began from thenceforward to entertain a Jealouſy of the Prince his Son, which proved very fatal to him afterwards.

The Duke of Orleans is appointed Mediator between the two Kings. Monſtrelet. Hall. Act. Pub. X. p. 655, 663, 664, 665, 679.

Whilſt the War continued in France, the Duke of Orleans, Priſoner in England, was thinking of means to obtain his Liberty. Nothing but a Peace between the two Kings could poſſibly procure it. And therefore, no one was more concerned than he, to endeavour to ſet on foot a freſh Negotiation. For that purpoſe, he deſired leave to go and talk in Perſon, with the Duke of Bretagne at Calais, who was then thought to be the only Prince, that could be employed as Mediator. The Council, who were all inclined to Peace, would have readily granted his Deſire, but it was judged neceſſary to ſee firſt how Charles was diſpoſed. Beſides, the Duke of Gloceſter was

The Cardinal gains ground upon the Duke of Gloceſter.

Mean while, as the King advanced in Age, the credit of the Duke his Uncle ſenſibly leſſened, and That of the Cardinal of Wincheſter daily increaſed. The Cardinal had a great advantage upon his Adverſary, in that his Riches enabled him frequently to lend the King Money. The Kingdom was ſo exhauſted, that Aids of that kind were conſidered as the greateſt Service to the State. He artfully improved the King's diſpoſition towards him, to prevent any freſh Attacks from the Duke of Gloceſter. By Letters under the Great Seal, the King granted him a general pardon for all offences whatever, from the beginning of the World to the 26th of June 1437 (1). By this means he diſarmed his Enemy of all pretence to attack him.

1438. Plague and Famine in England and France. Hall. Monſtrelet.

The year 1438, abounded with few remarkable Events. A terrible Famine, which raged at the ſame time in France and England, and was followed by a Plague, prevented the Generals, on both ſides, from forming any great projects. Attempts there were however, ſome of which were unſucceſsful, and others inconſiderable. I ſhall therefore take notice of the moſt remarkable only. Surienne, Governor of Montargis for the Engliſh, finding himſelf ſurrounded with the Enemy's Towns, and receiving no aſſiſtance from England, ſurrendered that Place to the French, for ten thouſand Salutes of Gold (2). In the preſent poſture of the affairs of the Engliſh, Montargis was of little importance, ſince they could not poſſibly carry the War from that quarter. Shortly after, Edmund Earl of Mortagne (3), Brother of the Earl of Somerſet, leading ſome Troops from England (4), and joining Talbot, they made ſome inconſiderable Conqueſts in Normandy.

The Duke of Burgundy makes another attempt upon Calais. Monſtrelet.

The diſgrace received by the Duke of Burgundy before Calais, grieving him extremely, he wanted to repair it by taking that Place. But, as it was difficult to accompliſh this deſign by a Siege in form, he took another method. He had been told, that by digging through a certain Bank, the Town would be infallibly overflowed; and that lying within diſtance, with a good Body of Troops, it would be eaſy to enter the Place, amidſt the Conſternation of the Garriſon and Inhabitants. The project was put in execution; but the Sea being lower than the Town, all the Water ran out. The Duke being diſappointed, reſolved to attempt the Siege of Guiſnes; but the Earl of Huntington (5), who came very ſeaſonably from England with a ſupply of Troops, conſtrained him to retire. The troubles in Flanders, which were ſoon after rekindled, found him ſo much employment for ſome years, that he had no leiſure to form any new deſigns againſt the Engliſh.

The Dauphin's Marriage raiſed ſuch a Jealouſy in the Engliſh, that, after ſeveral inſults on both ſides, England and Scotland came at length to an open Rupture. The Duke of Somerſet's Brother exchanged for the Earl of Eu. Monſtrelet.

John and Thomas Beaufort, Brothers of the Earl of Somerſet, having been long Priſoners in France (6), it had been often attempted, to exchange them for others of the French, but there was always ſome obſtacle in the way. By the agreement in 1430, with the Duke of Bourbon, that Prince had engaged, to procure their releaſe without Ranſom; but as that agreement was never executed, they ſtill remained Priſoners. I do not know what became of Thomas, who bore the Title of Earl of Perth, it may be he died during his Captivity. But this year, John was exchanged for the Earl of Eu of the Houſe of Artois, who had been Priſoner in England, ever ſince the Battle of Azincourt. He afterwards became Duke of Somerſet, upon the death of Henry his elder Brother. There was alſo a fourth Brother named Edmund who ſucceeded them, and of whom, I ſhall have much to ſay in the ſequel of this Reign (7).

1439. The Conſtable Richemont beſieges Meaux, and takes it by Storm. Monſtrelet.

The Famine and Plague ceaſing in England and France, both Sides took Arms again. In March 1439, the Conſtable Richemont putting himſelf at the head of a numerous Army (8), laid Siege to Meaux, one of the ſtrongeſt Places in France, which had formerly held out ſeven months againſt Henry V. The Baſtard of Han (9), an Officer of diſtinguiſhed Valour, who was Governor, made ſo brave a defence, as aſtoniſhed the Conſtable. However, after a three Weeks Siege, the City was taken by ſtorm; but the Work was but half compleated, ſince the Garriſon (10) retired into the Market, (ſo that part of the City is called which is ſeparated from the other by the Marne.) The Engliſh breaking down the Bridge of Communication, the Conſtable was forced to begin, on the other Side of the River, a ſecond Siege much more difficult than the firſt. The ſame thing happened to Henry V, when he inveſted this Place. Mean time, the Conſtable having taken the Governor Priſoner in the aſſault (11), cut off his Head, becauſe he was a Frenchman. This is what King Charles's Generals had not yet ventured to practice, by reaſon of the great number of Priſoners in the hands of the Engliſh. But as ſoon as they found themſelves ſtrongeſt, they overlooked that conſideration, being no longer apprehenſive of Repriſals.

Talbot throws in ſuccours; Monſtrelet.

The Siege of the Market of Meaux growing daily more difficult, the Conſtable drew round his Camp Lines with redoubts to prevent all relief, and the King came himſelf to the Army, to animate the Troops by his preſence. Mean while, Talbot, who did not doubt, that the beſieged would make a long reſiſtance, was now prepared to relieve them. How difficult ſoever this undertaking appeared, he failed not to attempt it. The obſtacles which he foreſaw, ſerved only to animate him the more. With a good Body of choſen Troops, he boldly advanced towards the Beſiegers Lines, and aſſaulting and taking one of the Redoubts, which obſtructed his Paſſage, entered the Place with a Convoy. On the morrow, he ſallied out, whilſt the Beſiegers were ſtill diſmayed at the Action of the foregoing day, and went to prepare for a freſh Effort. But the Conſtable inraged at receiving ſuch a diſgrace from a handful of Men, preſſed the Place ſo vigorouſly, that the Garriſon were forced to capitulate, before the Succours could be ready.

but the Place is taken.

He raiſes the Siege of Avranche, Hall.

The Siege of Avranche, undertaken by the Conſtable after that of Meaux, did not prove ſo ſucceſsful. After being three Weeks before that Place, Talbot, with the Troops prepared for the relief of Meaux, attacked and forced the Lines of the Beſiegers, and ſupplied the Town with Proviſions.

and beſieges Harfleur. Monſtrelet. Stow.

After this Exploit, Talbot finding the French were diſmayed, and their Troops ſo weakened, that they could not withſtand him, appeared before Harfleur. As his Army was not ſtrong enough to form a Siege, he choſe to block up the Town. To that end, he ſo intrenched himſelf in an advantagious Poſt, that an Army of fifty thouſand Men was not capable of forcing him. Mean time, the Earl of Somerſet kept the Place blocked up by Sea. The Earl of Eu, lately arrived from England, where he had been long a Priſoner, approached to attack the Intrenchments of the Engliſh; but perceiving it impracticable, choſe to retire, after a faint attempt, wherein Gaucour was made Priſoner. At length, after a four months Blockade, Talbot became maſter of this important Place, the firſt Conqueſt of Henry V. After that, he cleared Normandy of the Garriſons, which the French ſtill kept in ſeveral Caſtles: So that nothing remained to them in that Province, but the Town of Dieppe only.

Diſpoſition of the Duke of Burgundy.

The Duke of Burgundy was concerned, that the affairs of the Engliſh began to be reſtored, and dreaded the conſequences. King Charles waged War very careleſsly, and could hardly be prevailed with to head his Army. Beſides, France was ſo ruined, that he could draw but few Succours from the Provinces he poſſeſſed. On the other hand, the War in Flanders, which wholly employed the Duke of Burgundy, afforded no hopes of any great aſſiſtance from thence. If the Engliſh had then exerted themſelves, probably, they would have recovered a great deal of ground. But, out of blindneſs, or inability, they made but faint efforts, contenting themſelves with ſending from time to time inconſiderable Supplies, which could not enable them to recover what they had loſt. Thus on both Sides, it was eaſily ſeen, that the War would be eternal, if it was to laſt till one of the two Kings had loſt, one after another, the Places he poſſeſſed. This 1439. consideration so affected the Duke of Burgundy, that he resolved, either to procure a Peace, if possible, between the two Kings, or secure himself by a Neutrality. Such a design was to be managed with great prudence and caution, for fear both Parties should agree to his prejudice, or the English grow more reserved, if they knew his Intention.

They begin to talk of Peace. Monstrelet. Du Tillet. Act. Pub. X. p. 683, &c. 707, 708.

Whilst the Duke of Burgundy was possessed with these thoughts, the Pope exhorted the two Kings, by the Cardinal of Santa Cruz, to put a stop to the effusion of Christian Blood shed in their Quarrel. At the same time, he writ to the Duke of Bretagne, desiring him to be Mediator of Peace. The Duke sending to both Kings, found them equally inclined to enter into Treaty, and the Duke of Burgundy received the proposal with Joy. The Duke of Orleans took this opportunity, to offer his Mediation to the King of England, jointly with the Duke of Bretagne; and to that end, renewed his instances for leave to confer with the Duke at Calais. This was granted him, though the Duke of Gloucester opposed it with all his power, because he plainly saw, that Prince could not be an impartial Mediator. But for some time past, the Duke of Gloucester had lost his interest in the Council, where it was even affected, upon all occasions, to proceed contrary to his opinion. Besides, the Counsellors were so desirous of Peace, that they forgot, or were willing to forget, that the false step taken in sending Ambassadors to Arras, was entirely owing to the vain hopes given the Duke of Orleans. So, the captive Prince was looked upon as a disinterested Mediator, though it was easy to perceive, he was entirely biassed in favour of King Charles. The Duke of Burgundy saw, with pleasure, the preparations for a Conference, which would either end in a Peace between the two Kings, or afford him a pretence, to conclude a separate Truce with England. The two Courts being thus disposed, Commissioners were appointed on both sides (1), to settle the preliminary Articles of the Congress. These Commissioners being met, judged, that in order to succeed in a negotiation of Peace, a Truce was absolutely necessary. Whereupon Henry impowered his to consent to it, but some obstacles occurred, which hindered the conclusion. What has been said concerning a Peace, was transacted in the foregoing year 1438. But I thought fit to defer speaking of it till now, that I might not interrupt the recital of what relates to this affair.

In the month of January, 1439, Isabella of Portugal, Duchess of Burgundy, and the Cardinal of Winchester, conferred together between Calais and Graveling. The result of their Conference was, that the two Kings should appoint a proper Place to treat of a Peace, with the mediation of the Dukes of Bretagne and Orleans, and should send their Plenipotentiaries thither. Pursuant to this agreement, the very Place where the Duchess and Cardinal were, was chosen, and Ambassadors were nominated on both sides (2). They were all chosen out of the Princes and greatest Lords of the two Kingdoms. But, before we proceed to the success of this Congress, it will not be amiss to see how the Council of England stood disposed, with regard to a Peace. Now this evidently appears in the Ambassadors instructions, extant in the Collection of the Publick Acts. Hence we shall be able to judge, which of the two Parties is to be blamed for breaking off the Conference, and rectify several mistakes of the Historians.

Instructions given to the English Ambassadors. Act. Pub. X. p. 724.

I. In the first place, the Ambassadors were ordered to demand, that the King's adversary should leave him in peaceable possession of the whole Realm of France. They were to support this demand with several reasons mentioned in the instructions, but too long to be inserted here. Besides, the Reader knows very well, on what the pretensions of the Kings of England were founded.

II. If the French should expostulate against this demand, and think it unreasonable, the Ambassadors, after a previous Protestation, were to offer Charles the Provinces beyond the Loire, which were of the King's Demesn, but on condition of Homage.

III. If the Adversaries refused this offer, the Cardinal of Winchester, as a Clergyman, was to inlarge on the considerations proper to perswade the two Nations to Peace. These considerations being many and long, I shall only relate the substance of the three principal. The first was, that the War undertaken for the Title of King of France, claimed by each of the two Kings, had destroyed more Men than were, at that present, in both Kingdoms. The second was, that the two Princes ought seriously to consider, that God made not the People for the Sovereign, but the Sovereign for the People; that is, to govern them with Justice and Peace, to the end the Subjects may be the better able to serve him. The third was, that France had not always been governed by one single Monarch, but, before and after Charlemain, there were often two, sometimes three, nay, four Kings at the same time. 1439.

IV. This last consideration was in order to proceed, in the fourth place, to another offer, which the Ambassadors had power to propose; namely, that Henry would resign to Charles all the Provinces beyond the Loire in full Sovereignty. He expresly reserved however Guienne, Poictou, and whatever was possessed by his Ancestors in France, before the Crown of England devolved to them.

V. If this was rejected, the Ambassadors had Power, to offer from the King their Master, that he would be satisfied with what his Ancestors enjoyed in France by right of Inheritance, provided Calais, Guisnes, and the adjacent Marches were added; the whole in full Sovereignty, without any dependance upon the Crown of France, or any Person whatever but God alone.

VI. If the French insisted, that Normandy should be restored to Charles, in the state it was in before the Conquest thereof by Henry V, that is, notwithstanding the Grants of several Lordships to private Persons, as well by the late as the present King, rather than break off the Conference this Article might be allowed.

VII. If Charles were brought to be satisfied with this offer, provided Henry would quit the Title of King of France, in that case, the Instructions furnished the Plenipotentiaries with many reasons and arguments to be alledged against that condition. But in short, they had Orders to leave this matter to the Cardinal of Winchester, to whom the King had made known his Pleasure.

It is manifest the Council had resolved to submit to this, if the Peace could not otherwise be made. For if Henry had absolutely refused to quit the Title of King of France, there was no secret to be kept, and the Instructions would have contained an expres Order to reject the Proposal.

The VIIIth Article was concerning the King's Marriage with one of Charles's Daughters.

IX. If the French rejected all these offers, and made any Proposals on their part, the Ambassadors, without accepting or refusing them, were to reply, that they had no instructions to treat of a Peace upon those Grounds, but would signify them to their Master.

X. Mean while, they were to propose, by the Duchess of Burgundy or the Duke of Orleans, a fifty years Truce, with a free Communication between the two Nations. They had likewise power to reduce the Truce to forty, thirty, or twenty years; and rather than fail, they might limit it from three years to eight, provided it was without Communication.

XI. In case the Truce was accepted, they were to represent, that for the better observance thereof, it would be proper to make an Exchange of some Places. To that end, they were ordered to offer Meaux, Creil, St. Germain in Laye, which were in the hands of the English when these Instructions were drawn, for Dieppe, le Mont St. Michel, and Harfleur, which Talbot had not yet taken.

XII. Lastly, the King willing to facilitate the Exchange of these Places, agreed to release the Duke of Orleans, for a Ransom of a hundred thousand Marks, and to abate fifty thousand, on account of the proposed Exchange.

These Instructions were drawn May the 21st, 1439. If we had likewise those of Charles's Plenipotentiaries, perhaps we should find, the two Kings were not at so great a distance from one another, as it seemed in the Conference. But as, on these occasions, the chief care of the managers is to be upon their guard, for fear their secret Instructions should be discovered, it often happens, that the Negotiation is broke off, before there is occasion to show all their Concessions; so apprehensive are they of giving their Adversaries any advantage. This was really the case in the present Treaty. The English did not think proper, to go beyond the second Article of their Instructions, namely, that Charles should have the Provinces beyond the Loire, on condition of Homage to Henry. They expected, the French would give them room by their offers to make some further advances. For the same reason, the French kept to the Proposals made at the Congress of Arras, to wit, that their Master remaining sole King of France, Monstrelet. Hall.

1439. would resign Guienne and Normandy to Henry, on condition of Homage. They laid great stress upon this offer, and on Charles's condescension, in being pleased to stand to what he had offered at the Congress of Arras, though he had since made great Conquests, and was become master of Paris.

The Conference breaks up. Hall.

It was almost impossible, for a Peace to be concluded on the Terms proposed on both Sides. Each Prince offered to resign only what was out of his power, and by virtue of this pretended Cession, expected the other should divest himself of what he actually possessed. This was properly, to desire to gain with the dash of a Pen, what they could not hope to obtain, without many successful Sieges and Battles. So, after the Ambassadors of the two Kings had long tried to discover, how far their Adversaries Instructions allowed them to advance, they parted without coming to any conclusion. Each was desirous to wait, till room was given to make more reasonable Proposals.

The Dukes of Burgundy and Orleans were the only gainers by this Congress. The first desired, at any rate, to ease his Subjects in Flanders, Brabant, Holland, Zealand, who were great sufferers by the Interruption of their Commerce with England. To this end, he employed his Duchess, who being a near relation of Henry, was not suspected by the English. Under colour of doing the Office of a Mediatrix between the two Kings, she had frequent Conferences with the Cardinal of Winchester, and negotiated a trading Truce between England and the Low-Countries. This appears in several Papers of the Collection of the Publick Acts. And indeed, this Truce was concluded presently after (1).

1440. The Temper of Henry and his Court.

But the Duke of Orleans reaped the most benefit from the late Congress, since it procured him his Liberty, after a twenty-five years Captivity. It has been frequently observed, that there were two Parties in the Court of England, namely, the Duke of Gloucester's and the Cardinal of Winchester's; and that the latter gradually prevailed, since the King began to take notice of his affairs. This Prince, now nineteen years old, had a very mean genius, and but little like his Father's. He easily suffered himself to be governed by those about him. Instead of having the Presumption very common to young Princes, he was ever distrustful of himself, and chose rather to follow the Counsels of others, than his own. With this weakness, he had Principles of Honour, Virtue and Religion, which indeed made him wish, he could always act justly, but often served for foundation and pretence to his Counsellors, to draw him into many Injustices. As he wanted penetration, he was deceived with appearances. Of this his Ministers knew how to take advantage, assured as they were of his incapacity to discern their self-interested Counsels. During his youth, he had contracted a habit of blindly following the suggestions of the Duke of Gloucester his Uncle, who governed in his Name. But when he was of a more advanced Age, the Cardinal of Winchester and his Party insinuated to him, that his Uncle intended to keep him always in Guardianship, and had designs destructive of his quiet. These discourses frequently repeated, produced at length the effect the Duke's Enemies expected. By degrees, the King had such an aversion for his Uncle, that he would no longer regard him. It was made a sort of rule to mortify him upon all occasions. His moving any thing in Council was sufficient to have it strongly opposed, and the King generally countenanced the contrary Party to the Duke, out of fear of giving him room to execute the pretended design of keeping him in Subjection. Such for some time had been the disposition of the King and Court.

The Duke of Gloucester is against releasing the Duke of Orleans,

The Duke of Gloucester had always opposed the Duke of Orleans's release. The late King his Brother's Will, was to him an inviolable Law. Besides, he was perswaded, the giving Orleans his Liberty, would only increase the number of the Enemies of England. But his opposition was of no great weight; it rather served to induce his Enemies to favour the Duke of Orleans, had there been no other reason. We have seen what this Prince offered before the Congress of Arras. The Duke of Bedford, and the Council, had accepted his offers, which seemed very advantagious, because their aim had not yet been discovered. After the Treaty of Arras, he perceived it was no proper time to sollicite his Liberty. But when he saw that they begun to talk of a Peace, he renewed his Instances, and offered to become joint Mediator with the Duke of Bretagne. He found in the Council the same favour as before, and in spite of the Duke of Gloucester's opposition, it was resolved to accept of his Mediation, and to treat with him afterwards concerning his Liberty. He had leave therefore to repair to the Congress, where he appeared very zealous to procure a Peace between the two Kings, and, by help of the Duchess of Burgundy, found means to be reconciled with the Duke her Husband. The Cardinal being returned into England, spoke very much to his advantage, and represented to the Council, that since it was not his fault, that the Peace was not concluded, it was unreasonable he should suffer by the Rupture. His Friends urged, on this occasion, the two reasons already made use of, to colour the favour that was intended him. The first was, that the Dissention between the Dukes of Orleans and Burgundy might rekindle, and turn very much to the advantage of the English. The second, that the captive Prince might pay a large Ransom, which would help to carry on the War. In a word, they intimated, that before his release, he would be obliged to take the Oath to the King, and thereby hindered from assisting King Charles. So, in spite of whatever the Duke of Gloucester could say, it was resolved to treat with him for his Liberty.

The Duke of Gloucester protests against the Resolution of the Council.

This resolution being taken, the Duke of Gloucester thought himself bound, both in duty, and for his own security, to make a formal Protestation, to show the Publick, that he had opposed it to the utmost of his power. The Protestation contained the reasons, why he believed the Council's resolution might be very prejudicial to the King and State. Though it be somewhat long, it will be necessary to insert the substance, because it may be of service in clearing several Facts. Besides, it shows the disposition of the Members of the Council, who, to mortify the Duke, scrupled not to sacrifice the King's interest to their Passion. This knowledge is the more requisite, as it will be seen in the sequel, that, to the fatal enmity between the Duke and the Cardinal, is to be ascribed the unfortunate success of the War in France. The Sum of the Duke's Protestation was as follows:

The Protestation. Ib. p. 764.

" My first reason for opposing the Duke of Orleans's " release, is taken from the known incapacity of King " Charles, and the Dauphin his Son. Therefore, con- " sidering the great subtlety, and cautelous disposition of " the Duke of Orleans, with his extensive knowledge, " it is to be presumed, the States of France will entrust " him with the Administration of the affairs of the " Kingdom. Now, nothing can happen more preju- " dicial to England, since that Prince is perfectly ac- " quainted with the strong and weak side of the King- " dom, during a twenty-five years residence.

" II. The dissention between King Charles and the " Dauphin his Son being no secret, it ought to be feared, " as it is but too probable, that the Duke of Orleans, " when in France, will be a proper Mediator, to pro- " cure their Reconciliation.

" III. Normandy being the Province which contributes " most towards carrying on the War, it is to be feared, " the Normans, seeing the Succours, so often promised " both by word of mouth and Letter, not sent, and, " on the other hand, the Duke of Orleans released, will " imagine they are designed to be abandoned, as well as " the rest of the Conquests. As to its being said, that " twenty thousand Marks may be taken out of the Duke " of Orleans's Ransom, for the defence of that Province, " I leave it be considered, whether that Sum is suffi- " cient for that purpose.

" IV. The King and Council are very sensible, the " Duke of Orleans acknowledges King Charles for his " Sovereign. Let it be considered then, whether having " taken two opposite Oaths, the one to a Prince whom " he looks upon as a Foreigner, the other to him whom " he believes to be his lawful King, he will choose to " keep the first rather than the last. This is the more " improbable, as he will always consider the first as ex- " torted, whilst he was actually a Prisoner, and moreover " cannot stand to this Ingagement, without forfeiting his " Possessions in France.

" V. It would be proper to see what Security may be " taken, in case he breaks his Oath, under colour of o- " beying the absolute Command of his Sovereign.

" VI. The Earl of Huntington, who commands in " Guienne, will probably be obliged to quit his Govern-

The Commons also granted, That all Aliens within the Realm, who were not Denizens, should pay to the King Sixteen-pence, if they were Housholders; and if not, then but Six-pence. Cotton's Abridg. p. 621, 622. In this Parliament it was enacted, That no Person should be made a Justice of Peace, in any County, who had not Lands and Tenements, to the value of twenty Pounds; but this not to extend to Cities, Towns, or Burroughs. The ground assigned for this Statute, is, that some Persons had been of late appointed Justices, who, on account of their small Behaviour, could not govern or rule the People; and others, by reason of their necessity, committed great Extortions and Oppressions ----It was also enacted, That no Captain should abate of his Soldiers Wages, upon pain of twenty Pounds for every Spear, and ten Pounds for a Bow, to be paid to the King. Statutes 18 Henry VI. c. 11, 18.

" will be defended, in caſe the Duke of Orleans joins

" ther's Conqueſts, but by ſetting at Liberty one of his " mortal Enemies?

" VIII. The late Reconciliation between the Dukes of " Orleans and Burgundy at Calais, ought to create a
" dread, of their joining Forces to drive the Engliſh out of " France, (as they certainly may do, unleſs God inter-
" poſes,) inſtead of expecting any Advantage by their
" Diſſention. If any ſtreſs is laid upon the Oath to be " taken by the Duke of Orleans, before he leaves Eng-

" exchanged for the Duke of Orleans alone. But in caſe
" that Prince is releaſed, the Engliſh Princes and Lords " cannot fight for the King, without being liable to utter " ruin.

" X. If, as it is likely, the releaſe of the Duke of " Orleans occaſions the loſs of Normandy, and the reſt
" of the King's Dominions in France, what will the " King's Counſellors be able to ſay for themſelves?
" What Murmurings will there be among the People,
" when it ſhall be conſidered, that theſe Conqueſts, pur-
" chaſed with the Lives of the late King, the Duke of
" Clarence, the Duke of Bedford, and an infinite Num" ber of Princes, Lords, and Gentlemen, ſhall have been
" all loſt by this fatal Counſel?

" XI. Laſtly, every one knows, the late King,
" wiſely weighing the danger which would ariſe from
" the Enlargement of the Duke of Orleans, forbid upon " his Death-bed, to releaſe that Prince till a Peace was " concluded.

" And, as poſſibly, after my death, I may be accuſed
" of conſenting to this reſolution, I humbly intreat the

" ſerve for my Juſtification."

The Council perſiſts in their Reſolution. Act. Pub. X. p. 756, &c.

The Duke of Gloceſter's requeſt was granted, but his Proteſtation did not hinder the Execution of the Council's Reſolution. The 2d of July the Agreement for the Duke of Orleans's releaſe was ſigned by the King and the Duke, in two Originals, extant in the Collection of the Publick Acts.

Articles with the Duke of Orleans. Ib. p. 756, &c.

The Terms required of the Duke were much eaſier, than thoſe offered by himſelf before the Congreſs of Arras. He was not bound to acknowledge Henry for King of France, or to ſwear to him, much leſs to give him any Towns in Hoſtage, as he had formerly offered. Only his Word and Oath were taken for the payment of his Ranſom, ſet at a hundred and twenty thouſand Crowns. It is true, by this Agreement he ingaged to give Obligations from the Dauphin, the Duke of Bretagne, and ſome others, for the Sum of ſixty thouſand Crowns, which he was not to pay till after his Liberty. Moreover, he promiſed to procure the King's Letters Patents from King Charles, authoriſing the Agreement, and promiſing not to hinder the Execution, and to account the Duke of Orleans baſe and infamous, if he violated the Articles. Finally, the Duke proteſting, that as for the half of his Ranſom, which he was to pay before he left England, it was impoſſible for him to perform his Engagement, without going to France, leave was granted him for a year.

He is ſet at Liberty. Monſtrelet. Hall. Act. Pub. X. p. 812-829.

The Council conſiſted then of Perſons who blindly followed their Paſſion, without regarding the Intereſts of the King and State. Of this we ſhall quickly ſee very evident Proofs. The only thing that gave them any uneaſineſs, was, that the enlargement of the Duke of Orleans, ſeemed directly contrary to the late King's Will. For, that Monarch had expreſsly enjoined by his laſt Will and Teſtament, that the Duke of Orleans ſhould be kept Priſoner, till the King his Son was of Age, unleſs his Liberty ſhould be a means to procure a Peace; but they found an Expedient to ſcreen themſelves from the murmurs of the People. The King declared by a publick Act, that in releaſing the Duke of Orleans, he meant not to contradict his Father's Will, but only to attain to a ſpeedier Concluſion of a Peace. To ſhow more plainly, p. 779. this was the King's Intention, the Duke was bound by freſh Articles, to uſe his utmoſt Endeavours, to procure a Peace between the two Kings; and in caſe he ſucceeded, his Ranſom was to be forgiven, and what he ſhould have paid, to be reſtored. But if, on the contrary, his Endeavours proved fruitleſs, he was to return into England, and remain a Priſoner as before, but the Money advanced towards his Ranſom, to be repaid. It is evident, theſe new Articles were only to throw duſt in the People's Eyes, ſince they were directly contrary to the others, and a Condition was added, not in the Duke's Power. In the next place, this appears ſtill plainer, in that, the Peace not being concluded, the Duke did not return into England, nor was ever called upon. But he punctually performed the firſt Agreement.

Remarks upon a miſtake of the French Hiſtorians. Act. Pub. X. p. 787. Ib. p. 791.

All the French Authors have done the Duke of Burgundy the Honour to ſay, that he lent the Duke of Orleans Money to pay his Ranſom; but we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that all he did in favour of his newly reconciled Enemy, amounted to no more than this. He conſented, that his Ducheſs ſhould promiſe in her own Name, to ſend the King the Obligation for thirty thouſand Crowns, which the Dauphin was to give, or, in caſe of refuſal, to become reſponſible. But as the Dauphin made p. 794. no ſcruple to give his Obligation, the Ducheſs of Burgundy's Promiſe became of no uſe. It is true, the Duke of Burgundy magnificently received the Duke of Orleans at Graveling where they confirmed their Reconciliation. I have dwelt the longer upon the Duke of Orleans's releaſe, becauſe it diſcovers the diſpoſition of the Court and Council, on which depend all the future Events of this Reign. Let us return now to the general Affairs. Monſtrelet.

Conventions between Henry and the Duke of Bretagne.

The Duke of Bretagne pretended all along to obſerve a Neutrality, though the Succours brought by the Conſtable his Brother, from time to time, to King Charles, could neither be levied in his Country, nor led from thence without his leave or connivance. If the Engliſh had been in better Circumſtances, they would doubtleſs have ſhewn their Reſentment; but in the preſent ſituation of their Affairs, they thought it no ſmall Advantage, that the Duke of Bretagne did not openly declare for their Enemies. Mean while, as the Engliſh and the Bretons annoyed one another at Sea, contrary to the Intereſt of both Nations, the King and the Duke thought fit to conclude a Treaty, mutually promiſing, not to ſuffer any naval Armaments to be made in their Ports, to the detriment of each other's Subjects. Act. Pub. X. p. 719, 789, 803.

Death of the Earl of Warwick. p. 786. Succeeded by the Duke of York. Hall.

Richard de Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, and Regent of France, dying in the beginning of the Summer, the Duke of York was ſent thither again in that quality (1), though he had been recalled, to give place to the Earl of Warwick (2).

Quarrels in Charles's Court. P. Daniel. J. Chartier. Monſtrelet.

If the Engliſh had been ſtrong enough in France to improve the preſent opportunity, never had a fairer offered to repair their paſt Loſſes. The Dauphin, and all the Princes of the Blood, except the Duke of Burgundy, and the Earl of Eu, were joined in a League againſt the King. This League tended to no leſs than to dethrone him, and ſet the Crown on the head of the Prince his Son. But happily for him, the Confederates had engaged La Trimouille in their Party, and thereby entirely loſt the Conſtable. As he mortally hated that Lord, his hatred extended to the whole Party, and induced him to bring the King a powerful Aid, which enabled him to give Law to the Princes. This Civil War was called La Praguerie, but for what reaſon I know not (3). The League was ſo ill managed on the part of the Confederates, that the King at length compelled them to implore his Mercy. Mean time, the Engliſh, who carried on the War very faintly, made ſome Incurſions about Paris. But the Baſtard of Orleans, who after ſiding firſt with the Dauphin, was returned to the King, ſtopped their Progreſs, which was not very conſiderable, by reaſon of their weakneſs.

(2) He died at Roan in Normandy, April 30. 1439, poſſeſſed of a vaſt Eſtate; the yearly value (as appears from the account of his Bailiffs in 12 Henry VI.) amounting to eight thouſand three hundred and ſix Marks, eleven Shillings and Eleven-pence Half-penny: At a time when Barley was but four Shillings and Two-pence a Quarter; Oats two Shillings and three Half-pence; Capons Three pence a-piece, and Hens three Half-pence, as appears from the accounts of his Houſhold Officers. He was buried firſt in the Collegiate Church of our Lady, at Warwick, by his noble Anceſtors; and afterwards removed into a magnificent Chapel, built by his Executors, according to the direction of his laſt Will: Wherein his Portraiture of Copper gilt, hooped over with Copper-Staves, is ſtill to be ſeen. Dugdale's Baron. Vol. 1. p. 246; and Warwickſhire, Vol. 1. p. 410. Stow's Ann. p. 378.

Act. Pub. X. p. 808, 810, 844, 847.

Mean while, the Ducheſs of Burgundy never ceaſed her Endeavours to renew the Conferences for a Peace. At length, after labouring the whole Year to accompliſh this Project, ſhe prevailed with the two Kings, to appoint Plenipotentiaries to meet at St. Omer. The Duke of Orleans was choſen to be one of the Mediators.

1441. A new Congreſs about a Peace. Ib. p. 827. XI. p. 13.

This new Congreſs had no better Succeſs than the former. The Ambaſſadors were now all at St. Omer; but the Earl of Vendôme, Head of the French Embaſſy, refuſed to treat with thoſe of England, on pretence of their inferior Quality. They were however Peers of the Realm, namely, the Biſhop of Rocheſter, and the Lord Fanhope (1). In the Reign of Henry V, the French did not ſtand upon ſuch Punctilio's. They readily conferred with bare Doctors in Law, provided they were duly impowered. It is true, the Ambaſſadors for this Congreſs were not of ſo high a Character as the former. But as there was no likelihood, the French would be more moderate in their Demands, the Council did not think proper to put the King, or the Princes, or any of the moſt conſiderable Lords, to a needleſs Expence. However, Charles took occaſion from thence, to revoke the Powers given to his Ambaſſadors. Thus the Congreſs broke off without being ever opened. The French blamed the Engliſh, pretending the Court of England had deſignedly choſen Perſons of no Birth or Note, that they might not be treated with. The Truth is, both Parties generally aimed only at amuſing each other by theſe Conferences. They both gueſſed what their Adverſaries were to demand, and, as they were reſolved not to grant it, could expect no great Benefit from theſe Negotiations. They conſented to them however, as well to juſtify themſelves to the Publick, as to try to amuſe each other with the hopes of a Peace.

To no purpoſe.

Charles takes Creil. Monſtrelet.

Whilſt the Ambaſſadors were repairing to St. Omer, Charles was aſſembling an Army to make a powerful Effort, and take advantage of the Indolence of the Engliſh. As ſoon as he was ready, he ordered Admiral de Coitivy to inveſt Creil upon Oyſe, with a Detachment of the Army. The Conſtable joining him, with the reſt of his Troops, the Siege was regularly formed, and the King came about the end of April, to receive the Town by Capitulation (2).

He lays Siege to Pontoiſe. Monſtrelet.

This was only a Preparative to a more conſiderable Undertaking, namely, the Siege of Pontoiſe, which Charles formed, the beginning of July (3), with an Army of twelve thouſand Men. He had with him the Dauphin his Son, and all the Generals and Officers of Note in France. This Siege was at firſt carried on very vigorouſly, but the Beſiegers ſhowed no leſs Bravery. Talbot, whom the moſt difficult Enterprizes could not diſcourage, being commiſſioned by the Duke of York to introduce a Convoy into the Town, attacked one of the Enemy's Quarters (4), and forming it, ſent in his Convoy. This ſeaſonable relief inſpired the Garriſon with freſh Courage, who made ſo brave a Defence, that the Siege proceeded but ſlowly. Though the Beſiegers were exceeding watchful, having to deal with ſo experienced a Warrior as Talbot, they could not hinder him from throwing Succours into the Town, three ſeveral times. However, Charles obſtinately reſolved to continue the Siege, undertaken at the Inſtance of the Pariſians, who defrayed all the Charges. But at length, the Duke of York, receiving from England a Reinforcement (5), which increaſed his Army to twelve thouſand Men, approached the Town (6), and ſent a Herald to the King to offer him Battle. Charles anſwered, he ſhould ſee what was to be done, and meant not to regulate his Time, by that of his Enemies. He ſaw the Engliſh Army on the other Side the Oyſe, which they could paſs only by a Bridge, guarded by a Detachment of a thouſand Men. So, without any Apprehenſion of a ſudden Attack, he leiſurely continued the Siege. Mean while, the Duke of York, reſolving at any rate to relieve the Place, found means to paſs, in the Night, five or ſix hundred Men, in Boats of boiled Skins. This Detachment ſuddenly falling upon the Guard of the Bridge, and cutting them in pieces, opened a Paſſage for the Duke, who immediately came on the other Side with his whole Army. Charles was ſo aſtoniſhed at this unexpected Action, that he ſuddenly raiſed the Siege, and retired under the Canon of Poiſſi. The Duke of York followed him, and offered him Battle in vain. At laſt, after braving him for ſome time, and plundering before his Face, the Abby of Poiſſi (7), he retired, not thinking proper to attack him in that Poſt.

The Duke of York raiſes the Siege. Monſtrelet. Stow.

The haſty Retreat of King Charles, before an Enemy much weaker than himſelf, was extremely injurious to his Reputation. All the French loudly murmured, but the Pariſians more than all the reſt. The King's beſt Friends were all diſmayed, and openly ſhewed their fear, that ſo general a Diſcontent would prove fatal to him. In ſhort, thoſe neareſt his Perſon, intimating to him, how he had expoſed his Reputation, by ſo inglorious an Action, he reſolved to retrieve his Credit, let what would be the Conſequence. So, when leaſt expected, he returned before Pontoiſe (8), and carried it by Storm (9). He ſo ſignalized himſelf in the Aſſault, that all the ill Impreſſions cauſed, by his former Conduct, to his Diſadvantage, were effaced. He was ſeen on the Breach, Sword in Hand, fighting with an undaunted Courage, and expoſing his Perſon like a common Soldier. By this vigorous Action, he plainly diſcovered, if he delighted not in War, it was not ſo much for want of Courage, as from a too great Attachment to his Pleaſures. Some time after, the Town of Evreux was taken from the Engliſh, by the help of a Fiſherman, who found means to introduce the French.

J. Chartier. Hall.

Whilſt theſe Things paſſed in France, a very ſtrange Spectacle attracted the Eyes and Attention of the People of England. I have frequently obſerved, that the Duke of Glocester's Credit ſenſibly declined, or rather, was entirely ſunk. Of this was ſeen a notable Proof in the Courſe of the preſent Year. This Prince was unblameable in his Conduct, with regard to the King. Whatever Spies were placed about him by his Enemies, they could diſcover nothing that might ſerve for a Pretence to the leaſt Charge againſt his Perſon. But at length, by narrowly obſerving what paſſed in his Family, they learnt, that his Ducheſs had frequent Conferences with [one Sir Roger Bolinbroke] a Prieſt, who was reckoned a Necromancer, and a certain Woman (10), who was counted a Witch. This was ſufficient to form a Charge of High-Treaſon againſt her. She was accuſed of making, with theſe two Perſons, the King's Image in Wax; and that, placing it before a gentle Fire, ſhe intended, the King's Strength ſhould waſte inſenſibly, as the Wax melted, and his Life be at an End, when the Image was all diſſolved. By this Accuſation, it was intended to ſhow, the Ducheſs's deſign was to deſtroy the King, that the Crown might fall to the Duke her Husband. At the ſame time, Suſpicions were inſtilled into the Duke himſelf. When the Parties accuſed were examined, the Prieſt denied all; but the Ducheſs confeſſed (11), ſhe had deſired the Woman to make her a Love-Potion for her Spouſe, who ſometimes went aſtray. Though this Confeſſion did not make her guilty of the Crime ſhe was accuſed of, the Duke's Enemies had taken ſuch meaſures, that the Prieſt was condemned to be hanged, and the Woman to be burnt. As for the Ducheſs, though ſhe would have been the moſt guilty, had the Thing been well proved; out of a pretended regard to the Duke, ſhe was only condemned to do publick Penance (12) in St. Paul's Church, and to be impriſoned for Life (13). This was a terrible Mortification to the firſt Prince of the Blood, who had been Protector of the Realm, and always ſhown an ardent Zeal for the King's Intereſt and Honour. But his Enemies were ſo powerful, that he was forced to be ſilent, for fear of giving them occaſion to fall directly upon his Perſon.

New League againſt King Charles. P. Daniel. Monſtrelet.

Charles had ſcarce taken any Repoſe, after the Siege of Pontoiſe, before he ſaw himſelf extremely embaraſſed. All the Princes of his Houſe were in a freſh League againſt him, with the Duke of Orleans at their Head. This Prince was highly offended at the King's cold Reception, after a

Probably, this League would have entirely ruined the King's Affairs, if, by a fortunate Advice, he had not gained the Head by conſiderable Favours. The Duke of Orleans's Deſection breaking all the Confederates Meaſures, they were forced to throw themſelves upon the King's Mercy. Thus ended the League, and thus end generally all Leagues of Subjects againſt their Sovereigns, when the Sovereigns find means to content the Leaders.

Tartas beſieged by the Engliſh. Monſtrelet. J. Chartier. Hall.

The Rebellion of the Princes was not the only thing that made King Charles uneaſy. His Honour as well as Intereſt called upon him to relieve Tartas, a Town of Guienne beſieged by the Engliſh. This Place belonged to the Houſe of Albret, which had long been ſerviceable to France by their Diverſions in Guienne. It therefore greatly concerned the King to ſuccour this Houſe, which was in danger of loſing their moſt conſiderable Place. Otherwiſe it was to be feared, all the Lords of Guienne of his Party, would leave him and turn to the King of England. Mean time, the League of the Princes having hindered him, from thinking ſooner of relieving Tartas, he began not his March to Guienne till November. The Town ſtill defended itſelf, and it was even January before the Garriſon capitulated, upon a Condition which afforded the King more than ſufficient time to prepare for their Relief. The Capitulation ran, that the Town ſhould be delivered to the Lords Cognac and Saint Par, for the Engliſh, if on the 24th of June next, there appeared not a French Army ſtrong enough to give Battle. But if it was relieved on the Day prefixed, it ſhould be reſtored to the Lord d' Albret.

The Town capitulates to ſurrender, if not relieved in ſix Months.

1442. Charles advances towards Guienne. Monſtrelet.

Charles having all the leiſure neceſſary to prepare, ſpent the Winter in Poictou, where he aſſembled a conſiderable Army, conſiſting of four hundred Lances, eight thouſand Croſs-Bow-Men, and as many Archers. All the Lords of the Kingdom repairing to him, he counted one hundred and ſixty Banners in his Army (1). Mean time England made no effort to defend Guienne, or give the Enemy a Diverſion elſewhere. The Council, ſince it was no longer influenced by the Duke of Gloceſter, ſeemed to be grown inconſiderate and thoughtleſs.

With the Forces aſſembled by Charles in Poictou, he humbled ſome tyrannical Lords of that Country, and from thence came to Limoges, where he made ſome Stay. After that, he paſſed ſome time at Montauban. There he loſt the brave La Hire or Vignoles, one of his beſt Generals. The Relief of Tartas was not the ſole Motive of his Journey. There was another, which touched him more nearly, and that was, to become Maſter of the Earldom of Cominge, which he had claimed by virtue of a Settlement in his favour. As this Affair has ſome relation to thoſe of England, it will be neceſſary to ſhow the Ground of his Pretenſions.

Death of La Hire. Monſtrelet. P. Daniel.

Charles's Claim to the Earldom of Cominge. P. Daniel.

Margaret, Heireſs of Cominge, had two Daughters by her firſt Husband John III, Earl of Armagnac, who died in 1391; and the two Daughters died likewiſe ſoon after. The Counteſs was married afterwards to John d' Armagnac Earl of Fezenſaquet. But by an Outrage unheard of in France, ſhe divorced her ſecond Husband, who died with Grief in 1404. Then ſhe eſpouſed Matthew de Grailley Brother of John Earl of Foix, and by him had a Daughter, but of ſo weak a Conſtitution, that Matthew her Father was afraid, the Death of the Mother and Daughter would deprive him of the Earldom of Cominge, of which he was in poſſeſſion. For this reaſon, he preſſed his Counteſs, who was much older than himſelf, to make a Will, and ſettle it upon him after their Daughter. But the Counteſs refuſed it. Margaret's Obſtinacy occaſioned ſuch a Quarrel between her and her Husband, that he reſolved to diſpoſſeſs her, with the help of the Earl of Armagnac, who was very ready to join in the Project, on condition of going ſhares with him. Whereupon the Earl of Armagnac attacked, vanquiſhed, took the Counteſs Priſoner, and with her Husband's Conſent confined her in a Caſtle, where ſhe remained twenty two Years. This rigorous Uſage ſerved only to exaſperate the old Counteſs the more. At laſt in 1435 ſhe found means in her Confinement to make a Will, where ſhe nominated her Daughter Jane for her Heir, and after her ſettled the Earldom upon King Charles VII. Jane dying ſome time after, Charles heard of this Settlement, and as the Counteſs was ſtill living, formed a Deſign to free her from Impriſonment, and cauſe her to confirm her Will. After he had made ſome ſtay at Montauban, he came to Toulouſe, and ordered the Earls of Armagnac and Cominge to be ſummoned before the Parliament of that City. The two Earls made their Appearance, not daring to reſiſt a Prince ſo well armed, who was able to compel them. Beſides, ſince the Earl of Armagnac's Anceſtors had voluntarily owned the Kings of France for their Sovereigns, there was no room to decline the Juriſdiction of their Parliaments. He was forced therefore to bring the old captive Counteſs, now fourſcore Years of Age, to Toulouſe, where the Parliament decreed the Settlement upon the King to be good and valid. Purſuant to this Decree, the King took poſſeſſion of the Earldom of Cominge. But for the ſake of Gaſton Earl of Foix, who had ſucceeded his Father John in 1437, he was pleaſed to conſent, that Matthew his Uncle ſhould enjoy his Part of the Earldom during Life. The Earl of Armagnac was treated more rigorouſly. The King not only diſpoſſeſſed him of the Part he had uſurped, but ſtripped him of the Privilege of the Regale (2) in his Territories, and forbid him to ſtile himſelf, John by the Grace of God, Earl of Armagnac, as he, and his Anceſtors before him, had done.

Cominge adjudged to the King.

The Earls of Armagnac and Cominge cited before the Parliament of Toulouſe.

The Earl of Armagnac did not think he deſerved ſuch Uſage, after all the Services his Houſe had done the Kings of France. If, to eſpouſe their Intereſts, his Anceſtors had caſt off the Dominion of the Kings of England, he would not have been liable to appear before the Parliament of Toulouſe, nor have loſt the Privileges, which the Kings of England, Dukes of Guienne, had never diſputed with his Predeceſſors. So, he was extremely concerned to ſee the Zeal of his Anceſtors for the Intereſt of France, become the occaſion of his Oppreſſion. He burned with Deſire to free himſelf from this Yoke and be revenged: But as he was ſenſible, his Forces alone were not capable to procure him that Satisfaction, he reſolved to caſt himſelf into the Arms of the King of England. Shortly after, he ſent to deſire his Protection, with an Offer of one of his Daughters in Marriage. The Propoſal being conſidered in the Council, it was judged, that in the preſent Poſture of the King's Affairs in France, the Alliance propoſed by the Earl of Armagnac could not but be very advantagious. So, without Loſs of time, Ambaſſadors (3) were diſpatched to the Earl of Armagnac, to ſettle the Marriage-Articles, and affiance one of his Daughters, in the King's Name.

Mean while, Charles appearing before Tartas, on the 24th of June, and no Enemy offering to give him Battle, the Place was reſtored to the Lord d' Albret, according to the Capitulation. The Preparations of the French were not unknown in England, and yet no meaſures were taken for the Defence of Guienne, which was going to be invaded. Charles taking advantage of this Negligence, became Maſter of St. Sever (4). Then he laid Siege to Acs, one of the ſtrongeſt Places in thoſe parts, which held out ſeven Weeks (5). La Reole was carried by Storm, and Marmande fell likewiſe into the hands of the French. During the Winter following, which was exceeding ſharp, Acs and St. Sever opened their Gates to the Engliſh, but the Earl of Foix retook St. Sever. Charles paſſed the whole Winter at Toulouſe.

Charles relieves Tartas, and takes ſeveral Places in Guienne. Monſtrelet. Hall.

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting at one end of the Kingdom, the Engliſh were thinking of making a Diverſion at the other. They ſhould have thought of it ſooner, in order to hinder Charles's March into Guienne. By that means, they would have infallibly preſerved the Places lately loſt. But however, Orders being given to raiſe five thouſand Men in England, the Command was conferred on Talbot, whom the King had now created Earl of Shrewsbury (6). Talbot landing in Normandy, ſoon made the Baſtard of Orleans quit the Field, who had likewiſe a new Title, being made Earl of Dunois. He preſently beſieged the Caſtle of Conches, and to make a Diverſion, the French General inveſted Galardon. Talbot having taken the Caſtle in a few Days, the Earl of Dunois did not think fit to expect his Enemy, who was marching directly to give him Battle. Then, the Earl of Shrewsbury advanced towards Dieppe, a Place of great Importance, which the French ſtill held in Normandy. He made ſuch haſte, that Eſtouteville, who was marching with the utmoſt Diligence, to throw in a Supply of Troops, could not arrive in time. When he was before the Place, he formed the Siege, tho' with an Army little proportionable to ſuch an Undertaking, and eſpecially in November. Indeed, he did not expect to be Maſter of the Town during the Winter, and without more Forces. But his Deſign was to take the Fort of Charles-Meſnil, ſituated on Mount Polet, which defended the Paſſage to Dieppe. After that he hoped to preſs it ſo cloſely, that it ſhould be forced to ſurrender. Having thus taken his Meaſures, he attacked and carried the Fort, which he ordered to be made larger and ſtronger. The Duke of Gloceſter accuſes the Cardinal of Wincheſter. Hall.

As Matters then ſtood at Court, it was no very proper Seaſon for the Earl of Shrewsbury to obtain the Succours he deſired, at leaſt ſo ſoon as was neceſſary. The Duke of Gloceſter perceiving the King's Affairs daily declined, brought at this very time before the Council, an Accuſation of High-Treaſon, againſt the Cardinal of Wincheſter. Probably, his Enmity to that Prelate made him think, he was the ſole Occaſion of all the Misfortunes, befallen the Engliſh. It may be, he only deſigned to clear himſelf to the Publick, by accuſing his Enemy. And indeed, ſo well acquainted, as he doubtleſs was, with the Members of the Council, he could not flatter himſelf, with the leaſt hopes of ſucceeding in an Affair of that Nature. However this be, the Charge conſiſted of fourteen Articles, the Subſtance whereof, was as follows:

Articles of Accuſation. Hall. fol. 143.

I. That the Biſhop of Wincheſter had taken upon him the Dignity of Cardinal, contrary to the late King's Orders, and in derogation to the Metropolitan Church of Canterbury.

II. That, by the Statute of Proviſors, having forfeited the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter, he had procured the Pope's Bull to ſecure it, contrary to the Laws of the Realm, and particularly to the Statute of Præmunire.

III. That jointly with John Kemp Archbiſhop of York, he had aſſumed the Government of the King's Perſon, without being authorized.

IV. That he had defrauded the King of his Jewels.

This Article was grounded upon the Cardinal's lending the King Money upon Pawn (3).

V. That being Chancellor of the Kingdom, he had ſealed an Order for the Releaſe of the King of Scotland, and another to forgive that Prince part of his Ranſom, on condition of marrying his Niece.

VI. That he had defrauded the King of his Revenues, by applying to his own Uſe, the Cuſtoms of Wools at the Port of Southampton.

Probably, the Cardinal ſtopped by that Means the Money, he had lent the King.

VII. That he had the Confidence to ſummon People before him, in derogation of the Prerogatives of the Crown, and the Authority Royal.

He did this probably, as Legate: But he could not do it according to Law, without the King's Licence.

VIII. That he had procured from Rome, an Exemption for his Dioceſe, from paying Tenths to the King; and thereby, given a pernicious Example to the reſt of the Biſhops.

IX. That he had been inſtrumental in reconciling the Duke of Burgundy, to King Charles and the Duke of Orleans, to the great prejudice of England.

X. That being the King's Ambaſſador and Plenipotentiary to treat of a Peace, he had ſent the Archbiſhop of York to the King, to perſuade him to quit the Title of King of France, to the Diſhonour of the King, and his illuſtrious Anceſtors.

XI. That the Duke of Orleans's Releaſe, had been procured by his, and the Duke of York's Intrigues, contrary to the expreſs Order of the late King.

XII. That being Chancellor, he had himſelf purchaſed Crown-Lands, inſtead of preventing ſuch Alienations, according to the Duty of his Office.

XIII. That by commiſſioning ſuch Officers only in the Army, as were his Creatures, he had been the Cauſe of all the Loſſes ſuſtained in France.

XIV. That he had ſold Captains Commiſſions, and thereby, introduced into the King's Service, ſuch as were incapable of doing their Duty.

The Cardinal is acquitted.

Theſe Accuſations were read in Council. But the Council, for ſome time, had conſiſted only of the Cardinal's Creatures, and the Duke of Gloceſter's Enemies. So, under colour of being unwilling to meddle with the Prerogative Royal, the Pardon granted to the Cardinal, in 1437, was urged. The Duke of Gloceſter, perceiving there was no poſſibility of cauſing his Enemy to be condemned, dropped the Proſecution, and the King gave the Cardinal a freſh Pardon. 1442. Act. Pub. XI. p. 20.

The Duke of Gloceſter loſes ground daily.

Certainly the Duke of Gloceſter was in a ſad Situation. Beſides his Vexation, to ſee thoſe who were at the Helm, ſteering a Courſe, directly contrary to that marked out by the glorious Henry V, his Brother, he perceived there was a ſettled Deſign to mortify him on all Occaſions. The King his Nephew, who was ſo much obliged to him, ſuffered himſelf to be miſled by the Artifices of his Enemies; not having penetration enough to diſcern thoſe, who had only their own Intereſt in View. He was made to conſider his Uncle as a ſecret Enemy, that would rejoice at his Deſtruction, becauſe he was his next Heir. What is more, they inſpired him with ſtrong Suſpicions of him, by repreſenting him as a Counſelior, whoſe Intereſt it was to ingage him in wrong Courſes, in order to render him contemptible and odious to his Subjects, and thereby, pave his own way to the Crown. It is no wonder, a young Prince of ſo mean a Genius as Henry, ſhould be blinded by ſuch Inſinuations. He had none about his Perſon to undeceive him, and for ſome time, had ſeen only his Uncles's Enemies. The Cardinal was ever watchful not to ſuffer any Perſon at Court, or in the Council, but what was devoted to him; and this he made his chief Buſineſs. He it was, that had introduced to Court, the Earl of Suffolk (4), for whom, the King had conceived ſo ſtrong an Affection, that he ſaw nothing but with his Eyes, and did nothing but by his Advice. As the new Favorite wholly owed his fortune to the Cardinal, he miſſed no opportunity to inſinuate to his Maſter, that of all his Subjects, the Cardinal was moſt ſafely to be truſted. By this means, he daily ſunk the Duke of Gloceſter's Credit, whoſe Counſels were always directly contrary to thoſe of his Enemy. John Kemp Archbiſhop of York and Cardinal (5), was alſo a Counſellor entirely devoted to the Cardinal of Wincheſter, and his Inſtrument to confirm the King in his Suſpicions of the Duke of Gloceſter. Thus theſe three Miniſters, being ſtrictly united together, ſo ordered it, that the King daily gave his Uncle ſome freſh Mortification. On the other hand, the haughty and impatient Temper of the Duke of Gloceſter, not ſuffering him to bear Indignities, without complaining and threatening the Authors, he promoted his own downfal, by the continual Faults his impatience cauſed him to commit.

They prejudice the King againſt him.

1443. Truce between England and Burgundy. Monſtrelet. Act. Pub. XI, p. 24.

The Year 1443, began with a private Negotiation between the King and the Duke of Burgundy. The Duke finding the Affairs of the two Kings to be in ſuch a way, as not likely to be decided, either by War or Peace, thought it adviſeable to ſecure himſelf, by a ſeparate Truce with England. He was not pleaſed with King Charles upon ſeveral Accounts, too tedious to be related. On the contrary, he had reaſon to fear, Charles was reconciled to him only out of Policy; and in caſe his Affairs ſhould once be reſtored, might reſume his old Enmity againſt him. For this cauſe chiefly, he judged it againſt his Intereſt, to aſſiſt him any longer to finiſh a War, the proſperous Iſſue whereof might render him too powerful. Theſe Conſiderations induced him to give his Ducheſs full Power, to conclude with the King of England a general Truce, for all their reſpective Dominions. The former concerned only the Trade between England, and the Low-Countries; but this, ſigned the 23d of April, included Burgundy, and all the Duke's Territories in general. It was to laſt till one of the Parties ſhould put an end to it; in which Caſe, the other was to have three Months notice.

1443. danger, if not relieved before the Arrival of the Engliſh Troops, reſolved at laſt to ſend the Dauphin his Son, who preſſed him to commit this Expedition to his care. It was however with unwillingneſs, that he granted him this Favor. He was not only afraid to truſt out of his Sight this young Prince, who had ſeveral Times given Proofs of a turbulent Spirit, but moreover, did not care to afford him opportunities of acquiring Glory. Theſe Conſiderations, however, gave place to the Neceſſity of relieving Dieppe, which was reduced to Extremity, by an eight Months Blockade. The Dauphin departed from Guienne, with four thouſand Horſe, and marched towards Normandy. When he came within Sight of Dieppe, he eaſily ſaw, the Fort of Charles-Meſnil, where the Engliſh had fortified themſelves, was impregnable on the Side next the Country; and therefore, without heſitation, reſolved to enter the Town, and, in ſpite of the Engliſh, executed his Deſign. Hardly was he entered, when without giving them time to come to themſelves, he ſallied out with all his Troops, and ſtormed the Fort on the Side next the Town. He was thrice repulſed, but, the fourth time, carried it Sword in Hand. The Engliſh finding they were unable to continue the Blockade, after the loſs of their Fort, raiſed it, and retired in good Order. John Duke of Somerſet (1), arrived five Days after, with a Reinforcement of five thouſand Men (2). Had he came ſooner, the Dauphin would not perhaps have performed this Enterprize with ſo much Honour. As the Duke found the Blockade raiſed, he could do nothing more than ravage Part of the Enemies Country (3), after retaking ſome Caſtles in Normandy.

The Earl of Armagnac takes poſſeſſion again of Cominge. P. Daniel

After the Dauphin's Departure, Charles, at laſt, quitted Guienne, and came to Tours, where he diverted himſelf after the Fatigues of the War. But his Pleaſures were ſomewhat diſturbed, by the News of the Earl of Armagnac taking Arms, and ſeizing that Part of the Earldom of Cominge, of which, he had been lately diſpoſſeſſed. The voluptuous Life Charles led at Tours, was ſo alluring, that he could not reſolve to interrupt his Pleaſures ſo ſoon. He waited till the Dauphin's return, and, as he had gallantly behaved in the Affair of Dieppe, ſent him, immediately after his Arrival, to chaſtiſe the Earl of Armagnac. Upon the Dauphin's Approach, the Earl ſaw himſelf deſerted by all his Friends, and unſupported by the Engliſh, though the King was affianced to his Daughter. So, the Dauphin with eaſe became maſter of Rovergne, and of all, in general, that belonged to the Earl, who had nothing left, but the little Town of Liſle en Jourdain, about twelve Miles from Toulouſe. The Dauphin held it long beſieged in vain. At length, deſpairing of putting an honorable end to the Siege, he artfully drew the Earl to a Conference, upon the promiſe of a ſafe Conduct, and when he had him in his Power, ſent him to the King his Father, who made no ſcruple to detain him (4). Two Years after, he reſtored him his Territories, at the Requeſt of the Kings of Caſtile, and Navarre, who interceeded in his Behalf.

The Dauphin outs him of his Territories. Hall.

The Earl of Armagnac's Misfortune, cauſed the King and Council of England, to grow cold with reſpect to the Marriage, of which, there was no further Talk. It was not ſcrupled, to put that Affront upon an unfortunate Prince, who was unable to be revenged (5).

1444. Since the Duke of Burgundy's ſeparate Truce with Henry, the French were not ſo eager to continue the War. The truth is, they had no leſs need of Repoſe than the Engliſh. France was utterly ruined, by this fatal War, which had laſted thirty Years, without Interruption, and by the inteſtine Troubles, raiſed ſeveral Years before the breach of the Truce, by the Quarrel between the Houſes of Orleans and Burgundy. The Princes and great Men, were diſheartened at the Fatigues and Loſſes, they ſo long ſuſtained. The Country and Towns were become deſolate; France, though generally well peopled, could no longer find Soldiers. Beſides, the Duke of Orleans, who had promiſed to uſe his utmoſt Endeavours to procure a Peace, being willing to keep his word, never ceaſed to ſollicite King Charles upon that head. The Duke of Burgundy preſſed him likewiſe on his Part, and the whole Kingdom in general, ardently wiſhed to ſee a Ceſſation of ſo many Calamities. In England, a Peace was no leſs earneſtly deſired. All the Money levied there, was ſwallowed up in France, as in a bottomleſs Gulf, from whence it never returned. In a word, the King was no Warrior, and his Council conſiſted, for the moſt Part, of Eccleſiaſticks, introduced by the Cardinal of Wincheſter, to ſtrengthen his Party. The Council was very ſenſible, the Continuance of the War would, by no means, recommend them to the People. As the War had, for ſome time, been diſadvantagious to England, it was natural to throw the Blame, upon thoſe that ſat at the Helm, rather than upon the King, who only approved of what was ſuggeſted by his Miniſters. The Duke of Gloceſter alone was of Opinion, that freſh Efforts ſhould be made, to take the Advantage of King Charles's Weakneſs, and of the late Truce with the Duke of Burgundy. But this Prince was no longer in Vogue, nor were his Counſels regarded.

Theſe Conſiderations, which were very weighty on both Sides, prevailed at length with the two Kings, to hearken to the Inſtances of the Duke of Burgundy, who preſſed them to conſent to a Truce, in order more calmly to endeavour a Peace. It was agreed, the Negotiation ſhould be at Tours, where King Charles reſided, though by that, the Engliſh ſeemed to be going to beg it. At any other time, the bare propoſal of treating at Tours, would have been ſufficient for a Rupture; but Henry's Council were not ſo nice. They were for having a Truce at any rate, and nothing appeared diſhonorable to attain that end. We ſhall even ſee preſently, that almoſt every thing was ſettled in private, before the Ambaſſadors ſet out for Tours. This Truce, which ſeemed to be founded on the publick Good, was properly deſigned only for the Support of the Miniſters, who had nothing leſs in View, than the Kingdom's Advantage. Henry underſtood nothing of it, but ſuffered himſelf to be guided, according to Cuſtom, by his Counſellors, who made him believe, they had his Intereſt at Heart, when in reality they were working only for themſelves.

It is agreed to treat about a Truce at Tours. Monſtrelet. Du Tillet. Act. Pub. XI. p. 49, &c. Hall.

William de la Pole Earl of Suffolk, was appointed head of this Embaſſy (6). The Earl had more Reaſons than one to deſire this Office, as will be ſeen preſently. Mean while, as he was not ignorant how tickliſh a Step he was going to make, and how liable to be ſtrictly inquired into, he preſented to the King a Petition, which, probably, had been concerted with the principal Members of the Council. He ſhowed in this Petition, a great Scruple with regard to his Inſtructions, pretending they were beyond his Capacity, though, it is likely, he was himſelf the Author. Then, he modeſtly begged to be eaſed of the burthen of the Negotiation; or at leaſt, if the King did not think proper to grant him that Favour, he would be pleaſed to ſecure him againſt all Imputation. Whereupon the King, by the Advice of his Council, cauſed to be drawn an authentick Order, to execute fully, whatever was contained in his Inſtructions. As, probably, this Order was to be ſhown, only in caſe of neceſſity, and after the Execution, the King ſaid in it, that the Inſtructions concerned not only the general Good of the Kingdom, but alſo his own Perſon and Marriage. A clear Evidence, that the Marriage, ſpoken of preſently, was already reſolved.

A Truce is concluded at Tours. Ib. p. 59, &c. Du Tillet.

The Ambaſſadors of England being come to Tours, entered immediately into Negotiation with King Charles's Commiſſioners, concerning a Peace. But after ſome mutual and fruitleſs Propoſals, they were content with a Truce, which was ſigned the 28th of May. It was to commence the 7th of July (7) this Year, and end the firſt of April 1446.

Suffolk proposes a Marriage between the King and Margaret of Anjou. Monſtrelet. Hall. Stow.

The Affair of the Truce with France being ended, the Earl of Suffolk propoſed, or cauſed to be propoſed, the King's Marriage with Margaret of Anjou, Daughter of René of Anjou, who bore the Title of King of Sicily, after the Death of Lewis III, his elder Brother. The Engliſh tax the Earl of Suffolk, with making this Propoſal of himſelf, without any Authority; but we have ſeen the contrary above. Not but that, probably, he was the firſt Contriver, but he had taken the precaution to procure the King's Approbation. He was willing to keep in his preſent Poſt, and nothing was more proper to ſupport him, than this Marriage. He knew, Henry 1444. was himſelf incapable of governing; and conſequently, it could not be, but that his Miniſters would be liable to Envy, and bear the blame of whatever was not agreeable to the People. In this belief, he fancied, the beſt way to ſupport himſelf, was to give the King a Wife, and at the ſame time, the Kingdom a Governeſs. To that end, it was neceſſary, the Princeſs who was to mount the Throne, ſhould be of an underſtanding, proper to ſupply the defect of the King her Spouſe, and of a Reſolution, to protect the Miniſtry. It was neceſſary moreover, that ſhe ſhould be of a Rank not to diſparage the King, but withal, ſhould have no ground naturally to aſpire to ſuch a Marriage; that being entirely indebted for it to the Managers, ſhe might be always ready to ſupport them. The Earl of Suffolk's aim was likewiſe to be ſtrictly united with the Queen, in order to compleat the ruin of the Duke of Gloceſter, who was a perpetual Obſtacle to the deſigns of the Miniſtry. All theſe requiſites were found in Margaret of Anjou, Daughter of René King of Sicily, and Niece of the Queen of France. She was a Princeſs of a lively, daring Spirit, of great Penetration, uncommon Reſolution, and not to be frighted by oppoſition or difficulties. On the other hand, the Marriage propoſed by the Earl of Suffolk was ſo advantagious, that ſhe could not have expected it, without the Concurrence of ſeveral Circumſtances in her favour. I do not ſpeak of her Birth, which certainly was illuſtrious enough to give her a pretenſion to this Honour. But ſhe was ſo deſtitute of the Goods of Fortune, that her Parents could not give her any Dowry. To ſupply this defect, the Engliſh Miniſters extolled her noble Qualities, which, they ſaid, were more valuable than all the Money in the world. But they chiefly inſinuated to the People, that this Princeſs being Niece to the Queen of France, and to King Charles's Favorite, would be very inſtrumental in procuring a Peace. This was plainly ſhowing how much this Peace was wanted. Accordingly, the Court of France, who had perfect Intelligence of what paſſed in England, made their advantage of it, by ingaging the Earl of Suffolk to promiſe, in the King's Name, to deliver Mans, and the whole Province of Maine, to the King of Sicily; on condition, he ſhould preſent them to Charles of Anjou his Brother. Thus, inſtead of receiving Margaret's Dower, Henry purchaſed her with the reſtitution of one of the ſtrongeſt Places in France, or rather, with the whole Province of Maine.

He engages to deliver up Maine to the King of Sicily. Hall. Stow.

The Terms being thus ſettled, the Earl of Suffolk returned to England, to propoſe them to the King, and cauſe them to be approved. This was no difficult thing, ſince the principal Counſellors were in the Secret, and had already given their conſent. The Duke of Gloceſter, who had never heard of it before, ſtrongly oppoſed it, for two Reaſons which ſeemed unanſwerable. The firſt was, that the King being already engaged to the Earl of Armagnac's Daughter, it would be very diſhonourable to violate his Faith, without alledging the leaſt excuſe. The ſecond was of no leſs force, namely, that Maine, being as it were the Bulwark of Normandy, could not be abandoned, without putting Normandy in manifeſt danger, as ſoon as the Truce ſhould expire. But theſe reaſons were not regarded. So, by the advice of the Council, the King impowered the Earl of Suffolk, to eſpouſe the Princeſs Margaret in his Name.

He returns to England.

For Joy the Marriage was concluded, the King created the Earl, his Ambaſſador, Marquiſs of Suffolk, and upon John Holland Earl of Huntington, conferred the Title of Duke of Exeter (1). The King's Marriage was ſolemnized by Proxy at Tours, in the Preſence of King Charles and his whole Court (3), in a ſplendid manner, little ſuitable to the preſent Circumſtances of the two Kings, and the Indigence of the new Queen.

1444. The King's Marriage ſolemnized at Tours. November. Hall.

Though the Nuptials were celebrated in November, the Queen came not into England till the May following (4), and on the 30th of the ſame Month, was ſolemnly crowned. She was no ſooner with the King, but perceiving his weakneſs, ſhe ruled him with an abſolute Sway. By that means the Marquiſs of Suffolk, the Cardinal of Wincheſter, and the Archbiſhop of York, had the ſame Credit as before the King's Marriage. They ſtood in need of the Queen, as ſhe did of them, ſince ſhe had yet no other Creatures, but what they had procured her. For this reaſon, a very ſtrict Union was formed between the Queen and the Miniſters, which could not but end in the ruin of the Duke of Gloceſter, whom they all looked upon as their common Enemy.

A League againſt the Duke of Gloceſter.

The Truce being made only in order to a Peace, this whole year was ſpent in ſeveral Negotiations, concerning the time and place of a new Congreſs. It was thought likewiſe, that an Interview of the two Kings might promote the Concluſion of a Peace. So the Miniſters of both Courts agreed, that the two Monarchs ſhould meet ſomewhere in France; and for that purpoſe, Henry ſhould repair to Calais, in order to be near the Place to be choſen for the Interview. But ſeveral difficulties occurring about the choice of the Place, the Truce was prolonged till November the 1ſt, 1446.

The Parliament which met the beginning of the year 1446, granted the King a conſiderable Subſidy, for a vigorous Proſecution of the war in France, as ſoon as the Truce was expired (6). But this pretended deſign of continuing the war, was only a decoy to draw Money from the Parliament. Inſtead of Preparations for War, Negotiations for the Interview of the two Kings, and for a Congreſs of Ambaſſadors to conclude a Peace, were zealouſly continued. Mean while the Truce was farther prolonged to April the 1ſt, 1447. This ſhews, the Council intended not to carry on the war, though the Parliament was called on that pretence. We ſhall ſee preſently, the Truce was again prolonged, and interrupted only by an unexpected Accident, contrary to the Intention of the Engliſh Miniſtry (7).

A Subſidy granted for the War. Cotton's Abridg.

Truce is prolonged. Act. Pub. XI. p. 108, 110, 111, 149. 155. Monſtrelet.

The Parliament might eaſily have perceived the Devices made uſe of to procure Subſidies, if they had not voluntarily ſhut their own Eyes. This was one of thoſe Parliaments that are managed, as it is but too often the caſe, by the Intrigues of the Court. This plainly appeared, in a Reſolution to return the Marquiſs of Suffolk publick Thanks, for his great Service to the Kingdom, in negotiating the King's Marriage (8). Mean time, the advantages accruing to the King or State, from an Alliance with the Family of the moſt mortal Enemy to both, had not hitherto been perceived. Neither was the Parliament contented with this. They addreſſed the King, praying him to reward the Marquiſs; and even granted a Subſidy (9) on purpoſe to ſatisfy him for the Expences of his Embaſſy.

The Parliament gives the Marquiſs of Suffolk Thanks. Cotton's Abridg. Hall.

(1) The King granted him and his Heirs-male, a Place and Seat in Parliament, and in the Great Councils, next to the Duke of York. Rymer's Fœd. Tom. 11. p. 49.

(2) He alſo granted him in Reverſion, from the death of Humphrey Duke of Gloceſter, the Iſles of Jerſey, Guernſey, Serk, Erm, and Aureney; as alſo the Manor and Hundred of Briſtol; and what is more, he was crowned King of the Iſle of Wight, by King Henry's own hand. In conſideration of his Father's great deſcent, the King granted him place in Parliament, and all other Meetings, next the Duke of Norfolk, and before Humphrey de Stafford Duke of Buckingham; which occaſioning great Animoſities between them, by a ſpecial Act made in Parliament, it was eſtabliſhed, that they ſhould have Precedency by Turns yearly, the Duke of Warwick to begin the firſt year: But his death, ſhortly after, put an end to this matter. Dugdale's Baron. Vol. I. p. 248. Stow's Ann. p. 384.

(3) In the preſence of the King and Queen of France, of the Dukes of Orleans and Bretagne, of ſeven Earls, twelve Barons, twenty Biſhops, beſides Knights and Gentlemen innumerable. Hall, fol. 148. Monſtrelet, Vol. III. fol. 1, 2.

(4) Hall ſays, ſhe landed at Portſmouth in April. The Marriage Solemnity was performed at Southwick in Hampſhire, on April 22; after which ſhe came to London, and was crowned, fol. 148. Stow's Ann. p. 384.

(5) He was Archbiſhop but twenty-nine years, and died April 12. 1443. His Succeſſor John Stafford was a Baſtard, as were, in the next Century, Tonſtal, Gardiner, and Bonner. The ſaid Archbiſhop Chicheley founded All-Souls College in Oxford; as alſo Bernard College, now incorporated into St. John's in the ſame Univerſity. Stow's Ann. p. 383.

(6) This Parliament met at Weſtminſter, on Feb. 25. 1445, and was at ſeveral times prorogued to Jan. 24, 1446. It granted the King a Tenth and a half, and a Fifteenth and a half, except five thouſand Pounds allowed to poor waſted Towns. They alſo granted Tunnage and Poundage as before on Denizens, but double on Aliens: And gave a Subſidy of thirty four Shillings and Four-pence on Denizens, and fifty three Shillings on Aliens, for every Sack of Wool, for four years. Cotton's Abridg. p. 629, 630. In this Parliament it was enacted, That to prevent oppreſſion, and exactions, no Man ſhould be Sheriff or Under-Sheriff, above one year, upon pain of forfeiting two hundred Pounds. Statutes.

(7) Alſo this year, on Auguſt 17, a twelve years Truce was concluded between England and Flanders. Rymer's Fœd. Tom. 11. p. 132, 140.

(8) On June 2, in the firſt Seſſion of this Parliament, he openly, eloquently, and boldly declared, what pain and diligence he had taken in France, as well in concluding the Truce, as in making the Marriage between his Sovereign Lord the King, and the Lady Margaret. The like Speech he made the next day in the Houſe of Commons; whereupon it was voted, that his labour and diligence ſhould be recorded in the Rolls of this Parliament, not only for the Honour of him and his Family, but alſo for his acquittal and diſcharge. Hall, fol. 149.

1446. Project against the Duke of Gloceſter. Hall.

The Queen, the Cardinal of Wincheſter, the Marquiſs of Suffolk, and the reſt of that Party, finding themſelves ſufficiently eſtabliſhed, and having nothing to fear from a Parliament ſo much at their devotion, began to contrive the ruin of the Duke of Gloceſter, who was ever formidable to them. The People, for the moſt part, were in his Intereſt. Beſides, as hitherto he was preſumptive Heir of the Crown, they had reaſon to fear, in caſe he ſhould one day mount the Throne, he would call them to an account. Their firſt ſtep was to remove him from the Council. To give ſome colour to this Injuſtice, Perſons were ſuborned to accuſe him of divers Crimes, the principal whereof was, that being Protector of the Realm, he had put ſeveral to death by his own Authority (1), and aggravated the Condemnation of many others. Upon theſe Accuſations, about which a great noiſe was made, he was ſummoned before the Council. But he cleared himſelf with ſuch Evidence, from all that was laid to his Charge, that the Council, though entirely compoſed of his Enemies, thought not fit to proſecute him thereon. It is not in England as in other Countries, where the Lives of the Subjects depend in ſome meaſure on the Will of the Sovereign, who appoints ſuch Commiſſioners as he pleaſes, to proſecute thoſe he has a mind to deſtroy. To take away the Duke of Gloceſter's Life in a legal manner, he muſt have been tried by his Peers. But his Enemies were well aware, how great ſoever their Credit might be, the Body of the Nobility was not ſo corrupted, as to hope to cauſe the firſt Prince of the Blood to be condemned, upon forged Crimes. Mean while, this Proceeding ſo moved the Londoners, that nothing was heard, but Praiſes of the Duke of Gloceſter, and Curſes againſt thoſe who governed in the King's Name. Theſe Murmurs, which were plain Indications of the People's Affection for the Duke, convinced his Enemies, there was no Medium between his and their Ruin. Accordingly, without further Conſideration, they reſolved to diſpatch him out of the way. The Queen, who was of a bold and enterprizing Genius, was the Perſon that firſt encouraged this Reſolution. At leaſt, the Hiſtorians inſinuate as much, if they have not expreſsly ſaid it. And indeed, the Miniſtry would never have ventured upon ſuch an Action, without having her at their head.

His Ruin determined.

1447. The Parliament is ſummoned to St. Edmundsbury. Hall.

It was not poſſible, as was obſerved, to put this Prince to death, by the uſual courſe of Juſtice; and it would have been very dangerous to murder him openly. His Enemies were bent to deſtroy him, but would conceal the hand that ſhould give the blow. To execute their deſign with all poſſible Secrecy, they deviſed a Means, countenanced, if not contrived, by the Queen. This was, to accuſe him of ſome Crime, in order to have a pretence to impriſon him, and then their Plot might, with great privacy and eaſe, be accompliſhed. For this purpoſe, it was rumoured, that a very important Affair required the ſpeedy meeting of a Parliament. Accordingly, one was called for the February following (2). In the mean time, the Queen and Miniſtry affected to load the Duke of Gloceſter with Honours and Careſſes, not to inſpire him with Confidence, but with Suſpicions. They would have been glad at his abſenting himſelf, or taking ſome other Courſe, that would have given them an Advantage againſt him. To that end, they endeavoured, by ſecret Emiſſaries, to terrify him, in warning him to take care of himſelf, and hinting a deſign to accuſe him before the Parliament of ſundry Crimes and Miſdemeanors; and that every thing was prepared for his Condemnation; that St. Edmunds-bury was purpoſely choſen for holding the Parliament, as a Place more proper for this deſign than London, where he was ſupported by the People. All this was only to induce him to withdraw, and thereby give himſelf ſome appearance of truth to the Calumnies, wherewith it was intended to blacken him. But as he knew his own Innocence, he would not, by abſenting himſelf, give occaſion to the World, to believe him guilty. However, he could not, after all, avoid falling into his Enemies Snares.

The Duke is confined. Hall. Act. Pub. XI. p. 178.

The firſt day of the Seſſion, the Duke was apprehended (3), and put into cloſe Confinement, without being allowed to keep any of his Domeſticks. To give a plauſible colour to this ſevere uſage, Care was taken to publiſh, that he was accuſed of conſpiring to kill the King, in order to ſeize the Crown; and with an armed Force, to deliver his Ducheſs out of Kenelworth Caſtle, where ſhe was impriſoned. The firſt of theſe Accuſations found no Credit at all with the People. On the contrary, there was preſently a Commotion in the City in his favour, but which was ſoon appeaſed. As the People thought him innocent, they imagined he would clear himſelf from theſe, as he had from the former Charges. But he was allowed neither time nor opportunity to make his Defence. On the morrow, he was found dead in his bed, without any ſigns of Violence on his Body. However, the People were convinced he was murdered. Some ſay, he was ſmothered between two Feather-beds; and others, that he underwent the ſame fate with Edward II. To remove theſe Suſpicions, his Body was ſhewn to both Houſes of Parliament (4), and expoſed, for ſome days, to publick View. But a Man muſt have been very bold, to charge with this Murder, thoſe that were conſidered as the Authors. Theſe were no leſs than the Managers of the Affairs of the Kingdom, who, in ſacrificing the firſt Prince of the Blood to their Malice and Vengeance, plainly ſhewed, what Enemies of an inferior rank were to expect.

He is found dead in his Bed. Hall.

His Body expoſed to view.

Mean while, to make good, in ſome meaſure, the Impeachment againſt the deceaſed, ſeveral of his Domeſticks were apprehended, and accuſed of being in the Plot to kill the King. Whereupon they were all ſentenced to die, by Judges appointed by virtue of the King's Commiſſion, of whom the Marquiſs of Suffolk was chief. But, though the Crime for which they were condemned was the moſt heinous, the King pardoned them all without exception (5). This Act of Grace was founded upon the conſideration of Good-Friday, and the Aſſumption of the Virgin, with the like pious and religious Motives. This gives occaſion to preſume, theſe People were bribed to confeſs themſelves guilty, upon aſſurance of their Pardon. However this be, there was no enquiry made after the ſudden death of the Duke of Gloceſter. Nay, it was pretended, he was notoriouſly guilty of the Crime, for which his Domeſticks were condemned, though they had never been confronted with him. But as theſe Domeſticks were not thoſe whom he moſt truſted, nor even ſome of the principal, it could not be thought, that he would have been ſo imprudent, as to make them his Inſtruments, or communicate to them ſuch a deſign, if he had really conceived it.

Hatred of the People againſt the Queen and Miniſtry.

The Outrage exerciſed upon a Prince of this Character, ſo univerſally beloved and eſteemed by the People, drew upon the Queen and the Miniſters an almoſt univerſal hatred, which time could never efface. The Queen eſpecially was publickly charged with the murder, and the reſpect due to her was not capable of bridling People's Tongues. This however is the very Queen, whom the French load with exceſſive Commendations, probably becauſe ſhe was of the Royal Family of France. It is true, they very ſlightly paſs over the Duke of Gloceſter's death, without endeavouring to juſtify her. As for the King, very likely, he was not conſulted in this infamous Action. But whether he did not ſo much as ſuſpect the Authors of the murder, or had not the Courage to puniſh them, he can in ſome meaſure be excuſed only on account of his natural weakneſs. I cannot leave this Subject, without remarking, how ſhort-ſighted human Policy is. The Queen and the reſt of the Duke of Gloceſter's Enemies thought, his death had ſecured them from all oppoſition. But by the juſt Judgment of God, the Duke's death was the very cauſe of the ruin of the King, Queen, and all that were concerned. The Duke of York thereby ſaw himſelf at liberty to aſſert his Claim to the Crown, a Claim which occaſioned Torrents of Engliſh Blood to be ſhed, and of which doubtleſs he would never have thought, if there had been ſuch a Competitor as the Duke of Gloceſter (6).

(6) His Body was carried to St. Albans, where a noble Monument, afterwards erected to his Memory, ſtill remains in the Conventual Church. The Vault wherein his Body was depoſited, and the exact Place of which was, it ſeems, then unknown, was diſcovered in the late Queen Anne's Reign. He was called, The Good Duke of Gloceſter. Having had his Education in Baliol College, he became a great proficient in Learning, and was a great Favourer of learned Men. He laid the firſt foundation of the famous Library at Oxford, ſince known by the name of Bodleian, from Sir Thomas Bodley, by whom it was wonderfully increaſed. Sir Thomas Moor gives an inſtance of this Duke's Sagacity. The King coming one time in progreſs to St. Albans, a Beggar, born blind, as he ſaid, recovered his ſight at the Shrine of St. Alban. The Miracle being noiſed about, the Duke being there with the King, deſired to ſee him: The Beggar being brought, he asked him whether he was born blind? He anſwered, Yes truly. And can you now ſee, ſays the Duke? Yes, I thank God, and St. Alban, replies the Beggar. Tell me then, ſays the Duke, of what colour is my Gown? The Beggar readily told him the Colour. And what colour, ſays the Duke, is ſuch a one's Gown? The Beggar likewiſe told him; and ſo of ſeveral others. You counterfeit Knave, ſays the Duke, how came you that were born blind, and could not ſee till now, ſo ſuddenly to know the difference of Colours? And thereupon, inſtead of an Alms, ordered him to be ſet in the Stocks.

Mean time, the Ducheſs of Burgundy, by virtue of the power received from the Duke her Husband, prolonged the Truce with England till 1459, on condition that, which of the two Princes ſhould deſire to break it, ſhould give the other twelve months notice. After that, a new Treaty was made, May the 4th, whereby both Parties agreed, that the Truce ſhould not be broke within the firſt four Years.

The Death of the Cardinal of Winchester. Hall. Sandford.

The Cardinal of Wincheſter, one of the principal Authors of the Duke of Gloceſter's death, enjoyed but one month the ſatisfaction of his Enemy's Fall (1). He was a Prelate much more proper for the World than the Church. Accordingly, he remained, to his laſt breath, attached to the former. He is ſaid to die in a ſort of a Paſſion, that his Riches were not capable of exempting him from the common Fate of all Mankind, and to ſee himſelf thereby upon a level with the moſt miſerable.

The People murmur againſt Suffolk.

Mean while, the People perceiving, the time deſigned for procuring a Peace was ſpent in vain, loudly murmured againſt the Marquiſs of Suffolk. It was openly ſaid, he had betrayed the King and the State; that his Treaty with the French tended only to a Truce deſtructive to England, as it afforded the Enemy time to fortify himſelf; that he had ingaged to deliver Maine to the French, in order to marry the King to a Princeſs, who had given ſenſible proofs of the Calamities the Engliſh were to expect under her Government. Theſe murmurs were ſo publick, that the Marquiſs could not help taking notice of them; and in order to ſilence them, requeſted the King to hear his defence, that he might ſatisfy him of his Innocence. Whereupon the King ſet him a day to clear himſelf, and heard him in his own Apartment, in the preſence of ſeveral Lords, none of whom were there with a deſign to refute him. He related all he had done in France, and could eaſily juſtify himſelf, ſince he had taken care, before his departure, to be fortified with the King's Orders. Having finiſhed his Speech, the King declared himſelf ſatisfied, and gave him Letters Patents under the Great Seal, acquitting him from all imputation of Miſdemeanor, and forbidding all Perſons, on pain of his diſpleaſure, to accuſe or ſpeak ill of him. But this was not capable of putting a ſtop to the People's murmurs. It was not doubted that the King would be ſatisfied, but this was not thought a ſufficient reaſon to ſatisfy the Nation. Notwithſtanding the Marquiſs's pretended defence, he was looked upon with horror, as he was believed to be the principal Author of the Duke of Gloceſter's murder. Beſides the King's Marriage, procured by his means, was conſidered as one of the greateſt calamities that could befall England. This was the general opinion of Town and Country: But the Court, where the Queen would ſuffer none but her Creatures, ſtood otherwiſe affected. The Miniſters had likewiſe for Adherents, throughout the Kingdom, ſuch as found their account in their attachment to the Court, that is, whoever held any Poſt or Office under the Miniſtry. Theſe employed their authority and endeavours, to ſtifle the complaints and murmurs of the People, who could not bear to ſee the Adminiſtration of the publick affairs in the hands of a Foreigner. Indeed, the King, incapable of holding the Reins of the Government himſelf, only lent his name to the Queen, who made uſe of it as ſhe pleaſed. For his part, he minded nothing but his Devotions, wherein the Queen took care to make him ſpend his whole time, as in the only thing he was fit for, in order to divert him entirely from the Government. Some have made a Saint of this Prince. But he may be ſaid to be one of thoſe Saints, more commendable for the vices they have not, than for the virtues they poſſeſs, and to whom a great weakneſs of mind is inſtead of Merit and Worth.

He makes his defence before the King, who gives him an authentick diſcharge. Act. Pub. XI. p. 172.

The People's diſpoſition with regard to the Queen.

It was impoſſible for the Queen, and the Marquiſs of Suffolk, to govern the Kingdom alone, without raiſing jealouſy. It was not cuſtomary to ſee the Queens take upon them the Government. Accordingly, this was perceived with uneaſineſs to uſurp an arbitrary power in the King's name, who had no farther concern in the affairs, than to ſign, without examination, the Orders that were brought him. The Queen's haughty carriage, her Partiality in diſpoſing of Places, and above all, the Duke of Gloceſter's Murder, had drawn upon her the hatred of the Nation to ſuch a degree, that ſhe was every where talked of with very little reſpect. Her intimate Union with the Marquiſs of Suffolk, gave her Enemies a freſh occaſion to ſpread reports not much to her Honour. The Marquiſs was no more beloved than the Queen. It was he that had brought her into England, and, to accompliſh the Marriage, ſacrificed the intereſts of the Kingdom. But the King's name was ſo reverenced, that beſides thoſe who were by intereſt attached to the Court, many others were of the ſame Party from a motive of Duty. It was therefore no eaſy matter, to wreſt from the Queen and the Favorite the Authority they enjoyed. 1447.

They begin to talk of the Duke of York's Title to the Crown.

The diſpoſition of moſt People with regard to the Queen and the Miniſters, inſpired the Duke of York with hopes, he ſhould one day be able to aſſert his Title to the Crown. He was, by his Mother, the only Heir of the Houſe of Mortimer or March, deſcended from Lionel, third Son of Edward III, and elder Brother of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, whoſe Poſterity was in poſſeſſion of the Throne. But probably, he would never have formed ſuch a deſign, if the Duke of Gloceſter had been alive, or the People not diſaffected to the Queen and the Miniſtry. Mean while, as it would have been very dangerous to diſcover his intentions, before the People's inclinations were founded, he took care ſo to proceed, that it ſhould not be poſſible to convict him of the leaſt ſtep to that end. He contented himſelf with making uſe of ſecret Emiſſaries, who induſtriouſly ſpread among the People, diſcourſes proper to turn their thoughts to his title to the Crown. It was whiſpered about, that the Houſe of Lancaſter had uſurped the Throne. That indeed the Uſurpation had been tolerable, whilſt the Kings of that Houſe were Princes of diſtinguiſhed worth, and had acted for the welfare and honour of the Nation; that even, during the Non-age of the preſent King, there had been hopes of his treading in the ſteps of his Anceſtors, and his being a worthy Follower of the King his Father; but that ſince he became of Age, nothing glorious was to be expected from him: That therefore the Engliſh could have no reaſon to ſupport any longer the Uſurpation of the Crown, for the ſake of a Queen, who, being ſprung from the Blood of their moſt mortal Enemy, ruled the Kingdom with an arbitrary Power: That, in viewing the Poſterity of Edward III, it was evident, the Houſe of March had been unjuſtly deprived of the Crown: That the Duke of York being the ſole Heir of that Houſe, and deſcended from Edward III. by his paternal Anceſtors, ought to have his due right. In fine, that his noble Qualities, his known Virtue, and his ſignal Services to the Nation, very ſtrongly ſupported the juſt Title given him by his Birth. Theſe diſcourſes, artfully ſpread among the People, began to gain the Duke of York a Party. But he appeared not himſelf: All was done in private by his Friends.

The Court takes from the Duke of York the Regency of France, and gives it to the Duke of Somerset. Hall.

Mean while, the Queen, the Favorite, and all the Houſe of Lancaſter, failed not to take notice, of what was divulged concerning the pretenſions of the Duke of York. He might indeed keep himſelf concealed from others, but it was not eaſy to deceive ſuch quick-ſighted Perſons, who were ſo greatly concerned in the affair. As they did not queſtion, that all theſe Diſcourſes were divulged with his approbation, they believed it requiſite to leſſen his credit, by giving him ſome mortification. John Duke of Somerſet dying during theſe Tranſactions (2), Edmund his Brother (3), who ſucceeded him, ſeemed a very proper Perſon to oppoſe to the Duke of York. So, without any pretence, the Queen and the Marquiſs of Suffolk cauſed the King to remove the Duke of York from the Regency of France, before his term was expired, and conferred it on the new Duke of Somerſet. This laſt was of an exceeding haughty temper, and as his Brother had been ingaged in great Conteſts with the Duke of York, he behaved to him upon this occaſion, ſo as to make him his implacable Enemy. On the other hand, the Duke of York very highly reſented this affront: But, as it was not in his power to be revenged, diſſembled his reſentment, in expectation of a more favorable opportunity to ſhew it.

The Marquiſs made Duke of Suffolk. Dugdale. Stow.

1448. In the beginning of the year 1448, the King, who acted only by the Queen's ſuggeſtions, created the Marquiſs of Suffolk, Duke of Suffolk (4). The Queen ſeemed to intend to brave the People, by daily ſhowering her favors 1448. upon a Lord so extremely odious to the whole Nation. She thereby gave her own Enemies a great advantage, who only wanted occasions to stir up the People against her. It is an error, to which those at the Helm are frequently liable, to disregard the complaints of the People. As they are always surrounded with Flatterers, either they are ignorant of what passes any where but at Court, or imagine that having most of the great Men for them, the rest of the People are to be counted as nothing: But it often happens, they find it to their cost, that the great Men, and Kings themselves, have no more Power than private Persons, when unsupported by the People. This is what we shall have occasion to see more particularly in the course of the present Reign (1). But we must first return to the affairs of France, which will yet afford us matter for several years.

Mans delivered up to Charles of Anjou. Monstrelet. Act. Pub. XI. p. 203, 215. P. Daniel.

In the Negotiation concerning the King's Marriage, it was agreed, that the City of Mans, and whatever the English held in Maine, should be delivered to Charles of Anjou, the future Queen's Uncle. But the noise this Article made in England, and the Duke of Glocester's opposition, caused the restitution to be deferred till this year. In February, Charles of Anjou, at the head of some Troops, appeared before Mans, in order to take possession. The French say, he besieged the City, and that the Duke of Exeter the Governor, not daring to stand an assault, surrendered by Capitulation (2). But it is certain, the Duke of Exeter was not then in the Place, neither was there any appearance of a Siege. The restitution was made (3) by agreement between the two Courts, and Henry sent to Mans two Commissioners to deliver the City to the Prince of Anjou. As he was entering, the two Commissioners met him upon the Bridge, and before a publick Notary made a formal Protestation, declaring that the King of England's sole intent in restoring that place, was to procure a final Peace between him and Charles his Uncle, and only during the Truce. Moreover, he reserved to himself the Sovereignty of the City and Province, and, in case of any attempt upon the right of this Sovereignty, claimed a power to revoke the Cession without injuring his honour. Charles of Anjou heard the Protestation without appproving it, and took possession of the Place.

The Truce is prolonged. Ib. p. 193, 199, 206.

After the surrender of Mans to the French, the Negotiations for a Peace, and the Interview of the two Kings, were continued: But by reason of some difficulties, the Truce was forced to be farther prolonged to April the 1st 1449. It did not last however so long; an unforeseen accident put an end to it sooner than was expected.

Surienne surprizes Fougeres. Monstrelet. Du Tillet. Hall.

About the middle of this year (4), Surienne an Arragonian, who had served the King of England twenty years, and was Knight of the Garter, and Governor of Lower Normandy, scaled, in the Night, the Town of Fougeres, belonging to the Duke of Bretagne, and took a great booty. Whereupon, the Duke of Bretagne sent a Herald to the Duke of Somerset, then at Roan, and demanded the restitution of the Place, with all the Plunder. The Regent answered, he was extremely displeased with this action, and would give the Duke of Bretagne all the satisfaction he could reasonably expect.

The Duke of Bretagne complains of it. The Regent promises satisfaction.

The Duke of Bretagne carries his complaints to the King of France, who takes the thing to heart. Monstrelet. Hall.

Mean while, as it would require some time to be informed more particularly of this affair, and to notify it to the Court of England, the Duke of Bretagne, impatient of this delay, complained to the King of France of the breach of the Truce, wherein Bretagne was expresly included. Charles considering, his affairs were in a good situation, and those of the English in great disorder, as well by reason of the King's inability as of the People's discontent, took fire at this News, as if the injury had been done to himself. And yet, to look back on the Duke of Bretagne's proceedings, during the whole former War, Charles had no great cause to be satisfied with that House. However, perceiving it to be a favorable opportunity to renew the War, whilst the English thought of nothing less, he sent a Gentleman to the Duke of Somerset, and two Ambassadors to London, to demand reparation for this insult. But at the same time, to make this reparation impracticable, he insisted upon the payment of sixteen hundred thousand Crowns to the Duke of Bretagne, for the damages sustained by the taking of Fougeres. This Sum was so exorbitant, that it must not be thought strange, if the Court of England refused to pay it down. Besides, it was almost impossible, that in so short a time a just calculation could be made of the damages done by the English. It was also very surprising, that Charles should so eagerly espouse the Duke of Bretagne's quarrel, who was not included in the Truce as his Ally (5), but rather as a neutral Prince who had frequently been Mediator between the two Kings. The Ambassadors however were told, the King would take care to indemnify the Duke, as soon as it was known, what his loss might amount to; and if Charles would send Ambassadors to Louviers, the King of England would do the like, in order to settle all things to the common satisfaction of the two Kings and the Duke of Bretagne (6).

The Conference at Louviers, Monstrelet. Hall.

At the Congress held at Louviers upon this occasion (7), the English represented, that the taking of Fougeres was without Orders, and unknown to the Regent. They expostulated likewise against the sum demanded, as far exceeding what the Duke of Bretagne could justly require. But the French plainly told them, if the Duke received not the satisfaction their Master demanded, he deemed the Truce violated. This haughty and peremptory way of negotiating on Charles's part, seemed very strange to the English, but the French persisting in their first Proposition, the conference broke up, without any effect (8).

Charles seeks occasion to renew the War. Monstrelet. Hall.

So bent was Charles upon renewing the War, whilst the King of England was unprepared, that in case the English should resolve to give the satisfaction required, he had another pretence for a Rupture. He pretended, they had violated the Truce with Scotland, and he was obliged to undertake the cause of the Scots. Indeed, there had been a conflict between the English and Scots, wherein the English had been worsted. Buchanan makes it a pitched Battle, and says, the English lost three thousand Men. However, this affair does not seem to have been of so great consequence, since it was presently suppressed. This year the two Nations renewed their Truce (9), without fixing the time of its continuance. Only it was agreed, that, which of the two Kings should desire to break it, he should give the other notice so long beforehand. However, King James had not desired Charles to interpose in this quarrel, and consequently, it is evident, Charles sought an occasion of Rupture.

Imprudence of the Council of England. Hall.

Whilst Charles was making his preparations, he amused the English with fruitless Negotiations. The Court of England's imprudence at this juncture, is very astonishing. They knew neither how to preserve the Truce, nor prepare for War. If they had been willing to avoid a rupture, they should at least have restored Fougeres to the Duke of Bretagne, with promise of amends for all damages. But they kept the Place, without using any effectual endeavours to appease that incensed Prince. The Council, where greater care was taken to introduce the Queen's and the Duke of Suffolk's Creatures, than Persons qualified to manage the publick affairs, seemed to be seized with a spirit of inconsideration. To see the Queen's indolence on this occasion, one would have thought, that being without Issue, she was in a Plot with the King's Enemies, to dispossess him of all he still held in France. If she, and her Favorites and Ministers, or even the whole Council, had such a design, they succeeded but too well. However that be, the faults they committed on this occasion, are to be excused, only by the consideration of the Haughtiness wherewith Charles acted, who rendered an agreement impracticable. But, at the same time, they should have prepared for their defence.

The King of France demands an extravagant satisfaction for the Duke of Bretagne. Monstrelet.

As soon as Charles was in condition to renew the War, he caused the Castle of Conches, and Pont de l' Arche, in Normandy (10), and, about the same time, Gerberoy in Beauvoisis, Cognac, and St. Maigrin in Guienne to be surprized, in the Duke of Bretagne's name. The 1449. Engliſh complained in their turn of the violation of the Truce, but were told, it was by way of Repriſals for Fougeres. Thus the War was rekindled at a juncture very diſadvantagious to the Engliſh. As they were unprepared, the Duke of Somerſet, Regent of France, was deſtitute of Forces, when he moſt needed them. Charles had therefore free ſcope to puſh his Conqueſts. This gives occaſion to believe, the ſurprize of Fougeres was unknown to the Court of England. Otherwiſe, it muſt be thought, either the Miniſters had loſt their ſenſes, in not preparing to ſupport their enterprize, or had among them Traitors, who thereby intended to re-engage the Engliſh in War, before they were ready. Certainly, when it is conſidered, that the Court was ſo remiſs to ſatisfy the Duke of Bretagne, and ſo careleſs to prepare for War, it is hard to know what to think of ſuch a Conduct.

Charles acts againſt Normandy with four Armies. Monſtrelet. Hall.

Charles's chief aim was to recover Normandy, and for that purpoſe had prepared four Armies. A plain demonſtration, he did not deſire the buſineſs of Fougeres ſhould be ended by an agreement. Since the Congreſs of Louviers, which broke up in April (1), he would not have had time to put ſo many Forces on foot. The firſt of theſe Armies he headed himſelf. The Earl of Dunois, lately made Earl of Longueville, and Generaliſſimo of the King's Forces under the Conſtable, commanded the ſecond. The Duke of Alenſon had the command of the third; and the Duke of Bretagne, of the fourth, wholly conſiſting of his own Troops. All the Towns of Normandy were ill-provided with Men and Ammunition. Moſt of the Governors depending upon the Truce, were gone to England. So the French Armies had only to appear before the Towns, in order to carry them. Several places did not ſtay to be attacked. Some taking Arms, expelled the Engliſh Garriſons; others were ſold by the commanding Officers. Pont Audemer and Chateau Galliard were the only places that made a tolerable defence. In ſhort, not to enter into a needleſs detail of all the Sieges, whether real or feigned, it will ſuffice to ſay in a word, that before the Campain was ended, Charles was able to beſiege Roan, where he had friends. Having aſſembled all his forces, making a body of fifty thouſand Men, he ordered the Capital of Normandy to be inveſted, the 8th of October. He would not form a regular Siege, being well aſſured, the Duke of Somerſet, and the Earl of Shrewsbury, who were ſhut up there, with three thouſand Men only, would not be able to defend themſelves againſt the Inhabitants, who had promiſed to riſe in his favor. And indeed, within a few days, the Earl of Dunois was going to be introduced at St. Hilary's Gate, with three hundred Men, if the Earl of Shrewsbury had not come very ſeaſonably, and repulſed that Detachment.

The Citizens open the Gates to the French. Monſtrelet.

The Inhabitants, notwithſtanding this diſappointment, perſiſted in their reſolution. On the 19th of October, the whole City riſing in Arms with one conſent, all that the Duke of Somerſet could do, was to diſtribute his Garriſon in ſome of the moſt advantagious Poſts. But the French being introduced, quickly forced all theſe Poſts ſword in hand. There was only the Palace left, where the Duke of Somerſet, and the Earl of Shrewsbury were, with eight hundred Men. As they foreſaw, they ſhould ſoon be in want of proviſions, the Duke deſired to ſpeak with the King in order to capitulate; which being granted, he offered to retire upon honourable Terms. But the King inſiſted upon his ſurrendering at diſcretion, unleſs he would treat for the reſt of Normandy. As this point could not be adjuſted, the Duke returned to the Palace, and held out ten or twelve days longer. At laſt, he was forced to capitulate, on condition of leaving all his Artillery, paying fifty thouſand Crowns of Gold, and delivering to the King Caudebec, Arques, Lillebonne, Tancarville, Montravilliers, and Harfleur (2). The Earl of Shrewsbury was left in Hoſtage (3) for the performance of this engagement, and the Engliſh Garriſon marched out of Roan, where Charles made his entry, on the 19th of November. The Governor of Harfleur, not thinking fit to comply with this Capitulation, the Earl of Longueville was detached by the King to beſiege that Place, which ſurrendered the beginning of January (4). Though Charles might juſtly have detained the Earl of Shrewsbury, ſince the Capitulation of Roan was not fully obſerved by the Engliſh, he was pleaſed, as a mark of his eſteem, to give him his liberty, without ranſom. In the mean time, the Earl of Foix, who commanded in Guienne for King Charles, took the Caſtle of Mauleon, ſtanding upon an inacceſſible Rock. Thus ended the firſt Campain, which proved ſo fatal to the Engliſh.

Beſides the Court of England's concern, for the ill poſture of affairs in France, a Rebellion raiſed in Ireland at the ſame time, gave them a freſh cauſe of uneaſineſs. However, the Queen and the Duke of Suffolk reaped ſome advantage by theſe commotions, as they furniſhed them with a pretence to remove the Duke of York. This Prince beginning to be a trouble to them, he was ſent into Ireland, under colour of being the fitteſt Perſon to ſuppreſs the Rebellion, but withal, had but few Troops allowed him for that purpoſe. It was hoped, he would either periſh in the attempt, or forfeit his reputation. The Duke perceived their deſign, and wiſely turned againſt themſelves the artifice they uſed for his ruin. He ſo managed, that, by his mild and gentle behaviour, he won the Iriſh, and reſtored them to their duty, without being obliged to uſe force. What is more, he ſo made them his friends, that from thenceforward they were always devoted to the ſervice of himſelf and Family, and even in the midſt of his greateſt misfortunes.

1450. The univerſal confuſion of the affairs of France, the negligence of the Court in that reſpect, the loſs of almoſt all Normandy in one ſingle Campain, the conqueſt whereof had coſt ſo much blood, began, at length, openly to provoke the impatient temper of the Engliſh. The whole Kingdom rung with complaints againſt the Duke of Suffolk. It was publickly ſaid, he had betrayed the State, and that Maine, the Key of Normandy, was delivered to the French, for the accompliſhment of a marriage, advantagious to none but himſelf. He was accuſed of being the principal Author of the Duke of Gloceſter's death, for fear that diſcerning Prince ſhould ſee through his treaſonable practices. It was complained, that there were but few Perſons of parts, and ſtill fewer of virtue, in the Council; that, on the contrary, the Board was filled with vicious Counſellors, without Principles of Honour or Religion, that no conſideration might hinder their being wholly devoted to the Will of the Queen, and her Miniſter: That it was the ſame thing, with regard to thoſe in the publick Poſts, in whom, honeſty and ability were not ſo much required, as an attachment to the Miniſtry. The Queen was no leſs diſliked. It was complained, ſhe ruled, with inſupportable pride, a free Nation, uſed to be governed only by Law, and which had never ſuffered a deſpotick Power. It was added, the Uſurpation of ſuch a Power was not to be borne, even in a King, much leſs in a foreign Queen. It was farther obſerved, that, by degrees, ſhe had turned out of the Council all thoſe that gave her any umbrage, in order to ſubſtitute ſuch as were at her devotion, without troubling herſelf, whether they were fit for ſo high an employment.

1450. Complaints of the People againſt the Duke of Suffolk and the Queen.

In this diſpoſition were the People, when the Parliament met, the beginning of the year 1450 (5). The Court wanted an aid to enable them to reſtore the affairs of France: Otherwiſe, they ſaw themſelves obliged entirely to abandon them, and thereby, give their enemies a farther advantage againſt them. The Queen ſoon perceived, the general diſcontent had ſeized the very Members of Parliament. She believed, it would be of great advantage to remove the Parliament to Leiceſter, where ſhe hoped to have greater ſway than at London, of whoſe Inhabitants ſhe was jealous. But ſhe met with ſo ſtrong oppoſition from the Lords, that ſhe was forced to deſiſt. In all likelihood, ſomething was feared like what had paſſed at St. Edmundsbury, with regard to the Duke of Gloceſter.

1450. againſt the Earl of Suffolk, containing the following Articles:

Articles of Impeachment againſt Suffolk. Cotton's Abridg. Hall. fol. 157.

I. That the Duke of Suffolk had treated with the Baſtard of Orleans, and the other French Ambaſſadors, to perſwade King Charles to invade England; to the end, he might place his Son on the Throne, whom he intended to marry with Margaret only Daughter of John Duke of Somerſet.

II. That being bribed by the French, he had releaſed the Duke of Orleans, againſt the expreſs Orders of the late King.

III. That Normandy was invaded by his Means, and Advice.

IV. That being Ambaſſador in France, he ingaged to ſurrender Maine to the French, without the conſent of the reſt of the Ambaſſadors, and drew the King and Council to ratify his Engagement.

V. That he had informed the Enemies, of the Weakneſs of the Engliſh Towns in France, and encouraged them to aſſault them.

VI. That he had betrayed the Secrets of the Council to the Enemies of the State.

VII. That he had hindered the Concluſion of a Peace, by diſcovering the Weakneſs of England (1).

VIII. That he had made his Boaſts, in the hearing of ſeveral Lords, that his Credit at the French Court was no leſs, than at the Engliſh.

IX. That he had obſtructed the ſending of Succours to France, that the Enemies might make the greater Progreſs.

X. That he had included in the Treaty of Truce neither the King of Arragon, nor the Duke of Bretagne, and by that affected neglect, England had loſt thoſe two Allies.

The Duke's Defence.

The Duke of Suffolk anſwered theſe Accuſations, by a formal Denial of the greateſt Part, and required the Proofs. As to the Articles which he owned, he produced the King's expreſs Orders. But that was not ſufficient to juſtify him, ſince his chief Crime, was the abuſe of his Credit with the King, and his impoſing upon the Council. Hiſtorians remark, that he cleared himſelf from all but the laſt Article, relating to the Duke of Bretagne. Indeed, it is certain, in the firſt Treaty of Truce concluded at Tours, and in ſeveral ſubſequent Treaties to prolong it, the Duke of Bretagne was included only by France. This is a Myſtery, not very eaſy to be unravelled. The Duke of Bedford, as has been related, obliged the Duke of Bretagne to renounce the Alliance of Charles, and acknowledge Henry for King of France. Since that time, there had been no Rupture between England and Bretagne. And yet, Charles took care to comprize the Duke of Bretagne in the Treaty of Truce, concluded at Tours, whilſt the Engliſh mentioned him not. Was it through Negligence, Forgetfulneſs, or deſignedly? The laſt is moſt probable. However, the Duke of Suffolk had in ſome meaſure repaired this Error, by including the Duke of Bretagne as an Ally of England, in the prolongation of the Truce in 1447, as appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts. But that was not ſufficient, it ſeems, to ſatisfy his Enemies.

A Sedition in Kent. Hall.

The Queen perceiving that matters were like to go ill with the Duke, ordered it ſo, that the King ſent him to the Tower, not ſo much with deſign to puniſh him, as to give ſome appearance of Satisfaction to the Commons. Mean while, for fear they ſhould perſiſt in their Proſecution, ſhe cauſed the Parliament to be adjourned to Leiceſter (2). Preſently after (3), the Duke came out of the Tower, and reſumed his old Poſt at Court. The News of his releaſe raiſed a Sedition in Kent, headed by a Fuller (4). But before the Rebels could make any conſiderable attempt, the Ring-leaders were apprehended and executed, and by that means the Sedition was ſtifled in its Birth.

The Parliament fits again.

The Commons offended at the Duke of Suffolk's appearing. Stow. Blondi.

The Parliament being re-aſſembled at Leiceſter, the King and Queen appeared, attended by the Duke of Suffolk, as their Prime Miniſter. The Commons were extremely offended at this Proceeding, which they conſidered as a Bravado to them. To ſhew their Reſentment, they went in a Body and petitioned the King, that the Perſons, who had been inſtrumental in delivering Normandy (5) to the French, might be puniſhed according to their Demerits. The Queen was alarmed at this Petition. She found, the Commons were bent upon the Duke of Suffolk's Ruin, and that it was not poſſible to prevent it, without coming to an open Rupture with the Lower-Houſe. Wherefore, to ſave the Miniſter ſome part of the Puniſhment which, probably, was deſigned him, ſhe reſolved to prevent a formal Sentence, which could not but have been very rigorous in the preſent Juncture. A few days after this Petition, the King baniſhed the Duke for five Years, and removed all his Creatures. The Duke himſelf looking upon this Exile as a proper means to ſecure him from the Fury of the People, ſpeedily imbarked for France. But he could not eſcape his Deſtiny. He was met in his Paſſage by an Engliſh Ship, called the Nicholas, and the Captain ſearching the Duke's Veſſel, and finding him there, ordered his Head to be ſtruck off, without any farther Ceremony (6). Thus fell William de la Pole Duke of Suffolk, who a few days before, was the greateſt and moſt powerful Perſon in the Kingdom. It is uncertain, whether he was guilty of all the Crimes the Commons laid to his Charge. But it cannot be denied, that the diſaſters which, one after another, happened to the affairs of the Engliſh in France, are to be aſcribed to his ill Conduct; if it be true, that they are not to be deemed the Conſequences of a Plot, formed to deprive the King of all his Conqueſts in France.

The Duke of York aſpires to the Crown. Hall. Blondi.

By the Duke of Suffolk's death, the Duke of York ſaw himſelf freed from a powerful Enemy, who, being attached to the Houſe of Lancaſter, would, doubtleſs, have ſtrongly oppoſed the Execution of his deſigns. Though this Prince was in Ireland, his Friends effectually ſerved him in England, by extolling his Merit, and repreſenting to the People, the King's Incapacity, and the Queen's Male-Adminiſtration. Theſe Diſcourſes, joined to the entire loſs of Normandy, which happened at the ſame time, made deep Impreſſions on the Minds of the People, and daily increaſed the number of the Duke's Adherents. He had perfect Information of what paſſed. But not to hazard himſelf in vain, he deviſed an Expedient, which he thought proper to ſound the People's Inclinations, in order to take his meaſures with more Safety. By his Inſtigation, Jack Cade an Iriſhman, aſſumed the Name of John Mortimer, of the Houſe of March, executed in the beginning of this Reign. Under this borrowed Name he repaired into Kent (7), where the Duke of York had many Adherents, and drew together great Numbers of Malecontents, uſing for pretence, the neceſſity of reforming the Government, and eaſing the People. In the preſent diſpoſition of the greateſt Part of the Nation, with regard to the Court, the Rebels ſo increaſed, that in few days Cade ſaw himſelf in condition to incamp on Black-Heath, near London.

A few days after, they preſented to the Parliament two Petitions, ſetting forth the Grievances of the Nation. Among other things, they prayed, that the Duke of Somerſet might be puniſhed, as being the principal Author of the loſs of Normandy. That the King's Council might be filled with the Princes of the Blood, and other prudent and judicious Perſons, and not with vicious and profligate Men, of ill Principles and Manners, and uncapable of managing the affairs of the State. Theſe Petitions being communicated to the King, the Council condemned them as ſeditious, and reſolved to ſuppreſs the Rebellion by force of Arms. Whereupon, the King aſſembling a Body of fifteen thouſand Men, headed them himſelf, and marched againſt the Rebels. Cade is let into London. Stow.

At the ſame time, Cade began his march towards London (3), whilſt the King and the whole Court haſtily retired to Kenelworth Caſtle, leaving a Garriſon in the Tower, under the Command of the Lord Scales. Cade's Succeſs againſt Stafford increaſed his Army with Multitudes, who flocked from all Parts to join him. The City of London, either through fear, or ſome other Motive, opened her Gates to the Rebels, and Cade entered as it were in Triumph, at the head of his Troops. But he prohibited, under ſevere Penalties, the offering any Injury to the Inhabitants. Next day, being informed, that the Lord Say, High-Treaſurer, was in the City, he ordered him to be apprehended and beheaded (4). Towards the Evening, he retired to Southwark, on the other ſide of the Thames, and continued thus for ſome days, to enter the City in the Morning, and go out again at Night, on purpoſe to take from the Citizens all occaſion of fear.

He beheads the High-Treaſurer.

Quarrel between the Soldiers and Citizens. Fight on the Bridge. Hall. Stow.

Cade's Soldiers and the Londoners lived at firſt very friendly together. But at laſt, the Soldiers committing ſome Riot in the City, when they would have entered, according to Cuſtom, in the Morning (5), they found the Bridge-Gate ſhut againſt them. Whereupon a Battle enſued between them and the Citizens (6), which laſted all day, and ended at the approach of night, by a Ceſſation of Arms till the Morrow. Mean while, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Chancellor (7), who had taken refuge in the Tower, obſerving by their Spies, and the Proceedings of the Rebels, that their Hearts began to fail them, inſtantly drew up a general Pardon, put the Great-Seal to it, and cauſed it to be proclaimed in the Night, in Southwark. The Pardon produced ſo ſudden and ſurpriſing an Effect, that, before it was day, Cade found himſelf deſerted by his Followers, and forced to fly all alone, and conceal himſelf in the County of Suſſex. But the King promiſing, by Proclamation, a thouſand Marks to any Perſon that ſhould bring him dead or alive, he was ſlain in his retreat (8), by [Alexander Iden] a Gentleman of Kent, who brought his Body to London (9). The Pardon under the Great-Seal did not prevent the Execution of many of his Accomplices (10). Thus ended this dangerous Rebellion, which might have been attended with worſe Conſequences, had it been conducted by a more experienced Leader (11).

Continuation of the War in Normandy. Kiriel brings a Supply from England. He marches towards Caen. Hall.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in England, the War was continued in Normandy, but ſtill to the diſadvantage of the Engliſh. The Queen perceiving, the People's diſcontent partly ſprung from the ill Succeſs of the Affairs of France, had ſent fifteen hundred Men (12) to the Duke of Somerſet, under the Command of Sir Thomas Kiriel, who landed at Cherbourg. His deſign was to lead his Troops to Caen, where the Duke of Somerſet then was. But as it was dangerous to march with ſo ſmall a Body, he was joined upon the Road by ſeveral Detachments of the Engliſh Garriſons in thoſe Parts. The French Authors ſay, that by this Junction the Engliſh Army amounted to five thouſand Men (13), which however is not very likely. Be this as it will, the Conſtable Richemont hearing of Kiriel's deſign, ſpeedily drew together a Body of ſeven thouſand Men, and went and expected him at Fourmigni, through which he was to paſs. The two Armies engaging, the Engliſh, though inferior in Number, long defended themſelves with great Bravery. But at length, notwithſtanding their obſtinate reſiſtance, they were put to rout, and their General taken Priſoner (14). Upon comparing this Battle with a certain Prediction of the Maid of Orleans, that the Engliſh ſhould be entirely driven out of the Kingdom, by a defeat, much greater than thoſe of Orleans and Patay, one is inclined to believe, ſhe was not perfectly inſpired. For, in the Battle of Fourmigni, the only one ſince Joan's death, the Engliſh, even according to their Enemies Computation, were at moſt but five thouſand, and loſt but fifteen hundred (15). However, for the ſake of the Prophecy, the French Writers talk of the Battle of Fourmigni in very lofty Terms, comparing it to the moſt famous Battles.

Kiriel's Reinforcement being defeated, the Duke of Somerſet could no longer withſtand the victorious Arms of the French. It would be needleſs, to give a particular account of the Sieges carried on by the French in this ſecond Campain (16). It will ſuffice to ſay in a word, that about the middle of Auguſt, Charles ſaw himſelf maſter of all Normandy. The City of Caen was inveſted the 4th of June, and the 21ſt of the ſame Month, the Duke of Somerſet capitulated (17), againſt the Opinion of ſome of the Officers, who maintained, it was not yet time. Falaiſe (18), Domfront, and Cherbourg were beſieged at once, and the Campain ended in Normandy with the taking of Cherbourg (19), which ſurrendered the 12th of Auguſt. Thus in two Campains, Charles became maſter of the whole Province, without one ſingle Town remaining in the hands of the Engliſh.

The Duke of Somerſet ſurrenders Caen. Monſtrelet. J. Chartier. Hall.

The Parliament met at Weſtminſter the 6th of November, and about the ſame time, the Duke of Somerſet having nothing more to do in France came into England. He was blamed for the loſs of Normandy, and particularly of Caen, where he was accuſed of not having done his duty. Theſe Complaints were ſo publickly made, that the Commons could not help taking notice of them. They petitioned the King, to ſend the Duke of Somerſet to the Tower, that his Conduct might be examined. Henry not thinking proper to diſoblige the Commons at ſuch a Juncture, granted their requeſt. The Populace of London were ſo tranſported with Joy, when they heard the Duke was in the Tower, that they immediately riſe and plundered his Palace. They would have proceeded farther, if the King had not ſpeedily put out a Proclamation to diſperſe them. Nevertheleſs, ſome of the moſt audacious continued the Tumult, till one of the moſt inſolent was beheaded. The Parliament was no ſooner up, but the Duke of Somerſet was releaſed, and aſſumed, at Court, the Poſt enjoyed by the Duke of Suffolk.

The Engliſh not having been able to prevent the loſs of Normandy, were ſtill leſs able to defend Guienne, which was more remote. King Charles improving the preſent Juncture, had now ſent his Troops into that Province, where, this very year, his Generals took Bergerac, Genſac, Montferraud, Chalais, St. Foi, which made but a very faint Reſiſtance. The Seaſon being very far advanced, hindered them from purſuing their Conqueſts.

During the Winter, the Earl of Orval, of the Houſe of Albret, making Inroads to the very Gates of Bourdeaux, the Mayor ſallied out with ten thouſand Men to attack him. How inferior ſoever Orval might be in number of Troops, he ſtood his ground againſt this undiſciplined Militia, ſlew great part of them, and took many Priſoners.

1451. In April 1451, the Army of France, commanded by the Baſtard of Orleans, Earl of Dunois and Longueville, was forty thouſand ſtrong. This General preſently became maſter of Montguion in Saintonge. Then, May the 16th, he beſieged Blaye, and carried it the 21ſt. Not only, there was no Engliſh Army in the Field, but moreover, no manner of appearance, that the Court of England effectually thought of defending Guienne. He deſired to be tried by his Peers, in order to gain time; but Cade and his Accomplices, not admitting of this dilatory Plea, took him by force from the Officers, and hurrying him to the Standard in Cheap, cut off his Head, which they ſet on a Pole, and cauſed to be carried before them along the Streets. Bourdeaux and the reſt of Guienne treat with Charles. Monſtrelet.

The Inhabitants of Guienne ſeeing themſelves thus deſerted by the King of England, thought it time to provide for their Safety. The States of the Province being aſſembled at Bourdeaux in June, reſolved voluntarily to ſubmit to King Charles, and avoid the utter ruin they were threatned with. Purſuant to this Reſolution, they concluded, with the Earl of Dunois, a Treaty, promiſing to ſubmit to the Dominion of the King of France, if before the 24th of the ſame Month, they were not relieved by an Army able to give Battle. The French General could grant that Condition without apprehenſion, ſince he was well aſſured there was nothing ready in England, for the aſſiſtance of Guienne. The Army not appearing, all the Towns of the Duchy opened their Gates to the French, except Bayonne, which refuſed to be included in the Treaty. This Place, the only one the Engliſh had left, was inveſted the 6th of Auguſt. The Breach being large enough on the 19th of the ſame Month (1), the Beſiegers were preparing to ſtorm; but the Inhabitants ſaved them the trouble, by riſing in Arms, and obliging the Garriſon to capitulate. The French Hiſtorians ſay, that a white Croſs was ſeen in the Air, juſt over the Town, an evident Sign of God's Protection to France.

Guienne ſurrenders to Charles, except Bayonne; Which is forced to capitulate.

The Court's uneaſineſs with regard to the Duke of York.

Whilſt the Court of England careleſsly ſuffered Guienne to be loſt, they grew extremely uneaſy with regard to the Duke of York. As in the Kentiſh Rebellion, Jack Cade had aſſumed the Name of Mortimer, it was eaſy to perceive, his aim had been to ſound the People's Inclination to the Houſe of March. Conſequently it might be inferred, that he had been incouraged by the Duke of York, ſole Heir of that Family. Indeed the thing was palpable, but there was no Evidence to convict the Duke, becauſe Cade was ſlain. Beſides, in the People's Diſpoſition with regard to the Court, they would infallibly have joined with the Duke of York, if, by being publickly attacked, he had been forced to ſtand upon his Defence. Mean while, as he was ſuſpected of forming ſome Plot in Ireland, and of intending to bring an Army of Iriſh into England, the King ſent Orders to the Sheriffs of Wales, Shropſhire, and Cheſhire, to be in a readineſs to hinder his landing. This Precaution produced ſeveral ill Effects. In the firſt Place, it ſhewed, that the Court was afraid of the Duke of York, which it would have been proper to conceal, for fear of giving the People occaſion to inquire into the reaſon. In the next place, the Duke found it was his Buſineſs to be upon his guard; whereas, if the Court had feigned not to know his deſigns, they might have drawn him into ſome Snare, or given him room to make ſome falſe Step, which would have given them an advantage. In fine, he was thereby furniſhed with a pretence to complain, ſince he was ſo far from being convicted of any Project againſt the King, that he had not taken any apparent Step, on which an Accuſation could be grounded. Accordingly, he wrote to the King, complaining of this Suſpicion, which he feigned to look upon as extremely injurious, and as a mere pretence intended for his ruin. The King ſent him a very civil anſwer, giving him ſome ſort of ſatisfaction, but revoked not his Orders.

The King orders his Landing to be oppoſed. Stow.

Ill effect of this precaution.

The Duke complains to the King. His Anſwer.

The Duke perſiſts in his deſigns in ſpite of all difficulties.

Though Cade's Enterprize had miſcarried, the Duke of York had reaped the Benefit he propoſed. The great number of People that embarked in it, diſcovered how much the Nation was diſpleaſed with the Queen and the Miniſtry, and that the Memory of the Rights of the Houſe of March was not entirely aboliſhed. So, inſtead of being diſcouraged, he entertained freſh hopes. He judged, if the Shadow only of one of his Family was capable of cauſing ſo great a Multitude to take Arms, much more would the People be attached to a Prince of the Blood-Royal, ſole Heir of this Houſe. Mean while, not to be too haſty in the execution of a Project of ſuch Conſequence, he reſolved, before any thing was attempted, to conſult his Friends. The time of his Government of Ireland being expired, he embarked for England, but when he would have landed in Wales, found at the Port the Militia in Arms ready to oppoſe him. He landed, notwithſtanding, at another Place, which was not ſo ſtrongly guarded. He did this the more boldly, as he had only his own Servants with him, and had yet given his Enemies no hold. After that, he repaired to London, from whence the Court was gone ſome time before in Progreſs to the weſtern Counties. 1451.

He returns to England. Biondi.

The Duke of York was impatiently expected at London. His Friends had frequently conferred together in his Abſence, but could not come to any Reſolution without him. His principal Adherents were, John Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, Richard Nevil Earl of Salisbury, Son-in-law to the General of the ſame Name (2), ſlain before Orleans, Richard Nevil his Son, who was ſhortly after Earl of Warwick, by his Marriage with Anne Beauchamp Daughter of the Earl of Warwick who died in France, Thomas Courtney Earl of Devonſhire, though Brother-in-law of the Duke of Somerſet (3), and Edward Brook Baron of Cobham (4). With theſe Lords, the Duke, immediately after his arrival, concerted Meaſures to accompliſh his deſigns. The reſult of their Conſultations was, that the Duke ſhould retire into Wales, where the Family of March had always had a great Intereſt; That he ſhould privately be aſſured of ſeaſonably raiſing an Army, by means of his Friends; That he ſhould then write to the King, to advertiſe him of the People's diſlike of the Miniſtry, and particularly of the Duke of Somerſet.

He concerts meaſures with his friends. Biondi.

Stow.

In purſuance of this Reſolution, the Duke repairing into Wales, and taking all his meaſures, writ to the King, "that all the Kingdom was diſſatisfied, becauſe Traitors "were ſcreened from Juſtice, and that he took the free- "dom to adviſe him to prevent the ill Conſequences of "this diſcontent. That the ſpeedieſt means was to order "the guilty to be brought to their Trial, and particu- "larly the Duke of Somerſet, who having been impeached "by the Commons, was reſtored to Favour without any "Examination. In fine, that if he would give the Na- "tion this Satisfaction, he offered to aſſiſt in the Execu- "tion of ſo good a deſign." The Miniſtry eaſily perceived, the Duke of York ſought an occaſion of quarrel. But as in their preſent ſituation, they durſt not act haughtily, it was judged proper, the King ſhould ſend the Duke a civil anſwer, which would diſappoint him of the pretence he wanted. Accordingly the King in his Letter told him, he had reſolved ſome time ſince to reform whatever was amiſs in the Government; and for that purpoſe intended to appoint a certain number of virtuous and able Counſellors, of whom he was deſigned to be one: That as for the Traitors mentioned in his Letter, he did not mean to let them go unpuniſhed, but the affair being of very great Conſequence, required mature Deliberation: That as for the Duke of Somerſet in particular, he ſhould not be excuſed from anſwering the Accuſations laid to his Charge.

He retires into Wales, and writes to the King to reform the Government. Stow.

The King ſends him a mild anſwer. Ibid.

Though this anſwer deprived the Duke of York of all pretence to take Arms, he imagined however, the King's bare refuſal to remove or puniſh the Miniſters complained of, was a ſufficient Warrant. He did not expect ſo mild an anſwer. Mean while, as he had taken his meaſures to raiſe an Army, he did not think proper to break them, or ſuffer himſelf to be decoyed by a Moderation which might be as well feigned as real. So, putting himſelf at the head of his Army, he marched towards London. But he found the Queen had not been ſo negligent as he expected. Upon notice of the Duke's retiring into Wales, ſhe had ordered Troops to be levied in the King's Name, without diſcovering however for what they were intended. The Duke therefore was no ſooner upon the march, but he heard the King was advancing (5) to give him Battle. Though he wanted neither Courage nor Experience, he thought he ſhould not venture a Battle with the King, without having a more plauſible Pretence than what he would have covered his deſigns with. His aim was to gain the People; but to fight the King without a more ſpecious reaſon, was not the way to compaſs his ends, though he could even have been ſure of Victory. Beſides, looking upon the City of London as able to incline the Balance to his ſide, he judged that, before all things, he ought to ſecure that Metropolis. For this reaſon, when he heard the King was coming againſt him, he ſuddenly altered his rout, and by ſpeedy Marches got before him, and appeared before London, where he expected to be received with open Arms. But he had the mortification to find the Gates ſhut, the Inhabitants not thinking proper to declare for him, whilſt the King was ſo cloſely purſuing him with

The King ſends to know why the Duke had taken up Arms. Hall.

The two Armies being ſo near one another, that nothing could prevent an Engagement, the King ſent two Biſhops (2), to know of the Duke what had induced him to appear in Arms. As the Duke ſaw himſelf diſappointed of his hopes to gain London, he thought it adviſeable to ſhow ſome regard for the Court, for fear of ruining his Affairs by haſty Reſolutions. In this Belief he anſwered, he had never intended to forſake his Allegiance to the King, but only to remove from his Perſon evil Counſellors, of whom the Duke of Somerſet was the chief; and if the King would put him into ſafe Cuſtody, till he ſhould in Parliament anſwer to what was objected againſt him, he was ready to diſmiſs his Troops. He did not expect, his demand would be granted, ſince the King and Queen were ſolely guided by the Counſels of Him, who was moſt concerned to have it rejected. He hoped thereby to throw all the Blame on the Court, and demonſtrate to the People, that the Miniſtry did not ſcruple to expoſe the Kingdom to a Civil War, for the ſake of a Man odious to the Nation.

The Duke offers to ſubmit if Somerſet is ſent back to the Tower. Hall. Stow.

He is taken at his Word.

But for once he was the dupe of his own Policy. The King took him at his word, promiſed to ſend his Enemy to the Tower, and even ordered him to be immediately arreſted. The Duke of York was ſurprized at this Condeſcenſion. He would have been very glad to recede from his Engagement. But as he could not do it without laying himſelf too open, he thought he ſhould run ſome risk, rather than hazard the Loſs of the People's Good-Will, on which he built all his Expectations. So, without Heſitation, he disbanded his Troops (3) and came to Court, not vouchſafing even to take any Precaution for his Safety. When he was in the King's Preſence, he accuſed the Duke of Somerſet with great Warmth, and endeavoured to perſwade the King, that he was a Traitor, and had ſacrificed the Intereſt of the Kingdom to his Ambition and Avarice. Upon theſe Words, the Duke of Somerſet, who was concealed behind the Hangings, ſuddenly ſtept forth to anſwer him, and accuſed him of conſpiring him to dethrone the King. The Duke of York ſeeing his Enemy before him, and in the King's Apartment, whom he thought in ſafe Cuſtody, found he was amuſed, and perceived his Danger. Nevertheleſs, without ſhowing any Concern, he modeſtly complained of the King's Breach of Promiſe, by the Suggeſtions of the Duke of Somerſet, on whom he caſt the Baſeneſs of this Fraud. Immediately after, the King diſmiſſed the Duke of York, and ordered him to be apprehended as ſoon as he was out of his Preſence (4).

He diſmiſſes his Troops, and comes and accuſes the Duke of Somerſet. who ſuddenly appears and accuſes him. Hall. Biondi.

The Duke of York is apprehended.

Reaſons which hindered the Court from putting him to Death. Hall. fol. 164.

If the Duke of York's Enemies had dared to gratify their Reſentment, he would never have freed himſelf from the Snare he had imprudently fallen into. But the Poſture of Affairs, and the Diſpoſition of the People, affording juſt Occaſion of Fear, they durſt not proceed againſt him. Two other reaſons helped likewiſe to ſave him. It was rumoured at Court, that the young Earl of March his Son, attended by all the Friends of his Family, was advancing with a ſtrong Body of Troops to deliver his Father. So, for fear the Duke's Army, which was lately disbanded, ſhould join his Son's Troops, the Court was obliged to take a more gentle Courſe. On the other hand, the Gaſcons had ſent Deputies to the King, to offer to reduce Guienne to his Obedience, if he would ſend them Supplies. At ſuch a Juncture it was believed, as the Duke of York's Blood could not be ſpilt without involving the King-in a Civil War, there would be a Neceſſity of detaining the Troops intended for Guienne, and thereby a favorable Opportunity loſt of recovering that Province. Theſe Conſiderations induced the Queen and Duke of Somerſet to give the Duk of York his Liberty, though their own, the King's, and the whole Houſe of Lancaſter's Intereſt, required he ſhould be ſacrificed to their Safety. Perhaps all the Calamities, England afterwards indured, might by that means have been prevented. However, as the Queen and Miniſters were willing, as far as in them lay, to ſecure themſelves againſt his Deſigns, they obliged him to take an Oath to the King, whereby he ſwore to remain his faithful Subject till Death, and never to take Arms againſt him. This done, the Duke of York retired to his Caſtle of Wigmore (5), and the Duke of Somerſet enjoyed, without a Rival, the Authority he had acquired at Court. 1452.

Whilſt Henry was employed at home, in oppoſing the Attempts of the Duke of York, Charles had no leſs an Enemy to encounter in his own Kingdom. The Dauphin his Son, a Prince of a turbulent Temper, created him great Uneaſineſs by his Behaviour towards him. For ſome time paſt he had reſided in Dauphiné, where he acted as Sovereign, regardleſs of the King his Father's Orders, executing them no farther than he pleaſed. He had even the Raſhneſs, to demand of the Duke of Savoy his Daughter Violante in Marriage; and the Duke complied with his Requeſt, without either vouchſafing to acquaint the King with the Matter. Provoked at this Proceeding, Charles put himſelf at the head of thirty thouſand Men, and marched towards Lyons, bent upon chaſtiſing his Son, and puniſhing the Duke of Savoy's Preſumption. But the Revolution which happened at the ſame time in Guienne, cauſed him to take other Meaſures.

Quarrel between King Charles and the Dauphin.

The Gaſcons, who had been for three hundred Years, without interruption, under the Dominion of the Kings of England, had ſubmitted to King Charles, only becauſe they were neglected by the Engliſh. As ſoon as the French Army had quitted Guienne, the Lords of the Country, in concert with the Inhabitants of Bourdeaux, reſolved to return to their antient Sovereigns (6). For that purpoſe, they deputed the Lords of Candale and l' Eſparre, to contrive the means at London. The Troubles raiſed by the Duke of York, had for ſome time hindered the Court from attending to this Affair. But when they were appeaſed, the Queen and Council, after mature deliberation, judged that nothing ſhould be neglected to accompliſh the Enterprize. The Succeſs, they expected, might redeem their Credit, and gain them an Intereſt with the People, which they wanted to ſupport themſelves againſt their Enemies. Talbot, the valiant Earl of Shrewsbury, who was returned from a Voyage into Italy, was choſen for this Expedition. Though he was fourſcore Years old, he readily accepted an Employment, which gave him Opportunity, once more, before his Death, to do his King and Country a conſiderable Service. As Diligence was abſolutely neceſſary, he embarked what Troops were ready, conſiſting of ſeven hundred Men at Arms (7), upon a promiſe that the reſt deſigned for him ſhould quickly follow. He failed the 18th of October, and on the 21ſt landed near Bourdeaux. Next Day he appeared before the City, and as every thing was prepared to receive him, he was introduced at a Gate of which the Citizens had the Guard. The French Garriſon, who had not heard of his Arrival, ſurprized at this unexpected Accident, would have retired at another Gate, but were almoſt all taken.

The promiſed Reinforcement being arrived from England a few Days after (8), the Earl of Shrewsbury took the Field at the head of ſeven thouſand Men. Charles, who was then at Lyons, hearing this ill News, did not think proper to perſiſt in the Execution of the deſign he had formed. The Affair of Guienne ſeemed to him of greater Importance. At the ſame time, he reſolved to ſend all his Troops into Guienne the next Spring. Mean while, he diſpatched before a Body of ten thouſand Men, under the Command of Chabanes, and the Earl of Pontievre. Theſe two Generals being arrived in Saintonge, beſieged Chalais and Caſtillon, whilſt the Earl of Clermont followed them, with the reſt of the Army deſigned for Guienne. Chabanes was taken up with the Siege of Chalais till June, after which, he joined Pontievre before Caſtillon, which ſtill made a vigorous Defence. He was desirous to relieve the Place, but was afraid of meeting many difficulties, as well by reason of the Intrenchments of the French, as of the Superiority of their Number. On the other hand, knowing the Earl of Clermont was advancing with all speed, he considered, it must be done, before the Arrival of these fresh Troops, after which, it would be too late, since he would have all the Forces of France to oppose. In fine, having taken this last Resolution, he left Bourdeaux with all his Army, and approaching the French Camp, attacked them with the same Vigour, the English had shown at the Battle of Azincourt, and on several other Occasions. He soon defeated four thousand Men, commanded by Chabanes without the Intrenchments, drove them into the Camp, and, in spite of the Besiegers Canon, which swept away his Men by whole Files, forced their Lines, and entered with the flying Troops. Thus the English relate it. But the French only say, the Lines were like to be forced, when the English were attacked in the Rear by a Body of French Horse. This cooled their Ardor, and obliged their General to discontinue the Attack of the Lines, and face those that pressed him behind. This Motion gave the French an opportunity to draw all their Troops out of the Camp. So, the Earl of Shrewsbury, who had not above five thousand Men left, was reduced to the Necessity of making two Fronts, and withstanding ten thousand. At length, the English finding themselves overpowered by Numbers, began to give ground. At the same time, the Earl of Shrewsbury was wounded in the Thigh with a Musquet-Ball, and his Horse killed under him. In this Condition, not being able, by reason of his Wound, to remount, he bid Sir John Talbot (1) his Son to retire, and save himself for another Occasion, where he might be still serviceable to his Country. But Talbot rather than basely fly, chose to die by the Earl his Father, who also, presently after, resigned his last Breath. The English lost two thousand Men, but their most considerable loss was their General (2).

After this Defeat, Castillon surrendered the 16th of July (3). A few Days after, the Earl of Clermont being arrived, and the King come to the Camp, the Army was divided into four Bodies, which besieged at once Cadillac, Libourne, Fronsac, and Bourdeaux. Fronsac and Libourne resisted only a few Days; but the Castle of Cadillac maintained a Siege of two Months. After the taking of that Place, the whole Army joined before Bourdeaux, which capitulated the 17th of October, and the Garrison had liberty to return into England. Thus, of so many Conquests made by the English in France, since Edward III, there remained only Calais and Guisnes; poor remains of so many Provinces, several whereof, had belonged to their Kings by Hereditary Right, and the rest were acquired by so many Victories, and at the Expence of so much Blood!

Reports to the Queen's Disadvantage.

Whilst the French were thus successfully carrying on the War in Guienne, Henry was seized at London (4), with a long and dangerous Sickness, which often gave occasion to believe he would never recover. At the same time, the Queen was delivered, on the 23d of October (5), of a Prince christened Edward. This Prince was inauspiciously born, since it was at the very time, the English lost all their Possessions in France. His Birth gave rise to several Reports, injurious to the Queen's Honour. There were some so hardy as to say publickly, he was not the King's Son. Others maintained, he was suppositious, because the Queen had never before been with Child, though married nine Years. In fine, some there were, who, without questioning the Queen's Honour or Honesty, took occasion from this Prince's Birth to hope well for the future. Their Reason was, because the Queen, having a Son, would be more firmly attached to the Interest of England, thereby plainly intimating, what they thought of her former Conduct.

1453. The Civil War is renewed in England. Hall. Stow.

The War in France, which had lasted thirty-eight Years, being ended, the remaining Events of this Reign, consist only of the Quarrels between the Houses of Lancaster and York; the first of which, had for Device, a Red, and the other a White, Rose. These Devices are famous for the vast Torrents of English Blood, shed upon their Account. The Troubles raised by the Duke of York, seemed entirely suppressed, since his Reconciliation with the King; but they were quickly renewed with so much more Fury, as the English were no longer diverted by a foreign War. I am going to give as brief an Account as possible, of the Events occasioned by the Duke of York's Pretensions, which ended at length, in the Ruin of the King, and the whole House of Lancaster.

The Rights of the Houses of York and Lancaster.

The Duke of York had renewed his Oath to the King; but it was only to free himself from the danger, his Imprudence had thrown him into. He was no less resolved to maintain his Pretensions, and take the advantage of the King's Incapacity, and the People's Disaffection for the Queen and her Ministers. To consider only the Laws and Customs of the Realm, his Title was indisputable. He was descended from the third Son (7) of Edward III, whereas, Henry came only from the fourth Son (8) of the same Prince. It is true, it was by a Daughter, but there was no such thing in England as the Salic Law, to exclude him upon that account. On the contrary, in the Reign of Richard II, Roger Earl of March, his Grandfather by the Mother's Side, was declared by the Parliament, Presumptive Heir of the Crown, in case Richard died without Issue. And even since the House of Lancaster was on the Throne, the Parliament, as was related in the Reign of Henry IV, had confirmed by a solemn Act, the Right of the Daughters and their Descendants. And yet, Henry VI, was no Usurper. It was now above fifty Years, since the House of Lancaster had held the Crown, by the Authority of the Parliament, who settled it on the Family of Henry IV. So, the Duke of York could pretend to the Crown, only on Supposition, that the Parliament had not power to alter the Succession. For this Reason, he could not openly discover his Intention, without directly attacking the Privileges of the Parliament, of which the English Nation has ever been jealous. Besides, he stood in need of the Parliament to succeed in his design. But how could he gain the Parliament to his Side, if he offered to question the Validity of their Acts? On the other hand, he was to break through a fifty years Possession, confirmed by the unanimous Consent of the People, and become still more authentick by the glorious Advantages, procured the Nation by the late King Henry V.

Difficulties of the Duke of York's Attempt.

His Advantages.

These Obstacles were sufficient to divert the Duke of York from his Enterprize, if, on the other hand, the present Conjunctures had not encouraged him to pursue it. Henry was a Prince unable of himself, to oppose the Duke's Efforts against him. Though he was not hated by the People, he was little esteemed. He was looked upon but as the Shadow of a King, who only lent his Name to the Queen and his Ministers. Nevertheless, the sole Name of King, would have been capable to keep the People in subjection to those that were at the Helm, had they not made an ill use of their Power, as is too commonly done by those, who are in the like Station. But the Authority usurped by the Queen, and the Duke of Somerset, was not the only Cause of the Discontent of the English. When they considered, that all the Conquests of Henry V, and Guienne it self, which had been for three hundred Years, under the Dominion of England, were lost in a few Years, they could not forbear casting the Blame upon those, that governed in the King's Name. Normandy had been taken from England, in two Campains only, under the Duke of Somerset's Regency, whilst he was actually on the Spot to defend it. He was accused likewise, of having been too hasty in surrendering Caen. On the other hand, it was considered, that during the Regency of the Duke of Gloucester, the Affairs of France were kept upon a tolerable Foot; and yet, the Queen to gratify her Passion, had dispatched that Prince out of the Way, in a base and violent Manner, and thereby, been the Occasion of all the subsequent Losses. So, the King was looked upon as a Prince, uncapable of retrieving

1453. retrieving the Honour of the Nation, and reſtoring the Affairs of the Kingdom to a flouriſhing State; the Queen as too well affected to France, and graſping at the whole Authority in England; and the Duke of Somerſet as a greedy Miniſter, who ſought only to enrich himſelf at the Expence of the Publick. It was farther, and loudly complained, that to preſerve his Authority, the Duke filled the higheſt Poſts with his Creatures, without any Regard to their Merit and Parts. This laſt Article made a deep Impreſſion on the Minds of the People. They could not, without Indignation, ſee the Council filled with vicious Perſons, and all the Places of the Kingdom poſſeſſed by Men of no Principles. This gave occaſion to ſuſpect, that the Queen's and Miniſtry's Aim, was to hinder Religion, Honour, Virtue, Love of one's Country, from inducing thoſe, that were in the publick Poſts, to oppoſe the Abuſes and Diſorders, ſpread over the Kingdom. This Diſpoſition of the People gave the Duke of York ſo great Advantages, that he thought, he ſhould improve them, not by acting directly for himſelf, but under colour of procuring the Good of the People, in obliging the King to make uſe of other Miniſters. He knew, if he could remove his Enemies from the Council, and introduce his Creatures, it would not be difficult to purſue the Execution of his Deſigns.

The Earl of Salisbury and Warwick chief Friends of the Duke of York. Hall.

An undertaking of this Nature could not be accompliſhed, without the Aſſiſtance of Friends; and therefore, he ingaged ſeveral Lords in his Plot, ſome under colour of turning out the Duke of Somerſet, who was generally hated and envied; others, by diſcovering to them his moſt ſecret Purpoſes. Among theſe laſt, the two Nevils, Father and Son, were the Principal. The Father, who bore the Title of Earl of Salisbury, was eminent for his Virtues and conſummate Prudence. The Earl of Warwick his Son, was univerſally eſteemed for his Valour, and adored by the People for his ingaging Behaviour (1). He knew how to carry himſelf ſo well, that he ſeemed to have ſolely in View, the Welfare and Glory of the Nation (2). Hitherto, he had affected, between the two Parties, a Neutrality, which by rendering him agreeable to the People, had taken from the Miniſters, not only all pretence of deſtroying him, but even all occaſion of ſuſpecting him. Theſe two Lords, with ſome others, conſulting with the Duke of York, concerning the Means to accompliſh his Project, agreed, it was not yet time to diſcover his Intention; that, on the contrary, he ſhould behave very ſubmiſſively to the King, in order to efface the ill Impreſſions, his former Conduct might have made in the People. The Frankneſs wherewith he had disbanded his Troops, and his new Oath to the King, were exceeding proper to inſtill a Belief, that he had no ill Deſign.

The Duke of York conſults with his Friends.

Advice given the Queen and Duke of Somerſet for their Ruin.

The Parliament had been ſummoned to Reading, but by reaſon of the King's relapſe, it was adjourned to Weſtminſter, for February the 14th (3). In this Interval, the Duke of York's private Friends, who pretended to be of the Court Party, intimated to the Queen, and the Duke of Somerſet, that in the preſent Diſpoſition of the People, it was to be feared, the Parliament would come to very diſagreeable Reſolutions: That whilſt the King was in Health, they could act in his Name, becauſe all Orders were ſuppoſed to iſſue from him; but that the Caſe was not the ſame, during his Sickneſs: That their Authority being wholly grounded upon the King's Will, there was reaſon to fear, that the Royal Will no longer appearing, the Parliament would nominate other Governours: That therefore, it was proper to admit into the Council the Duke of York, the two Nevils, and ſome other of the moſt popular Lords, in order to ſhow, that thoſe who governed, did not ſeek to ingroſs all the Power. This Advice was built upon ſuch plauſible Reaſons, that the Queen and the Favorite could not help falling into the Snare. So, the Duke of York, the two Nevils, and ſome others of their Cabal, were called to the Council before the Parliament met. They were no ſooner admitted, but they became Superior, ſo that thoſe, who before managed all, had no longer any Credit.

The Duke of Somerſet ſent to the Tower. Hall.

The firſt notable Step of theſe new Counſellors, was to arreſt the Duke of Somerſet in the Queen's Bed-chamber, and ſend him to the Tower. Mean while, the Parliament was farther prorogued to the 15th of March, to give the Duke of York and his Friends time to concert Meaſures with the Members. Two Days before the meeting of the Parliament, the Council impowered the Duke of York to hold it in the King's Name. In the beginning of the Seſſion, the Commons ſent to the Houſe of Lords an Accuſation againſt the Duke of Somerſet, for ſuffering Normandy to be loſt, during his Regency, and by his Fault. April the 2d, the Great-Seal was given to the Earl of Salisbury. Next day, the Parliament appointed the Duke of York, Protector of the Realm, Defender of the Church, and firſt Counſellor of the King; with this Limitation, till the young Prince Edward the King's Son was of Age, to exerciſe that high Office. Hence it appears, firſt, that it was believed, the King's Indiſpoſition would laſt as long as he lived, and that it affected his Underſtanding more than his Body. In the next place, by reſerving this Office for a Child of ſix Months, who was to exerciſe it when of Age, the Parliament ſhowed their Intention to preſerve entire, the Rights of the Houſe of Lancaſter, though the Duke of York was declared Protector. Generally, on theſe occaſions, there is too much or too little done, and from thence, ſpring Civil Wars. If the Parliament had openly declared againſt the Houſe of Lancaſter, very likely, at ſuch a Juncture, it would have found but few Friends. On the other hand, if inſtead of placing the Duke of York ſo near the Throne, care had been taken to check his Ambition, which was but too manifeſt, doubtleſs, he would have loſt many of his Adherents, and perhaps, the Civil War, which laid waſte the Kingdom, been avoided. But it is very hard for a Parliament at ſuch Junctures to act with Freedom, and according to Reaſon and Equity.

1454. The Duke of York is made Protector, Act. Pub. XI. p. 346. Cotton's Abridg.

The Duke of York having all the Power in his own Hands, removed the Duke of Somerſet, who was ſtill in the Tower, from the Government of Calais, and by the King's Letters Patent, placed himſelf in his Room. Every one imagined, the Accuſation againſt the impriſoned Duke would be vigorouſly proſecuted. But the Affair was ſuffered to lye dormant, and ſeemingly unregarded, all the reſt of the Year. Probably, the Evidences againſt him appeared inſufficient.

and Governor of Calais. Act. Pub. XI. p. 351, 359.

In the beginning of the Year 1455, the King finding himſelf ſomething recovered of his long Illneſs, the Authority conferred on the Duke of York ceaſed of courſe, ſince it was wholly founded on the King's Inability, by reaſon of his Indiſpoſition, to govern the Kingdom himſelf. The Duke of York's Matters were not ſufficiently ripe, to enable him to diſpute with the King, the Right of reſuming his Authority, though it was in effect, only to replace it in the Hands of the Queen. The firſt Effect of this Change, was the Duke of Somerſet's Releaſe. On the 5th of February the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Wiltſhire (4), and two Knights (5), offering to be his Pledges, their offer was accepted, and the Governour of the Tower was ordered to releaſe the Priſoner. A Month after, theſe Lords were diſcharged from their Sureties, without any Sentence intervening. As the Duke was apprehended by Order of Council, it was ſuppoſed, he could be releaſed by the ſame Authority. But there was much to be ſaid againſt this Suppoſition. The Impeachment of the Houſe of Commons ſince intervening, it could not be pretended, that the King had Power to releaſe him before he was legally acquitted. However, the Court had no regard to this Reaſon. After the King had reſumed the Government, the Duke of York, and his Party, had no longer any Credit in the Council, where the Queen, and the Duke of Somerſet, bore an abſolute Sway. So prevalent was the King's bare Name to give a new Turn to Affairs.

Mean while, ſome of the moſt prudent Lords, dreading the ill Conſequences of the Quarrel between the two Dukes, endeavoured to reconcile them. It was the Intereſt of both to ſhow, that they acted not from ambitious Motives; for their Aim was to gain the People. Wherefore, they both conſented to chuſe Arbitrators, and ſubmit to their Deciſion, under Penalty, for him that refuſed, of paying to the other twenty thouſand Marks. But it was on condition, that the Sentence of the Arbitrators ſhould be pronounced before the 20th of June.

Whilſt People were in Expectation of this Sentence, the Duke of Somerſet repreſented to the King, that he was removed from the Government of Calais, upon a bare Accuſation, that was never determined; and it was not juſt, his Adverſary ſhould remain cloathed with his Spoils, ſince their Difference was not yet decided. Upon this Remonſtrance, the King took from the Duke of York, the Government, he had conferred on him for ſeven Years. Then under colour of obſerving a perfect Neutrality between the two Rivals, he declared himſelf Governor of Calais. In the Act, whereby the Duke of York was removed, it was ſaid to be done, at the Duke's own Requeſt. But the Duke taking it as a heinous Affront, withdrew from Court, where he found his Affairs began to be in an ill Situation.

He retires into Wales, and raiſes an Army. Hall.

He retired into Wales, not only to ſcreen himſelf from the Attempts of his Enemies, but with deſign to levy an Army, and have it in his Power to attack them. He was very ſenſible, the Queen and the Duke of Somerſet being abſolute Maſters of the King's Perſon, had an advantage, of which, nothing but Force could deprive them. So, without farther Conſideration, he reſolved to take Arms. The Court's Proceedings in releaſing the Duke of Somerſet, without giving the Nation any Satisfaction, made him imagine, he ſhould be ſtrongly ſupported, when he came to uſe that Pretence. He was not deceived in his Expectations. In a ſhort Space, he ſaw himſelf at the Head of a numerous Army (1), and in condition to make head againſt the King, who had likewiſe prepared himſelf, and was marching directly towards him to give him Battle. The two Armies met near St. Albans, on a level Ground, where nothing hindered their ingaging. The Duke of York, to ſhow, he had taken Arms ſolely for the Good of the Publick, ſent and offered the King to diſmiſs his Troops, if the Duke of Somerſet was delivered to Juſtice, to be condemned if Guilty, or acquitted if Innocent. But the Court knowing, this to be only a vain Pretence, and that one time or other, the Quarrel muſt be decided by Arms, rejected the offer, and the Battle was fought the 31ſt of May (2).

The Earl of Warwick, who commanded the Duke of York's Vanguard, expecting this Anſwer, attacked the King's Army, whilſt the Court was waiting for new Propoſals from the Male-Contents. This Attack, which was as vigorous as ſudden, put the Royal Army into ſuch a diſorder, that it was not in the Duke of Somerſet's Power to repair it. At the ſame time, the Duke of York improving this Advantage, advanced likewiſe from his Quarter, not to give the Enemies time to recover themſelves. He preſſed them ſo briskly, that the Royal Army was defeated in few Moments, with loſs of five thouſand Men (3), without making any conſiderable Reſiſtance. The Duke of Somerſet was killed on the Spot, with the Earl of Northumberland (4), the Earl of Stafford, eldeſt Son of the Duke of Buckingham, the Lord Clifford, and ſeveral other Lords and Officers of Note (5), all firmly attached to the Houſe of Lancaſter. The Duke of Buckingham receiving a Wound, retired out of the Battle (6), and by his retreat, completed the diſorder among the King's Troops.

Mean time, the King, who was wounded in the Neck with an Arrow, ſeeing himſelf deſerted in the Rout of his Army, retired to a little Houſe, which was preſently inveſted. The Duke of York having notice of it, poſted thither with the Earl of Salisbury, and preſenting themſelves before him on their Knees, told him, ſince the publick Enemy was dead, he ſaw none there but Perſons ready to obey him in whatever he ſhould pleaſe to command them. The King, upon theſe Words, recovering a little from his Fright, cauſed by the Duke's Approach, intreated him, for God's ſake, to put a ſtop to the Slaughter, aſſuring him, he was ready to give him all the Satisfaction he could reaſonably deſire. Whereupon, the Duke ordered a Retreat to be ſounded, and the Army enjoined to ſhed no more Blood. Then, he conducted the King to St. Albans, from whence they returned together to London (7). 1455.

The Parliament meets. Cotton's Abridg. Hall. Stow.

Shortly after, Henry called a Parliament, which met in July (8). The King being then relapſed, the Duke of York was commiſſioned to hold it in his Name. The Parliament, which, at ſuch a Juncture, could ſcarce be compoſed of any but the Duke of York's Adherents, made the following Declaration. "That the Government had been "ill-managed by the Queen, and the Duke of Somerſet, "who had abuſed the King's Goodneſs and Confidence: "That the late Duke of Gloceſter had been unjuſtly ac-"cuſed: That all the Alienations of the Crown-lands "made ſince the firſt Year of the preſent Reign, ſhould "be revoked: That the Duke of York, the Earls of Salis-"bury and Warwick, or any that had liſted under their "Banners, were not guilty of Rebellion in taking Arms "againſt the King, ſince it was neceſſary to free his Per-"ſon from Captivity: That, on the contrary, the Blame "was to be laid on the Duke of Somerſet and his Adhe-"rents, who concealed from the King, the Duke of York's "Letter, which might have prevented theſe Diſorders." and condemns the Queen's and Somerſet's Management, and juſtifies the Duke of York.

The King is petitioned to name a Protector.

Then, the Parliament petitioned the King to nominate a Protector, becauſe of his Indiſpoſition, which hindered him from attending to the Affairs of the Publick. This Petition was repeated ſeveral times (9), without the King's returning an Anſwer. Not that he had reſolved to reject it. He was no more at Liberty to follow his own Councils, than when he was under the Guardianſhip of the Queen, and the Duke of Somerſet. But the Duke of York had a mind this Nomination ſhould not appear forced. At length, the Parliament being prorogued to the 12th of November, on the very Day, the King ſigned a Patent wherein he ſaid, That having been frequently petitioned by his Parliament to nominate a Protector, he appointed the Duke of York for that important Employ, till he ſhould be removed by the Parliament, or the young Prince of Wales capable of exerciſing it (10). Then, after a Month's Seſſion, the Parliament was prorogued to the 14th of January.

1456. Project againſt the Duke of York. Hall.

Whilſt the Duke of York thus enjoyed the Advantage he had gained upon his Enemies, theſe were not idle. The Queen, who knew his deſigns, was too much concerned, as well for her own, as the King's, and her Son's ſake, not to try to diſappoint them. Henry Duke of Somerſet (11), Son of him ſlain at St. Albans, and the Duke of Buckingham, were equally deſirous of revenging, the one his Son's, the other his Father's Death. In fine, all the Princes and Lords allied to the Houſe of Lancaſter, or attached to its Intereſt, ſeeing the Duke of York taking large Steps towards the Throne, were prepared to uſe their utmoſt Endeavours to ſtop his Progreſs. Mean while, the Duke of York lived in a Security which aſtoniſhed his very Enemies. He perceived, it would be very dangerous, openly to aſpire to a Crown, which had been Fifty-ſix Years in the Houſe of Lancaſter. Wherefore he choſe to wait, till time ſhould produce a favorable opportunity to proſecute his Right. Above all things, he wanted to gain the People's Affection, without which he was ſatisfied, all his Endeavours would be fruitleſs. So, to demonſtrate, he was not ſwayed by Paſſion or Intereſt, he left the King and Queen at full Liberty. He imagined, it was not in their Power to deprive him of the Protectorſhip, which, according to his Patent, he was to enjoy till removed by the Parliament. But he had to deal with an able and enterpriſing Princeſs, who was not diſcouraged at the Obſtacles ſhe met in her way.

His Unconcernedneſs prejudicial to his Affairs.

The King recovers.

The King being recovered, the Duke of York's Enemies reſolved to improve this Juncture, to diveſt him of his Dignity of Protector, which gave him ſo great a Power. It would have been eaſy for him to foreſee, the Pretence of the King's Recovery might be uſed, as it was once before, if he had not been blinded by the Clauſe in his Patent. But this Clauſe whereon he relied, was a weak Fence againſt the Attempts of his Enemies. The Parliament being re-aſſembled, the King went in Perſon and declared, that being, by God's Grace, in good Health, and able to reſume the Reins of the Government, he did not think the Kingdom any longer wanted a Protector. Then he deſired the Parliament to conſent, that the Duke of York might be diſmiſſed from that Office. Whether the Parliament thought the King's Demand reaſonable, or the Members had been gained unknown to the Duke, it was immediately reſolved, to grant the King's Requeſt. The ſame Day (1) the King ſent the Duke an Order to reſign the Office of Protector.

The Duke of York and his Party were amazed at this Proceeding. They eaſily perceived the Combination was too ſtrong to be broken. So, making, as it is ſaid, a Virtue of Neceſſity, they feigned patiently to ſubmit to the King's and the Parliament's Orders. However, under colour of having no farther Buſineſs at Court, they retired into the Country. But the Duke of York, and the Earls of Salisbury (2) and Warwick, kept within diſtance of each other in Yorkſhire.

Sedition at London. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

Shortly after (3) there was a Sedition at London, occaſioned by a ſudden Quarrel between two Merchants, one an Engliſhman, and the other an Italian (4). The Mob riſing in favour of the Engliſhman, the King impowered the Dukes of Exeter and Buckingham to bring the Guilty to a Trial; but the Populace would not ſuffer them to execute their Commiſſion. The Queen ſuſpecting this Tumult to be raiſed by the Duke of York's Adherents, and not thinking the King ſafe at London, carried him to Coventry, under colour of taking the Air. But beſides this, ſhe had another Motive of no leſs Importance: And that was, to inſnare at once the Duke of York, and the two Earls his Friends, who were all three retired into the North. She was informed, that though they were ſeparated in appearance, they had, on divers Pretences, frequent Conferences together, at which ſeveral other Lords of their Party were preſent. As ſhe could not doubt, it was to concert Meaſures againſt the King, ſhe believed ſhe ſhould have them in her Power, if ſhe could draw them to Coventry, where they would not find the ſame Protection as at London. To that end, ſhe ſent them Letters under the King's own hand (5), requiring their Preſence at Court, where their Advice was wanted, in an Affair of the utmoſt Importance.

The Queen takes the King into Warwickſhire. Hall. Stow.

They are like to be intrapped. Hollingſh. Stow. Hall.

The Duke of York had not yet done any thing openly, which ſhewed, that he aſpired to the Crown. This was a Secret between him and his principal Friends. It is very true, the Court was perſuaded of it, but it was not poſſible to convict him. Hitherto he had varniſhed his Actions with the Good of the Publick, and for that very reaſon was formidable to the Court. But though it was not eaſy to condemn him legally, he could not be ignorant, there were ſpeedier and more certain ways to diſpatch him, and that his Enemies were not over-ſcrupulous. Beſides, though he had artfully concealed his Deſigns from the People, he could not think of deceiving the Queen, who was too much concerned not to diſcover them. Notwithſtanding theſe Conſiderations, which ſhould have created a Jealouſy in the three Lords who had received the King's Letters, they reſolved to go to him. They flattered themſelves, that Henry being at length ſenſible of the Miſmanagement of the Queen and the Miniſtry, required their Aſſiſtance, in making ſome Alterations at Court. But whilſt they were on the Road to Coventry, their private Emiſſaries undeceived them, by warning them of their Danger. This Advice cauſing them to take other meaſures, they thought proper to ſeparate. The Duke of York withdrew to his Caſtle of Wigmore, in the Marches of Wales; and the Earl of Salisbury to his Seat [at Middleham] in Yorkſhire (6); as for the Earl of Warwick, he went directly to Calais, of which he was made Governor after the Battle of St. Albans. The Queen was extremely vexed at this diſappointment, but her Comfort was, ſhe had ſeparated the three Lords, and ſo rendered them leſs formidable to her.

But upon notice of the Queen's Deſigns they retire. Hall. Stow.

1457. The French invade the Coaſts of England. Hall Stow. P. Daniel.

The Fears and Jealouſies of both Parties were a little interrupted during the Year 1457, by foreign Affairs. As the Engliſh had formerly improved the Diſſenſions in France, to make Conqueſts upon that Kingdom, Charles VII thought he ſhould not neglect the Advantages, which the Quarrels of the Engliſh Court ſeemed to offer him. For that purpoſe, he prepared two Fleets which were to invade England, in two different Quarters. The firſt ſailing to the Downs, plundered the Town of Sandwich (7). The other ſerved [Foy] a little Town of Cornwall, in the ſame manner. But this was all they did worth remarking. Probably, they were too ill provided to venture upon more important Attempts. So, it was properly but a kind of Bravado, to inſult the Engliſh in their own Country, after their expulſion out of France.

The Scots invade the northern Parts.

About the ſame time the Scots made likewiſe an Inroad into the northern Counties, and carried away ſome Booty. Indeed, there was a Truce concluded in 1453, between England and Scotland, till the 21ſt of May this Year, on condition, that when this Term was expired, which ever of the two King's intended to renew the War, he ſhould give the other one hundred and eighty days notice. But ſo many outrages had been committed on both Sides, that neither Party thought themſelves obliged to obſerve the Treaty. The very laſt Year, the two Kings had ſent each other abuſive Letters, full of Haughtineſs and Contempt. However, whether the Scots intended only to revenge ſome particular Injury, or for ſome other Reaſon, the Truce was renewed from the 6th of July this Year, to that day Twelvemonth, 1459, and afterwards prolonged to the 6th of July 1463.

The Affairs with the foreign Enemies being ended, domeſtick Quarrels were going to be renewed, if ſome peaceful Perſons had not uſed their Endeavours, to prevent the fatal Conſequences of theſe Diviſions. It was eaſy to ſee, that the two Parties, in deciding their Quarrel by Arms, could not but ruin the Kingdom, and occaſion in the end ſome ſad Revolution. Neither Party was ſo ſuperior, as to promiſe themſelves certain Victory. Succeſs depended on the Events of the War, too doubtful for either to found any reaſonable hopes upon. The Duke of York was ſenſible, it was no eaſy thing to diſpoſſeſs by Force, a King that had been on the Throne thirty five Years. The truth is, Henry was little eſteemed by his Subjects, on account of his Incapacity; but he gained their Affection by his innocent Life, and good Intentions, though ill-ſupported by his ſlender Abilities. On the other hand, the Queen, the new Duke of Somerſet, who held the late Duke his Father's Poſt, the reſt of the Miniſtry, and the whole Houſe of Lancaſter, were in a very tottering State. The French and Scots took Advantage of theſe Quarrels to invade the Kingdom, and all the Miſcarriages were laid upon thoſe who governed in the King's Name. The Court ſaw plainly, the Duke of York uſed this pretence to ſtir up the People againſt them. Though hitherto he had not made all the Progreſs, he could have wiſhed, he ſaw himſelf, however, able very ſoon, to make a much more conſiderable. Theſe Reaſons, added to the King's Inſtances to adjuſt theſe Differences, moved the Queen and the Duke of Somerſet, at length to ſend the Duke of York an Offer of a ſincere Reconciliation. This firſt Step being taken, the King deſired the Duke of York and his Friends to repair to London, a Place by them unſuſpected, in order to endeavour an Agreement. He writ them a Letter with his own Hand, promiſing upon his Salvation, he would do them no Injury, and that his Intention was ſincere.

Such an Invitation could not be rejected, without openly declaring himſelf, which the Duke of York was willing to avoid. So, the Lords of his Party reſolved to accept it. They were jealous however of the Queen, who, on her Part, had as little Confidence in them. It may be, they were both equally in the right. Very likely, each Party hoped to reap ſome Advantage from this Proceeding, without intending however to alter their firſt Projects. Mean while, to remove all Fears, it was agreed, that both Parties might be attended with a certain Number of armed Followers. Nay, the King gave the Earl of Warwick Leave, who was to come from Calais, to bring with him four and twenty Foreigners, beſides Engliſh (8).

1458. Every thing being thus ſettled, the Lords of both Parties came to London in January; but the Earl of Warwick arrived not till February. They were lodged in two different Quarters (1), to avoid the Diſorders which their being together might occaſion. The Mayor of London (2) rode every Night round the City with his Train-bands, to the Number of ten Thouſand. The King and Queen entered the City the 27th of March, and lodged in the Biſhop's Palace, at an equal diſtance from both Parties.

Hollingſh. Hall. Stow.

Mediators being choſen with unanimous Conſent, ſuch was the diſpoſition of both Sides, that on the 3d of April a Reconciliation was made (3) to the common Satisfaction of the King, the Queen, the Parties concerned, and the whole Kingdom. The Subſtance of the Agreement was, that, all Animoſity being laid aſide, the Lords ſhould live together in Peace and Concord, and in perfect Obedience to the King's Commands. But to avoid all occaſion of Complaint, it was agreed, that the Duke of York, the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, with ſome others of that Party, ſhould be admitted into the Council (4). Then the 5th of April was appointed for a publick Thankſgiving-Day, for this Reconciliation, by a ſolemn Proceſſion to St. Paul's Church (5). The King and Queen, and all the Lords were preſent, and walked two and two, one of each Party, in token of a perfect Union (6). The Duke of York led the Queen by the Hand, who publickly gave him Marks of Confidence and Eſteem.

Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

It appeared however ſoon after, that this Confidence, of which ſo great ſhew was made on both Sides, was far from being reſtored. The Duke of York and his two principal Friends, always fearing ſome Treachery from their reconciled Enemies, withdrew from Court on divers Pretences. The Duke and the Earl of Salisbury went to York, and the Earl of Warwick to his Government of Calais. The Engliſh Hiſtorians ſay, this Earl being Admiral of the Channel, equipped fourteen Ships, to give chace to ſome Spaniſh Corſairs, who infeſted the narrow Seas, and meeting them, ſunk ſeveral, and brought ſix to Calais. But probably they were miſtaken, ſince the Collection of the Publick Acts gives us quite another Idea of this Affair. It is true, we find there Complaints from the Republicks of Genoa and Lubeck to the King againſt the Earl of Warwick, and that the King appointed Commiſſioners to take Informations. But in this Commiſſion there is no mention of Spaniſh Ships. It even appears, that this Engagement was occaſioned by an accidental Quarrel between the Ships of Genoa and Lubeck, and thoſe which were conveying the Earl of Warwick with his Retinue to Calais. This does not ſhew they were Pyrates, or that the Earl of Warwick attacked them deſignedly, Be this as it will, upon this Complaint he was forced to return to England to anſwer for himſelf, and ſtaid ſix or ſeven Weeks.

Act. Pub. XI. p. 406, 415.

He comes to England to juſtify what he had done.

Whilſt the Earl was at London, it happened one day, whilſt he was preſent at the Council, one of his People quarrelled with a Servant of the King's, and wounded him: Whereupon the reſt of the King's Domeſticks arming themſelves, ſome with Swords, others with Clubs or other Weapons, ran to revenge their Comrade. As they could not find the Aggreſſor, they fell upon the reſt of the Earl of Warwick's Retinue. In ſhort, They even aſſaulted his Perſon, as he was coming out of the Council to go to his Barge, which waited for him on the Thames. The Aſſault was ſo violent, that he very hardly eſcaped to his Barge, after ſeeing ſeveral of his People killed on the ſpot. He did not doubt this was a Contrivance of the Queen to diſpatch him, without appearing to be concerned. He was confirmed in his Opinion, when he heard the King had ordered him to be arreſted and ſent to the Tower. He had notice timely enough to diſappoint thoſe who were ſent to arreſt him. It is very difficult to decide, whether the Queen contrived this Quarrel to diſpatch him, or whether it happened by Accident. However this be, the Order to apprehend him, though he himſelf had reaſon to complain, made him ſenſible, he ſhould never be more ſecured from the Plots of his Enemies, than by attacking them with open Force. With a Mind full of Reſentment at this Affront, he went to the Earl of Salisbury his Father; and without delay, they repaired together to the Duke of York, to conſult what was to be done in this Juncture. From what had lately paſſed, they concluded, the Reconciliation at London was only a Snare to ſurprize them the more eaſily, and deſtroy them one after another. Perhaps they were not ſorry for having this Excuſe to juſtify their Reſolution of acting openly, as not being able to rely any more on the Promiſes of the Court. Purſuant to this Project, the Earl of Warwick ſpeedily returned to Calais to ſecure that Place, not queſtioning that there was a deſign to take it from him.

Mean while, the Duke of York and the Earl of Salisbury took meaſures to execute their Projects. They agreed, whilſt the Duke was levying an Army in Wales, the Earl ſhould advance towards London at the head of five or ſix thouſand Men (7), and openly demand Satisfaction for the Injury done to his Son. As this Deſign could not be executed without the Queen's Knowledge, the Lord Audley (8) was commiſſioned to raiſe Troops (9), and oppoſe the Earl of Salisbury (10). Audley made ſuch diſpatch, that in a very ſhort time he was at the head of ten thouſand Men, and in condition to march towards Lancaſhire, thro' which the Earl of Salisbury was to paſs. But he found the Earl was already advanced as far as Shropſhire, where the two Armies met. The Earl of Salisbury, though but half as ſtrong as the Enemy, did not think proper to retreat, but reſolved to make uſe of Stratagem to obtain a Victory, which otherwiſe he could not expect. Audley being encamped on Blore-Heath near a little River, Salisbury poſted himſelf on the other Side, as if he meant to guard the Paſs, and hinder his being attacked. Then ſuddenly feigning a Fear, he retired in the Night, marching ſo, as at break of Day his Enemies could ſtill ſee the Rear of his Army. This Retreat, which ſeemed to be with precipitation, inſpiring the Royaliſts with Ardor, they began to paſs the River in diſorder, imagining they had nothing to do, but to purſue the flying Enemy. But whilſt they were in this Confuſion, ſome being over the River, others in the Water, and others ready to paſs, the Earl of Salisbury returned and fell upon the Troops already over, who had ſcarce time to draw up. The Fight laſted however four or five Hours, becauſe the King's Troops were ſupported by thoſe that were continually paſſing. But as this could not be done without Confuſion, the Royal Army was at length put to rout with the Loſs of two thouſand four hundred Men. Audley himſelf was ſlain with all the principal Officers (11).

It would have been too dangerous to continue his March towards London, becauſe the Court had now aſſembled a great Force at Coventry. The Queen, who ſtill commanded in the King's Name, uſed all poſſible Endeavours to have a ſtrong Army. She ſaw plainly, there was nothing to be done without a great Superiority. On the other hand, the Duke of York and the Earl of Salisbury were no leſs intent upon procuring all poſſible Aſſiſtance, in order to withſtand the Forces that were preparing againſt them. They ſent word to the Earl of Warwick, it would be very neceſſary to come and join them, and try to bring them ſome Troops. Upon this Advice, Warwick left Calais under the Government of William Nevil Lord Falconbridge his Uncle, and took with him Part of the Garriſon, of which he gave the Command to Sir Andrew Trollop, who had ſignalized himſelf in the Wars of France (12).

1459. When he came to Gloceſter (1) he made a Halt, and ſent an Offer of Pardon to the Rebels (2) provided they would lay down their Arms. They anſwered, they could no longer rely on ſuch Promiſes, which were intended only to ſurprize them, as was viſible in what had happened at London to the Earl of Warwick; that nevertheleſs, they were ready to ſubmit to the King, if ſome Expedient could be found for their Safety. Upon this Anſwer the King ordered his Army to advance. At the ſame time, he gave the Duke of Somerſet a Patent to be Governor of Calais, in the room of the Earl of Warwick. But it was eaſier to give the Duke this Government in Parchment, than to put him in poſſeſſion.

The King having advanced with deſign to give Battle, the Yorkiſts ſent him a very ſubmiſſive Letter, praying him to conſider, that they had taken Arms only in their own Defence, againſt the Attempts of their Enemies; That this Intention appeared, in their keeping themſelves in a Corner of the Kingdom, without undertaking any thing, being determined not to fight unleſs forced; That they deſired only the Redreſs of the Grievances introduced into the Government, to the great Oppreſſion of the People, by the Fault of the Miniſtry. Laſtly, they beſought the King, to look upon them as loyal Subjects, who had formed no Deſign againſt his Perſon and to reſtore them to Favour.

Letter of the Male-contents to the King. Hollingſh. Stow.

This Letter had a quite contrary Effect to what they expected. Their Enemies not queſtioning but Fear had made them talk thus, advanced within half a Mile of them, with a Reſolution to give them Battle next day. At the ſame time, they found means to diſperſe in the Enemy's Camp the King's Proclamation, offering Pardon to all the Adherents of the rebellious Lords, provided they would lay down their Arms. This Proclamation had a ſurprizing Effect. The Duke of York's Troops imagining the King offered a Pardon, by reaſon of the Superiority of his Forces, and that there was no time to loſe to take the Benefit of it, immediately began to disband themſelves. Sir Andrew Trollop, who commanded the Detachment of the Garriſon of Calais, put the whole Army in Diſorder, by flying in the Night to the King's Camp, with the Troops under his Command. This Deſertion, which increaſed every moment, threw the Leaders into ſo terrible a Conſternation, that fearing to be delivered to the King as ſoon as Day ſhould appear, they choſe to ſave themſelves by flight. The Duke of York taking with him the Earl of Rutland his ſecond Son, embarked for Ireland. The Earl of Warwick fled towards Calais, and the Earl of Saliſbury ſpeedily followed him, with the Earl of March eldeſt Son of the Duke of York (3). This young Prince was then nineteen Years old. The Generals being retired, the reſt of the Officers and Soldiers thus abandoned were reduced to the King's Mercy, who was pleaſed to pardon all, except a few that were executed for an Example.

The Parliament being aſſembled in December (4), declared the Duke of York and his Adherents guilty of High-Treaſon. Their Eſtates were confiſcated, and they and their Poſterity, pronounced incapable of Inheriting, to the fourth Generation. We ſee here a remarkable Inſtance of the Variableneſs of the Parliament, according as the Face of Affairs was altered. I ſhall have frequent occaſion hereafter to take notice of many the like Inſtances.

Upon the breaking up of the Parliament, the Duke of Somerſet embarked with a Body of Troops (5), in order to take poſſeſſion of his Government of Calais; but the Garriſon firing upon him, he was obliged to land elſewhere, and retire to Guiſnes, from whence he made frequent Incurſions about Calais. But thoſe little Sallies were not capable of rendering him Maſter of ſo ſtrong a Place.

1460. The Queen finding the Earl of Warwick would not be deprived of his Government, equipped a Fleet to tranſport Succours to the Duke of Somerſet. This Fleet, well provided with all things, lay at Sandwich in expectation of a fair Wind. The Earl of Warwick having notice of it, ſent a Body of Troops privately from Calais, under the Command of Sir John Dinham, who arriving at Sandwich about break of Day, ſurprized moſt of the Officers in their Beds (6). As ſoon as he had them in his Power, he found means to gain the Soldiers and Mariners, and carried the King's Ships to Calais (7). 1460.

The Queen ſends him Supplies, which are carried off to Calais. Hall. Hollingſh. Act. Pub. XI. p. 440.

The Earl of Warwick made uſe of theſe Ships to convoy him into Ireland, where he went to concert meaſures with the Duke of York, for their common Defence. After he had been about a Month (8) on this Voyage, he met in his Return the Duke of Exeter (9), Admiral of England, who waited to take him in his Paſſage. But the Royal Fleet were ſo little inclined to fight againſt him, that the Duke of Exeter fearing to receive ſome Diſgrace, thought not proper to attack him.

Warwick conſults with York. Hal. Act. Pub. XI. p. 449. The Duke of Exeter dares not attack him.

The Queen and the Miniſters doubted not, that the Interview of the Duke of York and the Earl of Warwick would produce a freſh Rebellion. For this reaſon, at a Council held upon that occaſion, it was reſolved, ſtrict Search ſhould be made in all the Counties and Towns of the Kingdom, for the Adherents of the Duke of York, and that ſuch ſhould be ſuppreſſed as favoured him moſt, and were beſt able to ſerve him. It was not queſtioned, but this Method would put an effectual Stop to his ambitious Purſuits. Purſuant to this Reſolution, James Butler Earl of Wiltſhire, and the Lord Scales (10) were impowered to inquire out thoſe that bore Arms for the Male-contents in the late Rebellion, and to puniſh them according to Law. Theſe two Lords began to execute their Commiſſion, in ſome of the Towns (11) which had moſt openly declared for the Duke of York, and condemned ſeveral Perſons to Death. Of all the Counties of the Kingdom, none had more reaſon to dread the Court's Reſentment than Kent. Upon all occaſions that County had ſhewn a very ſtrong Attachment to the Duke of York, and what was done there in favour of Cade was not yet forgot. So, the Inhabitants of Kent perceiving, by what was practiſed in other Places, that their Ruin was unavoidable, began early to think of means to prevent it. To that end, they ſent word to the Lords at Calais, if they would make a Deſcent in their Country, they ſhould be received with open Arms, and the Inhabitants were ready to venture their Lives and Fortunes with them.

The Court reſolves to be rid of the York ſtaw. Act. Pub. XI. p. 445. A Commiſſion to that End. Stow. Kent alarmed at it, Stow. and invites over the Lords at Calais.

This Overture was very agreeable to the Lords. However, not to embark raſhly in this Affair, they ſent the Lord Falconbridge to be aſſured of their Sincerity. Falconbridge meeting at Sea with Sir Simon Montfort, who was appointed to guard the Coaſts, attacked him, and taking him Priſoner with many other Officers, ſent them all to Calais. Upon their Arrival, the Earl of March ordered Montfort with twelve of his Captains to be beheaded, by way of retaliation for his Father's Adherents, who had been executed in England. Theſe are almoſt unavoidable Cruelties in ſuch Civil Wars.

They ſend Falconbridge before; Hollingſh. Stow.

Falconbridge being come to Sandwich, found the Inhabitants of that Place and of the whole County of Kent, ſo well affected to the Lords, that he writ to Calais, there was no time to be loſt; that the County of Kent was going to be ruined, if not ſpeedily relieved; and that in the Terror People were under, it was not to be doubted, that ſeveral other Counties, as well as Kent, would riſe againſt the Court, if they could hope to be ſupported. This Juncture appearing very favorable, the Lords at Calais reſolved to improve it, and took care to inform the Duke of York, who ſtill kept in Ireland. Before they ſailed, a Manifeſto was diſperſed in Kent and in the neighbouring Parts (12), declaring that the ſole Motive of their taking Arms, was to free the poor People from the Oppreſſion they groaned under, and ſecure their Liberties and Privileges. It was added, that they did not queſtion, but all honeſt Engliſhmen would aſſiſt in the Execution of ſo good a Deſign. This Manifeſto had ſuch an Effect, that the Lords arriving at Sandwich with fifteen hundred Men only, found there a Body of four thouſand armed Men conducted by the Lord Cobham (13). With this Reinforcement they began their March towards London, knowing the Citizens were ready to receive them. And indeed the Gates being opened to them, they entered the City, at the head of forty thouſand Men, their Army increaſing to that Number in Mean while, the Queen who was at Coventry, was not idle. She had endeavoured to hinder the Entrance of the Male-Contents into London, by sending the Lord Scales with a good Body of Troops. But the Mayor had refused him Admittance, even before the Arrival of the Lords. Scales being thus repulsed, had thrown himself into the Tower, from whence he threatned to demolish the City with his Cannon, if the Rebels were received. But his Threats were not capable of frightening the Citizens. In the mean time, the King and Queen were assembling their Forces at Coventry, with all possible diligence. As soon as their Army was ready to march, they gave the Command to the Duke of Somerset, lately returned from Guisnes, and the Duke of Buckingham. But this was only for Form's sake, the Queen herself being really General, since every thing was done by her Orders, though the King was present in Person. The young Earl of March, hearing the Queen was marching to London, departed thence with twenty-five thousand Men to give her Battle before she should grow stronger. He left at London the Earl of Salisbury, with good Part of his Troops, and took with him the Earl of Warwick and the Lord Cobham, who served as his Lieutenants (1). At his Departure from London, the Lord Scales ordered the Tower Cannon to fire upon the City, and did some Damage (2). But by the Earl of Salisbury's care, to prevent his having any Provisions, he was himself reduced to great Streights.

The Queen advancing towards the Male-Contents, incamped on a Plain near Northampton, with a little River (3) behind her, which she had hastily passed, lest the Enemies should make use of it to avoid fighting: So desirous was she to decide the Quarrel by a Battle. But this Precaution was not only unserviceable to her, but, as will be seen presently, very prejudicial. The Earls of March and Warwick, likewise advancing, encamped the 17th of July, between Torcester and Northampton. The same day, they sent the Bishop of Salisbury to the King, beseeching him to suspend his Indignation, and consider with them of an Agreement, without Blood-shed. But the Court perceiving it to be only a general Proposal, intended merely to salve the Appearances, would by no means give Ear to it. So, both Sides prepared for Battle.

The Battle of Northampton. Hall. Hollingsh.

On the 19th of July (4), the Yorkists advanced towards the King's Army. The Earl of Warwick commanded the Right Wing, the Lord Cobham the Left, and the Earl of March was in the Center. The Dukes of Somerset and Buckingham were at the head of the Royalists, whilst the Queen kept at some distance, to observe what should pass, and give orders accordingly. The King remained in his Tent, waiting the Issue of a Battle, which, probably, was to secure, or deprive him of the Crown, for ever. The fight began not till two in the Afternoon, the Lords having first published in their Army, a strict Charge, not to hurt the King's Person, to spare the common Soldiers, and to fall upon the Officers only. The Battle lasted two, some say five, Hours, with great Fierceness and Obstinacy on both Sides, till at length the Lord Grey [of Ruthin,] who commanded a considerable Body of the King's Army, suddenly went over to the Male-contents. This unexpected Defection quite disheartened the Royalists. Apprehensive, that other Bodies would follow this Example, they began by degrees to give ground, and at last were routed, with the loss of ten thousand Men. The River which was in their Rear, caused the Slaughter to be greater than it would have been, if the vanquished could have more easily taken to Flight; besides, that many were drowned in endeavouring to repass the River. The Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Shrewsbury, Son of the renowned Talbot, the Lord Beaumont (5), and several other Nobles and Officers of Distinction were slain on the spot. The Queen, the young Prince of Wales, and the Duke of Somerset fled without resting into the Bishoprick of Durham; so great was their Fear of being delivered to their Enemies. The unfortunate King, who continued in his Tent, fell once more into the Hands of the victorious Lords, who paid him however all the Respect he could have required of them, had he been in his greatest Prosperity. This deference was some Comfort to him in his present Condition, which would have been more worthy of Pity, if his natural Imbecillity had not rendered him insensible of good and bad Fortune. Immediately after the Battle, he was honorably conducted to Northampton, where he resided some time. After that, on the 16th of August (6), he came to London, surrounded with a crowd of Lords, who, a few days before, were in Arms against him. Mean while, the Queen, not thinking herself safe in Durham, privately retired with eight Persons only, into Wales (7), where she would never have been sought. Shortly after, she left that Retreat, and with the Prince her Son fled into Scotland.

Upon the King's Arrival at London, he called a Parliament for the 2d of October (8). They who governed him wanted this delay, in order to send for the Duke of York, who was still in Ireland. They took care to acquaint him with what had passed, and desired him to repair to London with all possible speed, that he might be there at the opening of the Parliament, or sooner, if the Wind would permit. In this Interval, they acted in the King's Name, and made him sign all the Orders which agreed with their Interest. In the Collection of the Publick Acts, there is a Patent, confirming to the Earl of Warwick the Government of Calais; and an Order to the Duke of Somerset, to resign him that of Guisnes: And moreover, the King's Declaration, acknowledging the Duke of York, and his Adherents, for good and faithful Subjects, as having given undoubted Proofs of their Loyalty, not only in Words, but in Deeds.

The King's Declaration in favour of the Duke of York. Act. Pub. XI. p. 459, 460

Whilst England was thus in Combustion, James II, King of Scotland, prepared to make an Irruption. It was the Duke of York, that after his retreat into Ireland, had, by some advantagious offers, engaged him to break with Henry, in expectation of reaping some Benefit himself from this Diversion. Though last Year, James had concluded with England a four years Truce (9), he believed, he ought to improve this opportunity. Indeed, he alledged several Reasons to colour his Invasion, but the Circumstances of England was the sole and real Motive of his Preparations. Be this as it will, a few days after the Battle of Northampton, he entered England at the head of an Army, and besieged Roxborough; but had not time to make any great Progress. One of his own Cannon happening to burst, he was killed with a Splinter on the 4th of August. James III, his eldest Son, then but seven Years old, was his Successor. The Queen his Widow, who was in the Army, carried on the Siege, till the Town was surrendered.

The Duke of York could not reach London, till two Days after the opening of the Parliament. He rid directly to Westminster, and alighting from his Horse, went to the House of Lords, where he stood some time under the Canopy of State, with his Hand on the Throne, expecting as it were, to be desired to seat himself thereon. But the Silence of the House was a plain Indication, his Intention was not universally approved. At the same time, to encrease his Confusion caused by their Silence, the Archbishop of Canterbury approaching him (10), asked him whether he would not go and pay his respects to the King. With what Caution soever the Duke had hitherto behaved he could not forbear changing Countenance at this Question, and telling the Archbishop, he knew no Person, to whom he owed that Honour. Upon these Words, he immediately withdrew to his own House. He was too discerning, not to perceive, he in vain expected to be intreated to accept of the Crown. So, with-1460. out concealing his Sentiments any longer, he ſent next Morning (1), a Writing to the Parliament, containing the Reaſons on which his Pretenſions were built. As they have been frequently mentioned, it will be needleſs to repeat them. It ſuffices to ſay in a word, that he claimed the Crown as Heir of the Houſe of March. This Affair was very warmly debated in Parliament (2), according to the Knowledge and Inclinations of the Members. To relate all the Arguments alledged pro and con, would be exceſſively tedious; but as this is a Matter of great Moment, it will not be improper to give the Subſtance of the Objections to the Duke of York's Claim, and the Replies of his Friends. I muſt not, however, forget to remark, that both Sides referred to the Deciſion of the Parliament, which they equally acknowledged for the ſole Judge of this Affair.

He ſends the Parliament a Memorial to juſtify his Claim. Cotton's Abridg. p. 665. Stow.

Arguments Pro and Con.

In the firſt place it was ſaid, when Henry IV. Grandfather of the preſent King, took poſſeſſion of the Throne, no Perſon offered to oppoſe him.

The Duke of York's Friends replied, that as Edmund Earl of March, who was then alive, could not diſpute it, without manifeſt Danger, his Silence could not be interpreted for Conſent.

II. It was alledged on the King's behalf, that Henry IV, his Grandfather, had received the Crown by the Parliament's Authority. To this it was anſwered, the Duke of York did not pretend to take poſſeſſion, without the ſame Authority, as appeared in his Memorial directed to both Houſes. But, as the Parliament had ſtrong Reaſons to proceed contrary to Cuſtom, in favour of the Houſe of Lancaſter; ſo they had at preſent as ſtrong, to do the Duke of York Juſtice. They who talked thus, took care not to diſpute the Parliament's Authority, at a time, when they meant to make uſe of it, to place the Duke of York on the Throne. But, probably, they did not ſpeak, upon this Subject, all their Thoughts.

III. The Reſignation of Richard II. was pleaded in behalf of the Houſe of Lancaſter.

Anſwer was made, by denying that Richard's Reſignation concerned that Houſe in particular, or even the Perſon of Henry IV. But, ſuppoſing it ſo, it was not in the Power of a captive King, juſt going to be depoſed, to appoint a Succeſſor.

IV. It was objected againſt the Duke of York, that the Earl of Cambridge his Father, having been executed for High-Treaſon, his Poſterity were rendered incapable of any Inheritance.

The Duke's Adherents anſwered, he had been reſtored to his Honours, and all his Birth-Rights, and acknowledged for Duke of York, and Earl of March, by the King himſelf, and the whole Kingdom.

V. It was further urged, that the Houſe of Lancaſter had enjoyed the Crown above ſixty Years.

To this it was replied, that Preſcription was no Plea againſt the Right of Succeſſion to the Crown, which was a natural Right, and not to be deſtroyed by a poſitive Law.

VI. Laſtly, it was repreſented in the King's favor, that having now reigned thirty eight Years, and all along led an innocent Life, without giving any Perſon cauſe to complain, it would be a great Cruelty to deprive him of the Crown.

This Argument ſeemed very ſtrong: But the Duke of York's Friends replied, that Henry being incapable of governing by himſelf, to leave him in poſſeſſion of the Crown, was acting rather for the Queen and the Miniſters, who abuſed his Name and Authority, than for him. Moreover, the whole Kingdom was not to be ruined for his ſake, or a Wrong to be committed from a Motive of Charity.

It is decreed that the King ſhould enjoy the Crown during Life. Cotton's Abridg. p. 666. Stow. p. 409. Hall.

It may eaſily be judged, that theſe and ſeveral other Reaſons, alledged by the two Parties, were inlarged and diſplayed to the beſt Advantage, eſpecially in the Parliament, where there are generally many Perſons of great Abilities. This was a very proper Subject to exerciſe the Ingenious, difficult in it ſelf, and ſtill more ſo, by the preſent Situation of Affairs. At length, after a Debate of ſeveral days, it was reſolved (3), that Henry ſhould enjoy the Crown during his Life, and the Duke of York be declared his Succeſſor. This Reſolve was paſſed into an Act of Parliament, declaring, That notwithſtanding the Duke of York's indiſputable Title to the Crown, he had freely conſented, that Henry ſhould poſſeſs it for his Life, and promiſed to ſwear Allegiance to him as his lawful Sovereign. But if the King ſhould any way break this Agreement, then the Crown ſhould immediately devolve to the Duke of York, or his lawful Heirs (4). 1460.

The Duke of York conſents to the Decree. Hall.

Very likely, this Agreement did not come up to the Duke of York's Expectations. He was contented however, becauſe he perceived it would be very difficult to obtain more, without open Force. It cannot be denied, that he behaved with a Moderation very uncommon in ſuch Caſes. In his preſent Circumſtances, and according to the Rule generally followed by Parliaments, to declare for the ſtrongeſt, nothing was more eaſy for the Duke, than to cauſe the Crown to be adjudged to him immediately. He had at his Command a victorious, and at that time, irreſiſtible Army. Beſides, moſt of the Members of Parliament were in his Intereſt, and probably, after acknowledging his Title to be indiſputable, they would not have wanted much Sollicitation to proceed one Step farther, and place him on the Throne. It is therefore manifeſt, if the Parliament ſhowed any regard for Henry, it was, becauſe they thought themſelves at liberty to uſe this Equity, notwithſtanding the victorious Army which might have offered them Violence, if the Duke would have made uſe of his Advantages. It muſt be farther obſerved, that the Duke of York was older than the King, and therefore naturally could not expect to out-live him. And yet, thoſe who have writ the Hiſtory of theſe Troubles, have put an ill Conſtruction upon all they have ſaid concerning this Prince. The Reaſon may be eaſily gueſſed. The Houſe of York enjoying the Throne but twenty four Years, we have no Hiſtorian in that Interval; all we have being later, and writing ſince the Reſtoration of the Houſe of Lancaſter in the Perſon of Henry VII. This muſt be always remembred in reading the Hiſtory of theſe Civil Wars.

Inſtances of his Moderation.

Hiſtorians have been partial to him.

The day after paſſing the forementioned Act, a Proceſſion was made at St. Paul's, where the King was preſent, with his Crown on his Head, attended by the Duke of York (5).

Proceſſion at St. Paul's. Hall. Stow.

After this Agreement, the King continued the ſame. Though it was eaſy for him to perceive, what Prejudice the late Settlement brought to his Family, and particularly to the Prince of Wales his Son, he lived quietly in his Servitude, without thinking of Means for his Deliverance. Satisfied with whatever the Duke of York was pleaſed to ſuggeſt, he wholly gave himſelf up to Devotion, and left the Publick Affairs to thoſe who managed them in his Name. Thus the Duke finding himſelf abſolute Maſter of the Government and Perſon of the King, cauſed him to ſign an Order, requiring the Queen to repair to him. The Duke was ſenſible, this Order would be to no purpoſe. But his Aim was, to render her criminal, by her refuſing to obey the King, and thereby to juſtify his intended Proceedings againſt her. He thought her without Refuge, and in that Belief imagined, he had only to find ſome Pretence, to lay an inſuperable Obſtacle to her return, in order to be freed from ſo dangerous an Enemy. But he relied too far on his own good Fortune, and the Queen's Weakneſs. Inſtead of being diſcouraged at the ill Situation of the King's, and his Family's Affairs, ſhe was now returned into England, with the Prince of Wales her Son, and had drawn together in the North, an Army of eighteen thouſand Men (6). The better to ingage the People of thoſe Parts to her Intereſt, ſhe had cauſed to be reported, that they were allowed to plunder the Country on the South of the Trent. Probably, this moſt conduced to her aſſembling ſo great a Number of Troops.

The Queen provokes him to fight. Hall.

The Queen was extremely troubled to ſee her Enemy thus ſecured from all Attack. As ſhe was then much ſuperior in Number of Troops, if the Duke would have fought, ſhe might have flattered herſelf with undoubted Succeſs. But it was not certain, that after the Earl of March's Arrival, ſhe ſhould be in the ſame Situation. For this Reaſon, ſhe neglected nothing to provoke her Enemy, and induce him to come out of his Retreat. As ſhe did not deſpair of accompliſhing her Deſign, ſhe placed a Body of Troops in Ambuſh, behind a Hill (2). Then ſhe appeared before the Walls of Sandal, provoking the Duke all manner of ways, one while threatening him, another while ſending him Defiances, and upbraiding him, that a Man who aſpired to the Crown, ſhould ſuffer himſelf to be thus ſhut up by a Woman.

The Duke refuſes to fight. Hall. Hollingſh.

The Duke of York had hitherto acted with great Prudence and Conduct. During the Wars of France, where he had often commanded in Chief, he had ſhown no leſs Wiſdom, than true Valour. But, on this occaſion, he unfortunately ſuffered his Courage to prevail, contrary to the Opinion of his Friends (3), who adviſed him to deſpiſe thoſe vain Reproaches. Probably, his Hatred to the Queen led him, as it were againſt his Will, to commit an unpardonable Fault, in a General of ſo eſtabliſhed a Reputation. Theſe at leaſt were the Motives aſcribed to him by the Hiſtorians. For my Part, if I may be allowed to ſpeak my Opinion, I own I think it improbable. I ſhould rather believe, the want of Proviſions forced him to a Battle, in order to avoid the Danger, to which he was expoſed. So, if he committed a Fault, it was in ſhutting himſelf up in a Caſtle, inſtead of returning, or meeting his Son, who could eaſily join him. Be this as it will, he marched out of Sandal, and drew up his Men on Wakefield Green, counting, his Courage and Experience would ſupply the Defects of his Army. He was no ſooner drawn up, but he ſaw himſelf attacked by the Queen's Troops, which being more numerous than his, had a great Advantage over him. Whilſt he was preſſed in the Front by his Enemies, ſtronger than himſelf, the Ambuſhes roſe, and attacked him in the Rear. This unexpected Aſſault, bred ſuch Confuſion among his Troops, that within half an Hour they were routed, and himſelf ſlain, valiantly fighting. The young Earl of Rutland his ſecond Son, not above twelve Years of Age, flying with his Governor, was overtaken by the Lord Clifford, who plunged his Dagger into his Breaſt, notwithſtanding the earneſt Intreaties of the Governor, to ſpare the young Prince's Life (4). Afterwards, the ſame Lord Clifford finding the Duke of York's Body, cut off the Head, and crowning it with a Paper-Crown, fixed it on the end of his Lance, and preſented it to the Queen, who ordered it to be placed on the Walls of York (5).

Remark on the Partiality of Hiſtorians to the Houſe of Lancaſter.

Thus fell the Duke of York, about fifty Years old (6), It may be ſaid, never was Prince ſo near a Throne, and not in it, and that it lay in his own Breaſt to take poſſeſſion, had he been willing to uſe the Power he had in his Hands. I ſhall not undertake, either to condemn, or juſtify his Pretenſions. I leave the Reader to paſs his own Judgment, upon the Grounds already explained in ſeveral Places. Unhappily for this Prince, the Engliſh Hiſtorians that writ, when the Reſtoration of the Houſe of Lancaſter was ſtill freſh, I mean in the Reigns of Henry VII, and Henry VIII, have put an ill Conſtruction on all his Actions. Thoſe that came after them, not content with taking the Facts as they found them related, have likewiſe copied the Reflections, and even the very Invectives. They have thereby all unanimouſly given the Cauſe for the Houſe of Lancaſter, inſtead of leaving their Readers at Liberty to paſs an impartial Judgment upon ſo difficult a Caſe, the Deciſion whereof, ſhould the ſame thing happen again, would be no leſs perplexing at preſent, than it was formerly. The Earl of Salisbury having the Misfortune to be taken Priſoner in the Battle, was carried, notwithſtanding his Wounds, to Pontfract, where he loſt his Head on the Scaffold (7). The Queen ordered it to be ſet on a Pole, near the Duke of York's.

The Earl of Salisbury beheaded. Hall. Hollingſh.

Such was the Succeſs of this Battle, fought on the laſt Day of December, near Wakefield (8), from whence it took its Name. This Battle ſeemed to have firmly reſtored the Affairs of the King and Queen, and yet it ſerved only to haſten their Deſtruction, and ſooner advance the Houſe of York to the Throne. The Earl of March hearing of the Defeat and Death of the Duke his Father, was not diſcouraged. On the contrary, he reſolved to maintain the Quarrel, let what would be the Conſequence, and loſe his Life, or execute his Father's Deſigns. After what had paſſed, there was no Medium, one of the two Houſes muſt neceſſarily be eſtabliſhed, upon the Ruins of the other. This Prince was then in Wales (9), ready to march to the Aſſiſtance of his Father. His Army was three and twenty thouſand ſtrong, beſides what was left at London, under the Command of the Earl of Warwick, for the Defence of the Metropolis. So, finding himſelf ſtrong enough to go in queſt of the Queen, he wiſhed for nothing more ardently, than an opportunity to revenge his Father's Death.

Hall. Hollingſh.

Whilſt the Earl of March was taking this Reſolution, the Queen advanced towards London, with deſign to ſecure that great City, which alone could influence the Fortune of either Party. But hearing upon the Road, that the Earl of March began to move, ſhe detached Jaſper Tudor Earl of Pembroke (10), to oppoſe this new Enemy, whom ſhe did not imagine to be ſo ſtrong as he was. The Earl of March being informed of the Queen's Motion towards London, altered his Courſe, and inſtead of going to meet her, took likewiſe the Road to London, in order to prevent her. But having Advice of the Detachment ſent againſt him, he did not think proper to come between the two Armies of his Enemies, which muſt have happened, had he continued his Rout. So, coming to a ſudden Reſolution, he returned to meet the Earl of Pembroke. He met him near Mortimer's Croſs in Herefordſhire, and as he was much ſuperior in Number of Troops, eaſily defeated him, and ſlew three thouſand eight hundred of his Men. The Earl of Pembroke had the good Fortune to eſcape. But Owen Tudor his Father, according to ſome, or more probably, his younger Brother (11), being taken Priſoner, was beheaded, with ſeveral others, in revenge for the Earl of Salisbury.

expel the Earl of Warwick. Indeed, the Earl himſelf ſeems to have been of that Mind, ſince he choſe rather to go and fight the Queen, than remain in London; which doubtleſs, he would not have done, had he been ſecure of the City. The Queen being arrived at St. Albans, received certain Advice, that the Earl of Warwick was marching towards her with his Army, reinforced with a Body of Londoners, and bringing the King with him. The Queen's Army conſiſted of northern Troops (1), who committed ſuch monſtrous Ravages, that it was one of the chief Reaſons, why the Londoners choſe to join the Earl of Warwick. If theſe Troops had entered the City, they would have had every thing to fear from ſuch Gueſts.

He is defeated at Bernard's Heath. Feb. 17. Hall. Stow.

The two Armies meeting near St. Albans, on Bernard's Heath, began a Fight, which at firſt was very fierce on both Sides. But Lovelace, who commanded one of the Wings of Warwick's Army, either through Treachery, or for ſome other Reaſon, not ingaging in time, Victory declared for the Queen, and the Vanquiſhed loſt two thouſand eight hundred Men (2). She had withal the Satisfaction to free the King, whom the Earl of Warwick durſt not venture to leave at London. She uſed her Victory with the Barbarity too common in Civil Wars, beheading ſeveral Perſons of Diſtinction, particularly the Lord Bonvile (3), and Sir Thomas Kiriel, though the King had granted them their Lives. As her Troops had voluntarily liſted in her Service, without her having wherewithal to pay them, ſhe could not hinder them, after the Victory, from plundering the Town of St. Albans. Theſe northern Soldiers declared, they had taken Arms only upon the Promiſe of having the plunder of the Country lying South of the Trent. This Pretenſion inſpired the Inhabitants of London, and the neighbouring Country, with a Terror very prejudicial to the Queen. Proviſions being grown very ſcarce in her Army, by reaſon of the great Licentiouſneſs of her Troops, ſhe ſent to the Mayor of London for a Supply, who not daring to deny her at ſuch a Juncture, ordered ſeveral Carts to be loaded. But as they were going out of the Gate, the Mob ſtopped them, and told the Mayor, they would not ſuffer Proviſions to be ſent to an Army, which was come on purpoſe to plunder the Country. The Mayor not being able to help this Diſorder, made his Excuſe to the Queen (4), and gave her hopes of being received into the City, as ſoon as the People were appeaſed.

The Earl of March approaches London. Hall. Stow.

Whilſt the Queen at St. Albans was treating with the Mayor of London, the Earl of March was advancing with all poſſible diligence, to inſpire the Londoners with a Reſolution to keep their Gates ſhut againſt the Queen, on account of the approaching Aſſiſtance. And indeed, the News of his March did not a little contribute to prolong the Negotiation between the Queen and the Mayor, which ruined her Affairs. When ſhe heard, the Earl of March was approaching, and had ſtrengthned his Army, with the Remains of the Earl of Warwick's (5), ſhe choſe to retire into the North. Beſides that ſhe was inferior to her Enemy, ſhe was juſtly apprehenſive of not being received into London, in caſe ſhe advanced that way, and of being obliged to join Battle at the Gates of the City, too well inclined to favour her Enemy.

The Queen retires towards the North.

The Earl enters London. Hall. Stow.

The Earl of March, overjoyed that the Queen voluntarily gave him up the Metropolis, entered as it were in Triumph, the beginning of March (6). He was received with the Acclamations of the Citizens, who, ſeveral Years ſince, had very near declared againſt the Court. The Caution wherewith the late Duke of York had thought fit to proceed, had been ſo much to his Prejudice, that his Son's Friends judged it abſolutely neceſſary to place him at once in the Throne. After ſundry Conſultations, they reſolved not to be expoſed to the Delays of a Parliament, but to proceed to an extraordinary Election, firſt by the People, and then by the Nobles. They were of opinion, this Method could be juſtified by the Act of Parliament, confirming the Agreement between the King and the Duke of York, and that it was unneceſſary to ſtay for a freſh Confirmation.

His Friends reſolve to place him on the Throne.

Extraordinary Election of the Earl of March. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

Purſuant to this Reſolution, the Earl of Warwick (7) drew up his Army in St. John's Fields, in the midſt of Throngs of People, whom ordering to be caſt into a Ring round him, he read aloud the Agreement between the King and the Duke of York, with the Act of Parliament, whereby it was confirmed. That done, he told the People, Henry had notoriouſly violated this Agreement, and ſo forfeited, according to the Act of Parliament, his Right to the Crown. But after all, I do not ſee upon what foundation he could charge the King with the Queen's Proceedings, ſince he was all the while as a Priſoner at London: Neither was he any more his own Maſter, after he was with the Queen. Be this as it will, the Earl of Warwick raiſing his Voice, asked the People, who ſtood round him, whether they would have Henry of Lancaſter for King? The whole Multitude crying out, No, No: He asked, whether according to that Settlement, they would have Edward, Son of the late Duke of York, to reign over them? To which, all the People anſwered with Acclamations, expreſſing their Conſent. 1461.

Aſſembly of the chief Men who adjudged him the Crown. Hall. Stow.

This firſt Step being made, and the People's Mind being, as was pretended, ſufficiently known, a great Council was called of all the Biſhops, Lords, Gentlemen and Magiſtrates, in and about London (8). Edward being preſent in this Aſſembly, ſet forth his Title to the Crown, as well by Birth, as by the fore-mentioned Agreement, and deſired it might be adjudged to him. It would have been great boldneſs, to diſpute his Pretenſion at ſuch a Juncture. So, with one Conſent the Aſſembly declared, that Henry of Lancaſter having forfeited his Right of enjoying the Crown during Life, by the Breach of the ſolemn Agreement made with the Duke of York, and ratified by the Parliament; it was devolved to Edward, eldeſt Son of the Duke of York. Upon this Declaration, the Crown was offered the Duke, who accepted it, modeſtly confeſſing his Inſufficiency; and adding, that though his Youth and Inexperience made him apprehenſive of taking upon him ſo weighty a Charge, he would however, with God's Aſſiſtance, uſe his utmoſt Endeavors to render his People happy. On the Morrow (9), he went in Proceſſion to St. Paul's, [and from thence, was conducted in great State to Weſtminſter-Hall,] where he ſat in the King's Seat, with the Scepter of St. Edward in his Hand (10). The Archbiſhop of Canterbury having asked the People, whether they would have Edward Earl of March for King; the People anſwered with loud Acclamations. Then, the King took the Homage of the Lords that were preſent. The Ceremony concluding with ſinging Te Deum, Edward was conducted with great Solemnity to the Biſhop's Palace, where Henry uſed to lodge, when he was within the Walls of the City. Next Day, being the 5th of March, he was proclaimed in London, and the neighboring Towns, by the Name of Edward IV. Hall.

End of Henry's Reign.

Thus ended the Reign of Henry VI, which had laſted thirty-eight Years and a Half, without his ever intermedling with the Adminiſtration of the publick Affairs.

His Character.

It does not even appear, that he was, upon any occaſion, much moved with Events; which however were, for the moſt Part, ſuch as would affect a Prince of a different Character. He was fitter for a private Life, than a Crown. His great and only Defect was a natural Imbecillity, which rendered him incapable to govern of himſelf. Ever ruled by thoſe who managed the Affairs in his Name, his Capacity reached not to ſee the Conſequences of the Counſels given him, which to him ſeemed always good. Herein, he was different from the King his Father, whoſe Genius was always ſuperior to that of his Miniſters. As to the reſt, he was chaſte, temperate, extremely religious, abhorring Injuſtice and Cruelty. It was theſe Virtues that have ſerved for Foundation to the Praiſes beſtowed on him by ſeveral Hiſtorians, and which have made ſome conſider him as a true Saint. Indeed, theſe Virtues would have rendered him an accompliſhed Prince, had they been attended with the Qualifications of a Sovereign. But being alone, they ſerved only to make him an honeſt Man, and withal, a very indifferent King, not to ſay worſe. His Incapacity rendered him contemptible to his Subjects. But the Innocency of his Life, never ſuffered their Contempt to turn into Hatred.

The Duke of York had hitherto acted with great Prudence and Conduct. During the Wars of France, where he had often commanded in Chief, he had ſhown no leſs Wiſdom, than true Valour. But, on this occaſion, he unfortunately ſuffered his Courage to prevail, contrary to the Opinion of his Friends (3), who adviſed him to deſpiſe thoſe vain Reproaches. Probably, his Hatred to the Queen led him, as it were againſt his Will, to commit an unpardonable Fault, in a General of ſo eſtabliſhed a Reputation. Theſe at leaſt were the Motives aſcribed to him by the Hiſtorians. For my Part, if I may be allowed to ſpeak my Opinion, I own I think it improbable. I ſhould rather believe, the want of Proviſions forced him to a Battle, in order to avoid the Danger, to which he was expoſed. So, if he committed a Fault, it was in ſhutting himſelf up in a Caſtle, inſtead of returning, or meeting his Son, who could eaſily join him. Be this as it will, he marched out of Sandal, and drew up his Men on Wakefield Green, counting, his Courage and Experience would ſupply the Defects of his Army. He was no ſooner drawn up, but he ſaw himſelf attacked by the Queen's Troops, which being more numerous than his, had a great Advantage over him. Whilſt he was preſſed in the Front by his Enemies, ſtronger than himſelf, the Ambuſhes roſe, and attacked him in the Rear. This unexpected Aſſault, bred ſuch Confuſion among his Troops, that within half an Hour they were routed, and himſelf ſlain, valiantly fighting. The young Earl of Rutland his ſecond Son, not above twelve Years of Age, flying with his Governor, was overtaken by the Lord Clifford, who plunged his Dagger into his Breaſt, notwithſtanding the earneſt Intreaties of the Governor, to ſpare the young Prince's Life (4). Afterwards, the ſame Lord Clifford finding the Duke of York's Body, cut off the Head, and crowning it with a Paper-Crown, fixed it on the end of his Lance, and preſented it to the Queen, who ordered it to be placed on the Walls of York (5).

Thus fell the Duke of York, about fifty Years old (6), It may be ſaid, never was Prince ſo near a Throne, and not in it, and that it lay in his own Breaſt to take poſſeſſion, had he been willing to uſe the Power he had in his Hands. I ſhall not undertake, either to condemn, or juſtify his Pretenſions. I leave the Reader to paſs his own Judgment, upon the Grounds already explained in ſeveral Places. Unhappily for this Prince, the Engliſh Hiſtorians that writ, when the Reſtoration of the Houſe of Lancaſter was ſtill freſh, I mean in the Reigns of Henry VII, and Henry VIII, have put an ill Conſtruction on all his Actions. Thoſe that came after them, not content with taking the Facts as they found them related, have likewiſe copied the Reflections, and even the very Invectives. They have thereby all unanimouſly given the Cauſe for the Houſe of Lancaſter, inſtead of leaving their Readers at Liberty to paſs an impartial Judgment upon ſo difficult a Caſe, the Deciſion whereof, ſhould the ſame thing happen again, would be no leſs perplexing at preſent, than it was formerly. The Earl of Salisbury having the Misfortune to be taken Priſoner in the Battle, was carried, notwithſtanding his Wounds, to Pontfract, where he loſt his Head on the Scaffold (7). The Queen ordered it to be ſet on a Pole, near the Duke of York's.

Such was the Succeſs of this Battle, fought on the laſt Day of December, near Wakefield (8), from whence it took its Name. This Battle ſeemed to have firmly reſtored the Affairs of the King and Queen, and yet it ſerved only to haſten their Deſtruction, and ſooner advance the Houſe of York to the Throne. The Earl of March hearing of the Defeat and Death of the Duke his Father, was not diſcouraged. On the contrary, he reſolved to maintain the Quarrel, let what would be the Conſequence, and loſe his Life, or execute his Father's Deſigns. After what had paſſed, there was no Medium, one of the two Houſes muſt neceſſarily be eſtabliſhed, upon the Ruins of the other. This Prince was then in Wales (9), ready to march to the Aſſiſtance of his Father. His Army was three and twenty thouſand ſtrong, beſides what was left at London, under the Command of the Earl of Warwick, for the Defence of the Metropolis. So, finding himſelf ſtrong enough to go in queſt of the Queen, he wiſhed for nothing more ardently, than an opportunity to revenge his Father's Death.

Whilſt the Earl of March was taking this Reſolution, the Queen advanced towards London, with deſign to ſecure that great City, which alone could influence the Fortune of either Party. But hearing upon the Road, that the Earl of March began to move, ſhe detached Jaſper Tudor Earl of Pembroke (10), to oppoſe this new Enemy, whom ſhe did not imagine to be ſo ſtrong as he was. The Earl of March being informed of the Queen's Motion towards London, altered his Courſe, and inſtead of going to meet her, took likewiſe the Road to London, in order to prevent her. But having Advice of the Detachment ſent againſt him, he did not think proper to come between the two Armies of his Enemies, which muſt have happened, had he continued his Rout. So, coming to a ſudden Reſolution, he returned to meet the Earl of Pembroke. He met him near Mortimer's Croſs in Herefordſhire, and as he was much ſuperior in Number of Troops, eaſily defeated him, and ſlew three thouſand eight hundred of his Men. The Earl of Pembroke had the good Fortune to eſcape. But Owen Tudor his Father, according to ſome, or more probably, his younger Brother (11), being taken Priſoner, was beheaded, with ſeveral others, in revenge for the Earl of Salisbury.

Remark on the Partiality of Hiſtorians to the Houſe of Lancaſter.

expel the Earl of Warwick. Indeed, the Earl himſelf ſeems to have been of that Mind, ſince he choſe rather to go and fight the Queen, than remain in London; which doubtleſs, he would not have done, had he been ſecure of the City. The Queen being arrived at St. Albans, received certain Advice, that the Earl of Warwick was marching towards her with his Army, reinforced with a Body of Londoners, and bringing the King with him. The Queen's Army conſiſted of northern Troops (1), who committed ſuch monſtrous Ravages, that it was one of the chief Reaſons, why the Londoners choſe to join the Earl of Warwick. If theſe Troops had entered the City, they would have had every thing to fear from ſuch Gueſts.

He is defeated at Bernard's Heath. Feb. 17. Hall. Stow.

The two Armies meeting near St. Albans, on Bernard's Heath, began a Fight, which at firſt was very fierce on both Sides. But Lovelace, who commanded one of the Wings of Warwick's Army, either through Treachery, or for ſome other Reaſon, not ingaging in time, Victory declared for the Queen, and the Vanquiſhed loſt two thouſand eight hundred Men (2). She had withal the Satisfaction to free the King, whom the Earl of Warwick durſt not venture to leave at London. She uſed her Victory with the Barbarity too common in Civil Wars, beheading ſeveral Perſons of Diſtinction, particularly the Lord Bonvile (3), and Sir Thomas Kiriel, though the King had granted them their Lives. As her Troops had voluntarily liſted in her Service, without her having wherewithal to pay them, ſhe could not hinder them, after the Victory, from plundering the Town of St. Albans. Theſe northern Soldiers declared, they had taken Arms only upon the Promiſe of having the plunder of the Country lying South of the Trent. This Pretenſion inſpired the Inhabitants of London, and the neighbouring Country, with a Terror very prejudicial to the Queen. Proviſions being grown very ſcarce in her Army, by reaſon of the great Licentiouſneſs of her Troops, ſhe ſent to the Mayor of London for a Supply, who not daring to deny her at ſuch a Juncture, ordered ſeveral Carts to be loaded. But as they were going out of the Gate, the Mob ſtopped them, and told the Mayor, they would not ſuffer Proviſions to be ſent to an Army, which was come on purpoſe to plunder the Country. The Mayor not being able to help this Diſorder, made his Excuſe to the Queen (4), and gave her hopes of being received into the City, as ſoon as the People were appeaſed.

The Earl of March approaches London. Hall. Stow.

Whilſt the Queen at St. Albans was treating with the Mayor of London, the Earl of March was advancing with all poſſible diligence, to inſpire the Londoners with a Reſolution to keep their Gates ſhut againſt the Queen, on account of the approaching Aſſiſtance. And indeed, the News of his March did not a little contribute to prolong the Negotiation between the Queen and the Mayor, which ruined her Affairs. When ſhe heard, the Earl of March was approaching, and had ſtrengthned his Army, with the Remains of the Earl of Warwick's (5), ſhe choſe to retire into the North. Beſides that ſhe was inferior to her Enemy, ſhe was juſtly apprehenſive of not being received into London, in caſe ſhe advanced that way, and of being obliged to join Battle at the Gates of the City, too well inclined to favour her Enemy.

The Queen retires towards the North.

The Earl enters London. Hall. Stow.

The Earl of March, overjoyed that the Queen voluntarily gave him up the Metropolis, entered as it were in Triumph, the beginning of March (6). He was received with the Acclamations of the Citizens, who, ſeveral Years ſince, had very near declared againſt the Court. The Caution wherewith the late Duke of York had thought fit to proceed, had been ſo much to his Prejudice, that his Son's Friends judged it abſolutely neceſſary to place him at once in the Throne. After ſundry Conſultations, they reſolved not to be expoſed to the Delays of a Parliament, but to proceed to an extraordinary Election, firſt by the People, and then by the Nobles. They were of opinion, this Method could be juſtified by the Act of Parliament, confirming the Agreement between the King and the Duke of York, and that it was unneceſſary to ſtay for a freſh Confirmation.

His Friends reſolve to place him on the Throne.

Extraordinary Election of the Earl of March. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

Purſuant to this Reſolution, the Earl of Warwick (7) drew up his Army in St. John's Fields, in the midſt of Throngs of People, whom ordering to be caſt into a Ring round him, he read aloud the Agreement between the King and the Duke of York, with the Act of Parliament, whereby it was confirmed. That done, he told the People, Henry had notoriouſly violated this Agreement, and ſo forfeited, according to the Act of Parliament, his Right to the Crown. But after all, I do not ſee upon what foundation he could charge the King with the Queen's Proceedings, ſince he was all the while as a Priſoner at London: Neither was he any more his own Maſter, after he was with the Queen. Be this as it will, the Earl of Warwick raiſing his Voice, asked the People, who ſtood round him, whether they would have Henry of Lancaſter for King? The whole Multitude crying out, No, No: He asked, whether according to that Settlement, they would have Edward, Son of the late Duke of York, to reign over them? To which, all the People anſwered with Acclamations, expreſſing their Conſent. 1461.

Aſſembly of the chief Men who adjudged him the Crown. Hall. Stow.

This firſt Step being made, and the People's Mind being, as was pretended, ſufficiently known, a great Council was called of all the Biſhops, Lords, Gentlemen and Magiſtrates, in and about London (8). Edward being preſent in this Aſſembly, ſet forth his Title to the Crown, as well by Birth, as by the fore-mentioned Agreement, and deſired it might be adjudged to him. It would have been great boldneſs, to diſpute his Pretenſion at ſuch a Juncture. So, with one Conſent the Aſſembly declared, that Henry of Lancaſter having forfeited his Right of enjoying the Crown during Life, by the Breach of the ſolemn Agreement made with the Duke of York, and ratified by the Parliament; it was devolved to Edward, eldeſt Son of the Duke of York. Upon this Hall. Declaration, the Crown was offered the Duke, who accepted it, modeſtly confeſſing his Inſufficiency; and adding, that though his Youth and Inexperience made him apprehenſive of taking upon him ſo weighty a Charge, he would however, with God's Aſſiſtance, uſe his utmoſt Endeavors to render his People happy. On the Morrow (9), he went in Proceſſion to St. Paul's, [and from thence, was conducted in great State to Weſtminſter-Hall,] where he ſat in the King's Seat, with the Scepter of St. Edward in his Hand (10). The Archbiſhop of Canterbury having asked the People, whether they would have Edward Earl of March for King; the People anſwered with loud Acclamations. Then, the King took the Homage of the Lords that were preſent. The Ceremony concluding with ſinging Te Deum, Edward was conducted with great Solemnity to the Biſhop's Palace, where Henry uſed to lodge, when he was within the Walls of the City. Next Day, being the 5th of March, he was proclaimed in London, and the neighboring Towns, by the Name of Edward IV. Hall.

End of Henry's Reign.

Thus ended the Reign of Henry VI, which had laſted thirty-eight Years and a Half, without his ever intermedling with the Adminiſtration of the publick Affairs. It does not even appear, that he was, upon any occaſion, much moved with Events; which however were, for the moſt Part, ſuch as would affect a Prince of a different Character. He was fitter for a private Life, than a Crown. His great and only Defect was a natural Imbecillity, which rendered him incapable to govern of himſelf. Ever ruled by thoſe who managed the Affairs in his Name, his Capacity reached not to ſee the Conſequences of the Counſels given him, which to him ſeemed always good. Herein, he was different from the King his Father, whoſe Genius was always ſuperior to that of his Miniſters. As to the reſt, he was chaſte, temperate, extremely religious, abhorring Injuſtice and Cruelty. It was theſe Virtues that have ſerved for Foundation to the Praiſes beſtowed on him by ſeveral Hiſtorians, and which have made ſome conſider him as a true Saint. Indeed, theſe Virtues would have rendered him an accompliſhed Prince, had they been attended with the Qualifications of a Sovereign. But being alone, they ſerved only to make him an honeſt Man, and withal, a very indifferent King, not to ſay worſe. His Incapacity rendered him contemptible to his Subjects. But the Innocency of his Life, never ſuffered their Contempt to turn into Hatred.

Duke

1461. Dukes of Bedford and Gloceſter his Uncles, Princes of great Abilities, and who had his Intereſt at Heart. And, if even in their Life-time, his Affairs began to decline, it may be ſaid to be owing, not ſo much to their Fault, as to ſome unforeſeen Accidents, which all the Prudence in the World could not have prevented. After the Death of the Duke of Bedford, Henry ſuffered himſelf to be governed by the Cardinal of Wincheſter, and the Duke of Suffolk; who, acting not by the ſame Motives, and regarding only their own Affairs, compleated his Ruin. Afterwards, Queen Margaret by her uncommon Abilities, might have reſtored his Affairs, but the King's Glory, and the Nation's Intereſt, were leaſt in her Thoughts. Her ſole View, was to graſp all the Power, and uſe the King's Name to authorize her Paſſions. The Miniſters ſhe employed, were all of the ſame Character. It is not therefore ſtrange, that the King's Affairs ſhould run ſo ſwiftly into Confuſion. The Death of the Duke of Gloceſter, will be an indelible Stain in Margaret's Reputation, and unhappily, this Crime reflected but too much upon the King himſelf, ſince he had not the reſolution to oppoſe it, or puniſh the Authors. Accordingly, it was manifeſt, that Heaven took publick Vengeance of this Murder, by the Civil Wars which enſued, and which occaſioned the Ruin of the King, the Queen, the Prince their Son, and the whole Houſe of Lancaſter. 1461.

Henry VI. was thirty-nine Years and about a Quarter old, when he was diſpoſſeſſed of a Crown, which he had enjoyed almoſt from his very Birth (1). He ſtill lived long enough to be the ſport of Fortune, as will be ſeen in the following Reign. Edward his Son, Prince of Wales, was in his nineteenth Year, at the time of this Cataſtrophe (2).

(1) In the firſt Parliament of his Reign the Queen-Mother came and ſat among the Lords, with the young King in her Lap.

(2) The moſt remarkable Things during this Reign were theſe: The Art of Printing being found out at Mentz in Germany by John Guttenbergen, was brought into England by William Caxton of London Mercer, who firſt practiſed the ſame in the Abbey of Weſtminſter, in 1471. Hall, fol. 170. Stow's Ann. p. 404.

In the 23d Year of this Reign it was enacted in Parliament, That when Wheat was ſold for ſix Shillings and Eight-pence the Quarter; Rye for four Shillings; and Barley for three Shillings; it ſhould be lawful to export the ſaid Kinds of Corn into foreign Parts without Licence.----- In the Year 1454, there was ſuch Plenty of Corn, that a Quarter of Wheat was commonly ſold for twelve or fourteen-pence; and a Quarter of Malt for ſixteen or ſeventeen-pence at moſt. Stow's Ann. p. 398.

Queen Margaret began Queen's-College in Cambridge, which was finiſhed by Edward IV's Queen her Enemy.----Archbiſhop Kemp built the Divinity-School at Oxford, as it now ſtands, and St. Paul's Croſs.---- William Eaſtfield Mayor of London, built at his own Charge the Water-Conduit in Fleet-ſtreet; and John Wells Mayor of London, the Conduit, commonly called the Standard in Cheap.-----In the Year 1446, Sir Simon Eyre Mayor of London, built Leaden-hall, to be a common Garner for the City. Stow's Survey, B. V. p. 120.---- In 1453, Sir John Norman, Mayor of the ſame, went by Water to Weſtminſter to take his Oath; being the firſt that went in that manner. For before that time they rode on Horſeback. Idem. p. 121.

I. In this and the two foregoing Reigns, the Parliament was reformed in many Particulars, as appears by the Statutes. Firſt, in point of Elections, the Parliament 7 Henry IV, and (25 Henry VI,) ordained, "That the Election of Knights ſhall be at the next County-Court, after the Writ de-"livered to the Sheriff, and that the Names of the Perſons elected ſhall be returned by Indenture between the Sheriff and the Electors." This the Sheriff was to do, under Penalty of one hundred Pound, and a Year's Impriſonment, without Bail or Mainpriſe, beſides Damages for falſe Returns, (11 Henry IV. 8 Henry VI. 23 Henry VI.) Thus the Election was reduced, but the Perſons were not as yet, for hitherto any Engliſhman had right to give or receive a Vote, whereſoever he reſided. But (1 Hen. V.) (8 Hen. VI.) the Parliament reduced theſe alſo to their proper Counties, or elſe rendered them uncapable to vote or ſerve for any County: And the like Order was made for the Burroughs, (23 Henry VI.) "That no Perſon muſt ſerve for any City or Burrough, nor give vote in electing ſuch as ſhall ſerve for that Town, unleſs they be both Free "and Reſiants within that City or Burrough." This was a ſeaſonable Law, for the Times of Henry IV had taught Men, That a King that hath Soldiers diſperſed over the Kingdom, can eaſily ſway the County-Courts, and make ſuch Parliaments as they pleaſe. However, this was not enough: For all Electors, though of the meaneſt ſort, could do as much hurt with their Vote, as thoſe of the beſt ſort could do good by theirs. This made Elections much ſubject to Confuſions and Parties, and rendered the Parliament leſs conſiderable. Hence (in 8 Hen. VI.) it was ordained, "That "no Man ſhould give his Vote in Elections in the County, unleſs he had forty Shillings yearly in free Lands or Tenements, and this is to be teſ-"tified upon Oath of the Party." And more plainly, two Years after (10 Hen. VI.) it was ordered, "That the ſaid Lands ſhould be within "the County." Thus the Free-men yielded up their Liberty of Election to the Free-holders, poſſibly not knowing what they did. But this change was no leſs good than great. 1ſt, It prevented Parties, Tumults, and Bloodſhed; for the Preface of the Statute ſhows, the meaneſt held himſelf as good a Man, as the greateſt in the County. 2dly, Where the Multitude prevails, the meaner ſort are ſuperior; and theſe (generally ignorant,) cannot judge of Perſons, nor Times; but being, for the moſt part, led by Faction or Affection, rather than by right Underſtanding, make ſuch Elections as are either inconvenient, or injurious to the State. 3dly, There is no leſs Equity in the Change than Policy. For what can be more reaſonable, than that thoſe Men only ſhould have their Votes in Election of the Common-Council of the Kingdom, whoſe Eſtates are chargeable with the publick Taxes and Aſſeſſments, and with the Wages of thoſe Perſons that are choſen for the publick Service? But above all, this advancing of the Free-holders was beneficial to the Freemen of England, though perhaps they conſidered it not. Firſt, It abated the Power of the Lords and great Men, who held the inferior ſort at their Devotion, and much of their Poſſeſſions by their Will. 2dly, It raiſed the Spirit of the meaner ſort to publick Regards, and by a kind of Ambition, to aſpire to the Degree of a Freeholder, in order to be ſomewhat in the Commonwealth. And thus leaving the meaneſt Rank, rack'd to the very Dregs, they become leſs conſiderable, and more ſubject to the coercive Power; whilſt, in the mean time, the Freeholder, now advanced to the Degree of a Yeoman, becomes no leſs careful to maintain Correſpondency with the Laws, than he was induſtrious to attain his Degree. Laſtly, To bind all the reſt, a negative Law was made, (23 Hen. VI.) That the Perſons elected in the County, muſt not be of the Degree of a Yeoman, but of the moſt noted Knights, Eſquires, or Gentlemen of the County, which tacitly implies, it was too common to advance thoſe of the meaner ſort. The Perſon thus agreed upon, his Entertainment muſt be accordingly; and therefore the manner of taxing in full County, and levying the Rate of Wages for their Maintenance, is reformed and ſettled (23 Hen. VI:) And laſtly, their Perſons are put under the Protection of the Law in an eſpecial manner; and a penal Law is made (11 Hen. VI.) againſt Force upon their Perſons, either in going to, or attending the Parliament. Thus, even in theſe Times of Confuſion, a Foundation was laid of a more uniform Government in future Times, than England hitherto had ſeen.

II. In the firſt Year of Henry VI, A Pound weight of Gold, of the old Standard, was coined into forty five Rials of ten Shillings, or a proportionable Number of Half-Rials, and Quarter, or Farthing-Rials, at five Shillings, and two Shillings and ſix Pence. Theſe Rials give him crowned with an imperial Crown, ſeated on the Throne, with a Scepter and Globe, inſcribed, HENRICUS. DEI. GRA. REX. ANGL. ET. FRAN. DNS. HIB. Reverſe, the Arms of France and England, quarterly, IHESUS. AVTEM. TRANSIENS. &c. (See Fig. 1.) By the ſame Indenture, inſtead of Nobles, and Half-Nobles, were coined ſixty ſeven and a half to the Pound, Angels, at ſix Shillings and eight Pence, or a proportionable Number of Angelets, at three Shillings and four Pence. Conſequently the Pound Troy, was coined into twenty two Pounds ten Shillings, by Tale. The Angels were impreſſed with Michael and the Dragon, HENRIC. DI. GRA. REX. ANGL. Z. FRA. Reverſe, a Shield, with the Arms of France and England quartered, in a Ship, having a Croſs for a Maſt, on one Side the Letter H, on the other the Roſe. PER. CRVCE. TVA. SALVA. NOS. XRE. RED. (See Fig. 2.) The Salut was a French Coin, like his Father's, and very much reſembled the Silver Groat, which he likewiſe coined in that Kingdom, ſaving that the Groats wanted the Angel and Virgin over the Shield, and inſtead of CHRISTVS. VINCIT. had SIT. NOMEN. DOMINI. BENEDICTVM. By the Indenture of the ſame firſt Year of Henry VI, the Silver Money was of the old Standard, one hundred and twelve Groats to the Pound, making in Tale thirty ſeven Shillings and ſix Pence, or a proportionable Number of Half-Groats, Sterlings, Half-Pence, and Farthings. Theſe are diſtinguiſhed from all his Predeceſſors, by the Crown, he being the firſt of our Monarchs that bore the arched Crown, with Globe and Croſs upon it. (See Fig. 3.) Theſe were moſt coined at London, but there were other Mints at York, Briſtol, and Dunwich, Dublin, Canterbury, and at York with the Keys. The Half-penny has likewiſe the King's Head very fair. H. D. G. ROSA. SIE. SPA. By Indenture, the fourth of this Reign, the Value of Gold was brought down again to ſixteen Pounds thirteen Shillings and four Pence, and the Silver to thirty Shillings. By another Indenture of the laſt Year of this Reign, it was raiſed again to thirty ſeven Shillings and ſix Pence, and ſo continued for near fifty Years. In the thirty ſeventh of this Reign, Braſs Money was firſt coined in Ireland, but there is no perfect Account from any Author that has ever ſeen it.

A DISSERTATION on the MAID of ORLEANS.

THE Actions of JOAN of ARC, commonly called the Maid of Orleans, made formerly a great Noiſe in the World. We find them diſperſed in the Hiſtories of France and England, with Circumſtances all ſavouring of Prodigy. Moſt of the Writers upon this Subject have ſcarce left their Readers the Liberty of reaſoning and judging. They have expreſly decided, ſome, that Joan of Arc was inſpired by God, others, that ſhe was an Inſtrument of the Devil. But even in this Difference, they all agree to inſinuate, that what ſhe did could not be performed without a ſupernatural Aſſiſtance. However, impartial and unprejudiced Readers find great Difficulties in both theſe Opinions. As they do not ſee wherein Religion can be concerned in Joan's Actions, they think it equally hard to believe, that God ſhould either ſupernaturally raiſe this Maid in favour of Charles VII, or give the Devil an extraordinary Power to make her his Inſtrument to ruin the Affairs of the Engliſh in France. Hence ſeveral have been induced to embrace a third Opinion; namely, That the pretended Inſpiration of Joan of Arc, was only a Contrivance thought proper to produce the Effect, it did indeed produce. This Diverſity of Opinions, joined to the Marvellous viſible in the Actions of a Country Girl, very naturally raiſes a Curioſity to know what may be relied on. Wherefore I am perſuaded, it will not be unacceptable fairly to examine this Matter, with the ſole view of diſcovering, as far as poſſible, the Truth. As I deſign to be as brief as the thing will allow, omitting the Learning, ſuch a Subject is capable of, I ſhall only relate the Facts and Teſtimonies which may clear this Affair, and afterwards make ſome Remarks upon the whole. They who are impatient to purſue the Hiſtory of England, may diſpenſe with reading this Diſſertation, without fear of loſing any thing abſolutely neceſſary to be known.

It muſt firſt be obſerved, that we have but one ſingle cotemporary Author, who gives an Account of the Maid of Orleans. All the After-writers have added ſomething to what he relates, in order to embelliſh their Hiſtory. Monſtrelet is the Author I mean. He was one of the Retinue of Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy, and had himſelf ſeen this Girl. But he is extremely reſerved in what he ſays. He never gives his own Opinion, and the Reaſon is very evident. For Joan making her appearance when the Duke of Burgundy was in Alliance with England, Monſtrelet, with all of that Party, did not believe her inſpired. But as he writ not his Chronicle till after the Duke was reconciled to King Charles, he thought it not proper to combat in his Writings the general Opinion of the French, who were then his Maſter's Friends. On the other hand, as probably, in changing his Party, he had not changed his Opinion of Joan, he took care to ſay nothing, to make it thought he was under the ſame Prejudice with the reſt of the French. It ſeems to me therefore that Monſtrelet may be taken for a Guide, who, whatever his Opinion was, has ſaid nothing to render him ſuſpected. The Truth is, he never ſays either that Joan was, or was not inſpired.

The ſame Author has inſerted in his Chronicle a Letter written in the Name of Henry VI to the Duke of Burgundy, to acquaint him with what paſſed at the Trial and Condemnation of the Maid of Orleans. This Letter might be juſtly ſuſpected of Partiality, if the Facts it contains did not, for the moſt part, agree with the Records of the Trial mentioned hereafter. So, this Letter is a farther means to help us to diſcover the Truth.

We have a third means which is both the ampleſt and moſt conſiderable, namely, Joan's Examination and Anſwers, of which the famous Stephen Paſquier has given us the Particulars. Paſquier ſays, he had Joan's original Trial four whole Years in his hands, and what he has related was faithfully extracted. But we muſt carefully diſtinguiſh what Paſquier ſays as of himſelf, from the Records of the Trial. He was ſo prejudiced in favour of Joan, that he could not help being angry with thoſe of his Countrymen who did not believe her inſpired. He ſays, they were worſe than the Engliſh, and extremely injurious to the Honour of France. So, conſidering only his private Opinion, he may be ſaid to have juſtly rendered himſelf ſuſpected to one of the Parties. But the Trial itſelf is an original Piece beyond all Suſpicion, ſince we find there Word for Word, Joan's own Anſwers to the Articles ſhe was examined upon.

Monſtrelet's Chronicle, the King of England's Letter to the Duke of Burgundy, and the Trial of the Maid, are the three Evidences which muſt be examined, in order to paſs a true Judgment upon this Affair. As to the Facts diſperſed in the Hiſtories of France and England, which are not drawn from theſe three Fountains, I do not think they ought to be much regarded. It is evident that the Hiſtorians have copied, without any previous Examination, thoſe that writ before them, and that ſeveral have induſtriouſly embelliſhed their Subject, by relating more Wonders than there really were. If ſome are to be credited, Joan worked Miracles, foretold future Events, knew Secrets unknown to all but the King, her Heart was found whole and entire amongſt the Aſhes of her funeral Pile, and out of the Flames which conſumed her Body, was ſeen to fly a white Dove, the Emblem of her Chaſtity. According to theſe Hiſtorians, Joan had the Command of the Convoy which entered Orleans, and led the Beſieged to the Aſſault of the Engliſh Forts. By her ſole Advice the Battle of Patay was fought, and to her Valour the French were indebted for their Victory. In a word, they pretend Joan did all, and leave King Charles's Generals only the Honour of following her, and fighting under her Banner. In all this they doubtleſs exceed the Truth. The ſureſt way is to keep to the three forementioned Authorities, which it will be neceſſary to examine. I ſhall begin with Monſtrelet, and cite ſome Paſſages of his Chronicle, eſſential to the Point in hand, for it would be tedious to copy all he has ſaid concerning the Maid.

Monſtrelet. Vol. II. fol. 41.

" Now in the Year abovementioned, came to the " King at Chinon where he reſided, a young Damſel
" about twenty Years old (1), called Joan, cloathed and " dreſſed like a Man. She was born in the Parts between
" Lorrain and Burgundy, at a Place called Droimy (2),
" not far from Vaucouleur. This Joan was long a Ser" vant at an Inn, and had the Courage to ride the " Horſes to Water, and likewiſe to perform other Feats
" which young Girls are not uſed to do. Being turned " away, ſhe was ſent to the King by a certain Knight
" called Sir Robert de Baudrencourt, Captain under the " King, of Vaucouleur, who furniſhed her with Horſes,
" and four or five Attendants. She ſtiled herſelf Pucelle
" [or Maid,] inſpired with divine Grace, and ſaid ſhe
" was ſent to the King to put him in poſſeſſion of his " Kingdom, of which he was wrongfully deprived. She " was in a very mean Condition. She was about two " Months in the King's Palace, whom ſhe ſeveral times
" admoniſhed to furniſh her with Men and Aid, and
" ſhe would repulſe his Enemies, and exalt his Domi" nion. In the mean time, the King and his Council
" gave no great Credit to whatever ſhe ſaid, but took her
" for a Mad-Woman, and not well in her Senſes. For to
" ſo great Princes and other Noblemen, ſuch or the like
" Words are very doubtful and dangerous, as well on ac" count of the Wrath of our Lord chiefly, as of the " Slander from the Talk of the World. All her Words
" were in the Name of God; and therefore many of
" thoſe that ſaw and heard her ſpeak, were ſtrongly per-
" ſuaded ſhe was, as ſhe herſelf ſaid, inſpired by God.
" She was ſeveral times examined by notable Clerks and " other learned Men of great Authority, that her Inten" tion might be more fully known. But ſhe always kept
" to her Point, ſaying, if the King would believe her,
" ſhe would reſtore him to his Dominions. —— When ſhe
" came before the King, there were preſent the Duke of " Alençon, the King's Marſhal, and ſeveral Generals.
" For the King had held a Council concerning the Siege
" of Orleans, and from thence went to Poictiers, and this

(1) She was then twenty ſeven Years of Age; for in her Examination in the Year 1431, ſhe declared ſhe was twenty nine Years old, conſequently when ſhe came to the King in 1429, ſhe was twenty ſeven Years of Age. Rapin.

(2) It ſhould be read Domprè. Rapin.

" Maid with him. Shortly after, the Marſhal was ordered " to carry Proviſions and other Neceſſaries to Orleans. " Joan would go with him, and requeſted ſhe might have " a Suit of Armour and Man's Cloaths, which ſhe was " furniſhed withal. Preſently after, ſhe ſet up her Stan- " dard and went to Blois, where the Rendezvous was, " and from thence to Orleans with the reſt. She was " always completely armed. In this Expedition many " came and liſted under her. And when ſhe was arrived " at Orleans, ſhe was made very welcome, and many " People were overjoyed at her coming."

This is all Monſtrelet ſays of the Maid, to her Entry into Orleans. It may be obſerved, it was not ſhe that commanded the Convoy, but only that ſhe attended the Marſhal with ſome who had liſted under her. As to the ſtorming of the Forts, it ſeems at firſt from what he ſays of it, that Joan commanded in all the Sallies. But afterwards he ſays: " And notwithſtanding that in theſe three " Aſſaults, Joan is reported by common Fame to have " had the chief Command, yet all or moſt part of the " noble Knights and Captains were in them, who during " the Siege, were in the City of Orleans, and behaved, " each for his Part, valiantly, as Warriors ought to do on " ſuch Occaſions." He does not fail however, highly to commend her Valour in ſeveral Places. For inſtance, ſpeaking of the March of the French Army after the raiſing of the Siege of Orleans, he ſays: " Joan was ever in " the Front before her Standard. And in all the March- " es, her Fame was ſpread, as if there had been no other " Warrior but her ſelf."

After his Deſcription of the Battle of Patay, he adds theſe Words; " and eſpecially Joan acquired on ſuch oc- " caſions ſo great Praiſe and Reputation, that all People " imagined, the King's Enemies would be no longer able " to reſiſt her, and that ſhortly by her means the King " would be reſtored to his whole Kingdom."

fol. 45.

In fine, not to cite too many Paſſages of this Author, it will ſuffice to obſerve in a word, that when he mentions the Inſpiration of the Maid, he never ſays what he himſelf thinks, but always, that ſhe called her ſelf inſpired. He is ſo very cautious, that in ſpeaking what the Duke of Burgundy ſaid to her, when he went to ſee her after ſhe was taken, he pretends not to remember it, though he was himſelf an Ear-Witneſs. His Words are theſe: " The " Duke went to ſee her at the Place where ſhe was lodged, " and ſpoke to her ſome Words, which I have forgot, " tho' I was preſent." It is eaſy to ſee, the Duke's Words were Reproaches for ſeducing the People, and Menaces upon that account. But Monſtrelet chuſes rather to be ſilent, than to ſay any thing pro or con.

fol. 57.

He relates moreover, that a few Days before Joan threw her ſelf into Compiegne, ſhe had fought a Captain of the Duke of Burgundy's called Franquet d'Arras, and having taken him Priſoner, cut off his Head. But he does not ſay whether juſtly or not, contenting himſelf with relating the Fact, without giving his Opinion.

When he comes at laſt to her Condemnation, he ſo expreſſes himſelf, that he does not diſcover his own Sentiments. He only tranſcribes the King of England's Letter to the Duke of Burgundy upon that occaſion. As that Letter is an Original which may help to diſcover the Truth, it will be proper to inſert it at length.

Moſt Dear and Well-beloved UNCLE,

Monſtrelet. Vol. II. fol. 70. Hall. fol. 113, 114.

" THE ſervent Affection which we are ſenſible you " have, as a true Catholick, for our Holy Mother " Church, and for the Advancement of our Faith, juſtly " exhorts and admoniſhes us to notify to you in writing, " what, to the Honour of our ſaid Holy Mother Church, " to the ſtrengthening of our Faith, and to the Extirpa- " tion of peſtilent Errors, has been lately in this our City " of Roan ſolemnly tranſacted.

" It is now well known almoſt every where by com- " mon Fame, how the Woman who called herſelf Joan " the Maid, had, for above theſe two Years, contrary to " the divine Law, and the Condition of her Sex, wan- " dered about in Man's Clothes, a thing abominable to " God, and in ſuch Dreſs brought to our and your " mortal Enemy; and to whom and to thoſe of his Party, " Churchmen, Nobles and Commons, ſhe frequently in- " timated, ſhe was ſent from God; preſumptuouſly boaſt- " ing to have perſonally and viſibly converſed with " St. Michael, and great Numbers of Angels and Saints " of Paradiſe, as St. Catherine and St. Margaret. By " this falſe Intimation, and the Promiſe of future Victo- " ries, ſhe turned the Hearts of many Men and Women " from the Truth, to Fables and Lies. She likewiſe " wore Arms appointed for Knights and 'Squires, and ſet " up a Standard. Moreover, ſhe demanded with great " Boldneſs, Pride and Preſumption, to bear the moſt ex- " cellent Arms of France, which ſhe partly obtained, and " bore in ſeveral Incurſions and Aſſaults, as did her Bro- " thers alſo, according to Report: Namely, Azure, Two " Flower-de-Luces, Or, and a Sword, the Point up- " wards, fermed with a Crown. In this State, ſhe took " the Field, and led Men at Arms and Archers in Bands " and great Companies, to commit and exerciſe inhuman " Cruelties, by ſhedding human Blood, by raiſing Sedi- " tions and Commotions among the People, leading them " into Perjury, Rebellion, Superſtition and erroneous " Opinions; by diſturbing all true Peace, and renewing " mortal Wars; by ſuffering herſelf to be honoured and " reverenced of many as a Saint; and by working other " damnable Deeds, too tedious to relate, which however " were well known in ſeveral Places, and at which almoſt " all Chriſtendom was offended. But God taking Pity " on his faithful People, and not ſuffering them to remain " long in Danger, nor to continue in vain, pernicious, " and novel Opinions, which they had raſhly embraced, " has permitted, through his great Goodneſs and Mercy, " that this Woman ſhould be taken in your Army at the " Siege you were carrying on at Compiegne, and by your " good means put into our Power. And becauſe we were " immediately required by the Biſhop of the Dioceſe " where ſhe was taken, to deliver over to him as her " Ordinary Eccleſiaſtical Judge, this ſame Joan branded " with the Crime of High-Treaſon againſt the Divine " Majeſty; we, as well out of Reverence to our Holy " Mother Church, whoſe Ordinances we juſtly preſer to " our own Will and Pleaſure, as alſo for the Honour " and Exaltation of our Holy Faith, delivered her to him " to be brought to her Tryal, without ſuffering our ſecu- " lar Judges to take Vengeance upon her, as we might " lawfully have done, conſidering the great Damages " and Miſchiefs, the horrible Murders, and deteſtable " Cruelties, with innumerable other Crimes, ſhe had com- " mitted againſt us and our dutiful loyal People. The " Biſhop joined with him the Vicar of the Inquiſitor of " Errors and Hereſies: And calling in with them a great " and notable Number of ſolemn Maſters, and Doctors " in Divinity and Canon-Law, commenced with great " Solemnity and due Gravity the Proceſs of this Joan. " After he and the Inquiſitor, Judges in the Cauſe, had " for ſeveral Days examined her, they ordered her Con- " feſſions and Aſſertions to be maturely conſidered by the " Maſters and Doctors, and in general by all the Faculties " of our moſt dearly beloved Daughter the Univerſity of " Paris, before whom the Confeſſions and Aſſertions were " laid. By their Opinion and Determination, the " Judges found Joan guilty of Superſtition, Witchcraft, " Blaſphemy againſt God and his Saints, Schiſm, and of " greatly erring in the Faith of Jeſus Chriſt. And in " order to reſtore her to the Union and Communion of " our Holy Mother Church, to cleanſe her from her " horrible and pernicious Crimes and Wickedneſs, and " to preſerve her Soul from eternal Damnation, ſhe was " frequently and long, very charitably and calmly admo- " niſhed, to reject and caſt away all her Errors; and " humbly return to the Way and Paths of Truth, or " otherwiſe ſhe would greatly endanger both Soul and " Body.

" But the moſt pernicious and divided Spirit of Pride " and outragious Preſumption, which is always endea- " vouring to deſtroy the Union and Safety of Chriſtians, " ſo ſtrongly poſſeſſed this ſame Joan, that notwithſtand- " ing all the holy Doctrine or Counſel, or other mild " Exhortation, adminiſtred to her; her hardened and ob- " ſtinate Heart would not be humbled or mollified. She " ſtill boaſted, that all ſhe had done was performed by " the Command of God and the holy Virgin, who had " viſibly appeared to her. And what is worſe, ſhe would " recognize no Judge on Earth, except God alone, and " the Saints in Paradiſe; rejecting the Judgment of our " holy Father the Pope, and of a General Council, and " the Univerſal Church Militant. Whereupon, her Ec- " cleſiaſtical Judges ſeeing her perſevere ſo long, and ſo " obſtinately in her Reſolution and Purpoſe, ordered her " to be conducted to the Church, before the Clergy and " People, there aſſembled in great Multitudes; in " the preſence of whom her wicked Purpoſes were ſet " forth, expoſed and declared, ſolemnly and publickly, by " a notable Doctor in Divinity; to the Exaltation of " our Faith, the Extirpation of Errors, the Edification " and Amendment of Chriſtian People. After that, ſhe " was charitably admoniſhed to return to the Union of " Holy Church, and reform her Faults and Errors, " wherein ſhe was hardened. And therefore, the Judges " proceeded to denounce upon her, the uſual and cuſto- " mary Sentence in ſuch Caſes. But before the Sentence " was fully declared, ſhe ſeemingly began to relent, cry- " ing out, ſhe would return to Holy Church. This was " readily and gladly heard by the Judges and Clergy, " who kindly received her, hoping by that Means, her " Soul and Body would be ſaved from Perdition and Tor- " ment. Then ſhe ſubmitted to the Ordinance of Holy " Church, abjured with her own Mouth her Errors and " deteſtable Crimes, and made a publick Recantation, ſign- " ing the Inſtrument with her own Hand. And thus, " our compaſſionate Mother Holy Church, rejoicing over " this penitent Sinner, glad to find and reſtore this ſtrayed " and loſt Sheep, to the reſt of the Fold, condemned her " to do Penance in Priſon. But hardly was ſhe there, " before the Fire of her Pride, which ſeemed to be ex- " tinguiſhed, rekindled into peſtiferous Flames by the Sug- " geſtions of the Enemy. And preſently, the unfortunate " Joan relapſed into her former Errors and Follies, lately " abjured and recanted.

" For this reaſon, according to the Decrees and Or- " ders of Holy Church, ſhe was again publickly preach- " ed, that ſhe might not hereafter infect the reſt of the " Members of Chriſt. And, as ſhe was relapſed into " her wonted wretched Crimes and Faults, ſhe was de- " livered over to the ſecular Arm, and condemned to be " burnt. Perceiving her end to approach, ſhe plainly " owned and confeſſed, that the Spirits which, ſhe ſaid, " appeared to her ſeveral times, were evil and lying Spirits, " and that their frequent Promiſes to free her, were falſe. " So ſhe acknowledged, ſhe had been deceived and mocked " by theſe Spirits, and purſuant to her Sentence, was car- " ried bound to the old Market-Place in Roan, and pub- " lickly burnt in the Sight of all the People."

Before we proceed to her Trial, it will not be amiſs to ſee a Letter, ſaid to be ſent by her, to the King of England and his Generals, before the Siege of Orleans was raiſed. You have it as follows, in the Words of John de Serres, a French Hiſtorian.

King of ENGLAND,

" Do Juſtice to the King of Heaven, in his Royal " Blood. Reſtore to the Virgin the Keys of all the good " Cities you have forced. She is come from God to " demand the Blood Royal, and is ready to make Peace, " if you are willing to do Juſtice, and reſtore what you " have taken away. King of England, if you will not " do thus, I am chief of the War. In what Place ſo- " ever I find your Men in France, I will make them de- " part, whether they will or no. If they will ſubmit, " I will take them to Mercy. The Virgin comes from " the King of Heaven, to drive you out of France. If " you will not obey, ſhe will make ſuch a Havock, as " has not been known in France this thouſand Years. " And be aſſured, the King of Heaven will ſend to " her and her good Men at Arms, greater ſtrength than " you can have. Go in God's Name into your own " Country. Perſiſt not obſtinately in your Opinion; " for you ſhall not hold France of the King of Heaven, " Son of the Holy Mary. But King Charles the right " Heir ſhall poſſeſs it, to whom God has given it, and " he ſhall enter Paris with a noble Train. You, William " Poullet Earl of Suffolk, John Lord Talbot, Thomas Lord " Scales, Lieutenants of the Duke of Bethford, and you " Duke of Bethford, ſtiling yourſelf Regent of France, " ſpare innocent Blood. Leave Orleans at Liberty. If " you do not Juſtice to thoſe you have injured, the French " will perform the nobleſt Exploit that ever was done " in Chriſtendom. Hear this Advice from God and the " Virgin."

This Letter, writ in a prophetick Style, by a Girl who pretended to be ſent from God, and appears ſo certain of the Future, ought to contain nothing but what was afterwards found to be exactly true. And yet, there are Predictions in it, which were never accompliſhed. For inſtance, it is not true, that ſhe drove one ſingle Engliſhman out of France. She farther affirms, ſhe will make ſo great a Havock, as had not been known this thouſand Years in France. Theſe Words can relate only to the raiſing of the Siege of Orleans, and the Battle of Patay. But the firſt of theſe Actions has nothing in itſelf extraordinary. That a Garriſon ſhould make a Sally and drive the Beſiegers from their Poſts, is a thing too common to be reckoned a Miracle. As to the Battle of Patay, ſuppoſing Joan had commanded the French Army, which ſhe did not, can that Action be ſaid to deſerve to be expreſſed in the Terms ſhe uſes? The Engliſh had only ſix thouſand, and loſt two thouſand five hundred. That Defeat hardly bears any Proportion to thoſe of the French at Crecy, Poictiers, Azincourt, the firſt of which, was but a hundred Years before Joan's time, and the laſt but thirteen or fourteen.

It is further remarkable, That in her Letter, ſhe ſpeaks as if ſhe were actually at the Head of the Armies of France, ſince ſhe ſummoned the King of England, to return her the Keys of all the Towns in his Poſſeſſion. And yet, the Letter muſt have been writ whilſt ſhe was only upon the March, with the Convoy deſigned for Orleans; which, inſtead of commanding, ſhe obtained, ſays Monſtrelet, as a ſort of favor, leave to accompany. I ſay nothing of her ſpeaking to the King of England, as if then a grown Perſon, though he was but nine Years old, exhorting him not to perſiſt in his Opinion, nor of her admoniſhing him to depart out of France, though he was then in England; theſe things may be paſſed over as being in a prophetick Stile, and taken as ſo many Figures of Speech. But ſhe ſhould at leaſt have known the Names of thoſe ſhe addreſſed herſelf to, and not have called the Earl of Suffolk, Poullet, when his Name was de la Pole. To miſtake the Name of Foreigners, may be eaſily excuſed in common Perſons: But I do not know whether it is pardonable in one, who pretended to ſpeak in the Name, and by the Authority of God. Theſe, and ſeveral other Reaſons, which it would be tedious to inſiſt upon, induce me to believe, this Letter was compoſed after the Event, by ſome Perſon, that knew the Maid had really writ to the King of England, or the Duke of Bedford, as we ſhall ſee preſently.

Let us proceed now to the Proceſs of Joan of Arc, as we find it in Paſquier. I ſay to the Proceſs, and not to the Sentiment of that Author, who lived too long after her, for his Teſtimony to be of any great Weight. It ſuffices to ſay with regard to him, that he every where ſpeaks of her with great Commendations, and believed ſhe was really inſpired, and ſent from God to ſave France. Here follows her Examination and Anſwers, which I ſhall abridge as much as poſſible, without obſcuring the Senſe.

In the firſt Place, being charged to ſpeak the Truth, ſhe replied, ſhe would ſay what concerned her Father and Mother, but not diſcloſe the Revelations ſhe had told King Charles, though in eight Days ſhe ſhould know whether ſhe might or no.

To the ſecond Queſtion, concerning her Name and Family, ſhe anſwered, ſhe was of the Village of Dompré, was called in her own Country Jeanette, but in France, Joan of Arc. That her Father's Name was James of Arc, and her Mother's Iſabella, &c.

That ſhe was then about twenty nine Years old.

That ſhe was by Trade a Seamſtreſs and Spinſter, and not a Shepherdeſs.

That ſhe went every Year to Confeſſion.

That ſhe frequently heard a Voice from Heaven, and in the Place where ſhe heard it, ſaw alſo a Light, which ſhe took for an Angel. That the Voice had often warned her to go into France, and raiſe the Siege of Orleans. That ſhe ſhould go to Robert de Baudricourt, Captain of Vaucouleurs, who would give her a Guard to conduct her, which ſhe did accordingly.

She added; ſhe knew, God loved the Duke of Orleans, and ſhe had received more Revelations concerning him, than any Perſon living, except the King.

Item. She confeſſed ſhe was ingaged in a Skirmiſh before Paris, on a Holy-day, and being asked whether that was Right, ſhe anſwered, Go on.

Being asked when ſhe heard the Voice laſt, ſhe replied, Yeſterday, three times; in the Morning; at the time of Veſpers; and when the Ave Maria Bell rung in the Evening.

Being asked, whether ſhe had ever ſeen any Fairies, ſhe anſwered, No; but that one of her God-Mothers pretended to have ſeen ſome at the Fairy-Tree, near the Village of Dompré.

Being examined who they were that ſpoke to her, ſhe anſwered, St. Catherine, and St. Margaret, and ſhe had frequently ſeen and touched them ſince ſhe was in Priſon, and kiſſed the Ground on which they trod. Moreover, that ſhe conſulted them about her Anſwers.

She ſaid further, ſhe had put on Man's Cloaths by the expreſs Command of God, and was wounded in the Neck before Orleans.

Item. That, within ſeven Years, the Engliſh ſhould leave a greater Pledge than that before Orleans, and loſe all they poſſeſſed in France.

That they ſhould ſuſtain in France a much greater Loſs, than what they had yet done, by means of a great Victory, which the French ſhould gain over them.

Being asked, whether ſhe bore any Coat of Arms, ſhe anſwered, No, but only her Standard. That it was true, the King had given her Brothers a Coat of Arms; namely, in a Field Azure, two Flower-de-luces, Or, and a Crown in the Middle.

She added, that her Father dreamt ſhe would go with the Soldiers, and for that Reaſon kept her ſhort, and ſaid, he had rather ſee her drowned.

Then ſhe was charged with throwing herſelf headlong from the Tower, in order to kill herſelf, whilſt ſhe was Priſoner at Beaurevoir. She confeſſed the Fact, but ſaid, ſaid, her Deſign was not to kill herſelf, but make her Eſcape.

Whilſt her Proceſs was in hand, ſhe deſired leave to hear Maſs, and communicate at Eaſter. This was granted her, upon Condition ſhe would put on Women's Clothes; but ſhe choſe rather not to communicate, than do it on that Condition.

She was taxed with ſuffering herſelf to be worſhipped; but ſhe replied, if ſome People had kiſſed her Hand, or Clothes, it was without her Conſent.

After theſe Anſwers, came ſeveral others, which give occaſion to believe, they were made to as many Interrogations, ſuppreſſed by Paſquier. And are as follow:

That ſhe had talked with St. Catherine and St. Margaret, at the Fairy-Tree, and not with the Fairies, as ſhe had been accuſed. That ſhe began at thirteen Years of Age to converſe with theſe Saints.

That at twenty Years old, ſhe hired herſelf at Neufchatel in Lorrain, to a Woman that kept an Inn, called La Rouſſe, and there led the Beaſts to Graſs, and watered the Horſes, and ſo learned to ride.

That whilſt ſhe was there, ſhe had a Law-Suit about a Marriage, before the Official of Toul, and carried her Cauſe.

That after ſerving five Years, ſhe returned to her Father, and, againſt his Will, went to Baudricourt, who made no Account of her for the two firſt Months, but in the third gave her a Guard of twenty Knights, a Squire, and four Servants, to conduct her to Chinon, where the King was.

The Judges earneſtly preſſing her to put on Woman's Apparel: She replied, ſhe deſired to have none of her Sex's Clothes, but a Shift after ſhe was dead.

Whereupon ſhe was told, ſhe ſhould be received to Communion only in Women's Clothes; but ſhe refuſed to comply with that Condition. However, ſhe conſented at laſt to take a Woman's Habit to hear Maſs, provided ſhe ſhould be allowed to put on Man's Clothes again. But as that favour was refuſed her, ſhe declared, ſhe would rather die than be dreſſed like a Woman, contrary to God's expreſs Command.

She ſaid likewiſe, ſhe had promiſed the King to raiſe the Siege of Orleans, and cauſe him to be crowned.

She was taxed with being always againſt a Peace; which ſhe owned, affirming, there could be no Peace concluded, unleſs the Engliſh would leave France.

The Proctor charging her with cauſing a Sword to be concealed in St. Catherine's Church at Fierbois, and ſending for the ſame, after ſhe had talked with the King, ſhe denied ſhe had ever uſed any Frauds. She owned however, ſhe had heard three Maſſes in that Church.

Upon being accuſed of ſaying, ſhe was ſent from God to wage War, which was directly contrary to the Will of God; ſhe anſwered, that in the Letter ſent by her to the King of England and the Princes of the Blood, ſhe had firſt offered them Peace. Paſquier ſays, the Letter is copied in the Trial. But as he thought not proper to tranſcribe it himſelf, one cannot be ſure it is the ſame inſerted by de Serres in his Hiſtory.

Upon being charged with putting to Death Franquet d'Arras her Priſoner; ſhe replied, he was a known Robber, and condemned to die by the Bailiff of Senlis.

Upon the Charge of having ſeveral times communicated in Man's Clothes, and kneeled to the Voice which ſpoke to her; She confeſſed it all.

The Proctor accuſed her alſo of having ſeduced many People to ſuch a degree, that they reverenced her as a Saint, cauſed Prayers to be ſaid in the Church to her Honour, maintained that, next to the Holy Virgin, ſhe was the greateſt of Saints, and wore about them her Image in Lead, or other Metal. To this Charge ſhe replied, that God ſhould be Judge.

Upon the Accuſation of uſurping Dominion over Men, by making herſelf Chief of the War, ſhe anſwered, ſhe had done it to beat the Engliſh. Adding, her Standard was of Linen or Fuſtian, bordered with Velvet, with a Field ſemee of Fleur-de-lis, and in the middle, the Image of God holding the World, ſupported by two Angels in white, and underneath, Jeſus Maria.

Whereupon her Judges upbraided her, that ſhe was in the wrong to aſcribe unto God ſuch Vanities, contrary to the Reverence due to him, and asked her, whether ſhe put her Confidence in her Standard; to which ſhe replied, ſhe placed her Confidence only in him whoſe Image it bore.

After this ſhe was asked, why ſhe held alone her Standard at the Coronation of King Charles. She anſwered it was but juſt, that he who had been in Trouble, ſhould be likewiſe in Glory.

She was farther told, that being wounded before Paris, ſhe cauſed her Armour to be hung up in the Church of St. Dennis, out of Oſtentation; She replied, ſhe did it from a Motive of Piety, according to the Cuſtom of thoſe that were wounded in War.

Laſtly, She was asked, if ſhe would ſubmit to the Judgment of the Church Militant. She anſwered, ſhe would, provided the Church did not enjoin her what was impracticable. That ſhe could not in any wiſe revoke what ſhe had ſaid concerning her Viſions and Revelations, and if the Church affirmed they were Illuſions, in that caſe, ſhe would not refer it to the Judgment of Men, but to God alone.

The Examination being ended, the Judges drew a Summary of her Confeſſions. Containing,

I. That being thirteen Years old, ſhe ſaw St. Michael, St. Catherine, St. Margaret, and a great Company of Angels.

II. That theſe Saints adviſed her to go to King Charles, and to wear Mens Clothes.

III. That ſhe choſe rather not to hear Maſs and communicate, than put on Women's Apparel.

IV. That ſhe refuſed to ſubmit to the Judgment of the Church-Militant.

V. That ſhe pretended to foretel future Contingencies.

VI. That ſhe knew Saints by their Voices, whom ſhe had never ſeen or heard before.

VII. That ſhe was expreſly commanded by God to wear Men's Clothes.

VIII. That ſhe caſt herſelf headlong from a Tower, chuſing rather to die than remain in the Hands of her Enemies.

IX. That ſhe not only ſaw and heard, but likewiſe touched bodily St. Catherine, and St. Margaret, and kiſſed the Ground on which they trod.

The Proctor having taken his Concluſions upon theſe Articles, it was ſaid by the Judges, That what Joan of Arc had done, was all a Cheat, and the Invention of the Devil, to delude the poor People: That ſhe was guilty of Diſobedience to her Parents, and of Idolatry, to the Diſhonour of the Church; particularly, for chuſing rather to deprive herſelf of the Body of our Lord, than lay aſide Men's Clothes. At this Sentence were preſent the Biſhops of Coutance and Liſieux, the Chapter of the Cathedral of Roan, ſixteen Doctors, ſix Licentiates, or Batchelors in Divinity, and eleven Advocates of Roan.

This Sentence being ſent to the Univerſity of Paris, was confirmed by the Faculties of Divinity and the Decrees, and Joan pronounced Heretick and Schiſmatick. Then the Univerſity writ to the King and the Biſhop of Bayeux, to deſire ſhe might be put to death. It does not appear in Paſquier, to what Puniſhment ſhe was condemned by this firſt Sentence. All that can be ſaid, is, ſhe was at leaſt excommunicated. However that be, Joan being carried into the Church, and placed on a Scaffold, was publickly preached, as it was called in thoſe Days. All theſe Preparations ſtriking her with great Dread, ſhe cried out aloud, She would ſubmit to the Judgment of God and the Pope. But finding what ſhe ſaid was not ſufficient to revoke her Sentence, or ſtop the Publication, ſhe declared, She would ſtand to the Church's Determination: That ſince ſo many wiſe and learned Men affirmed, her Viſions came not from God, ſhe was willing to believe ſo too, which ſhe repeated ſeveral times. Then ſhe made a publick Abjuration, inſerted in the Trial, but Paſquier thought not fit to give the Contents.

Upon this Abjuration, another Sentence intervened, abſolving her from the Bond of Excommunication, and condemning her to perpetual Impriſonment by way of Penance. After that, ſhe put on Women's Apparel. But as ſhe had all along been very obſtinate to Men's Clothes, which ſhe wore, as ſhe ſaid, by God's expreſs Command, it was thought proper to try whether her Abjuration was ſincere, by leaving a Man's Habit with her in Priſon. This Expedient, to her Misfortune, ſucceeded but too well, ſince ſhe was no ſooner alone, than ſhe reſumed this ſame Habit. On the Morrow, being found in that Dreſs, ſhe was asked the Reaſon: To which ſhe anſwered, She had put on her former Habit by the expreſs Order of St. Catherine and St. Margaret, and had rather obey God than Man. Whereupon, an Information was entered againſt her in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, and ſhe was declared an Heretick Relapſe, and delivered over to the ſecular Arm. Paſquier ſays nothing of her Confeſſion, according to the King of England's Letter, that ſhe was ſeduced by lying Spirits, who had promiſed to ſet her free. Indeed, this Confeſſion is directly contrary to the Inferences Paſquier would draw from the Records of the Trial, namely, that Joan was inſpired by God. He only ſays, ſhe was ſentenced to be burnt, May the 31ſt, 1431. But as all the reſt of the Facts, mentioned in the King's Letter, exactly agree with the Records of the Proceſs. I do not ſee why Paſquier's Silence ſhould cauſe this to be queſtioned.

One might make numberleſs Reflections upon the Examination, Anſwers, and Behaviour of the Maid. But not to tire the Reader's Patience, I ſhall content my ſelf with the following Remarks.

1. It is certain, Paſquier's View in what he has related of this Trial, was, to prove Joan's Inſpiration. And therefore, prejudiced as he was, he made no ſcruple to curtail in ſeveral Places, the Queſtions and Anſwers. This manifeſtly appears, in that ſeveral of the Anſwers have no Connexion with the Queſtions, nor with one another. For Inſtance, what ſhe ſays in her Anſwer to the ſecond Queſtion, concerning the Duke of Orleans, neceſſarily ſuppoſes ſome other Queſtion, which Paſquier was pleaſed to omit.

2. It appears, that he has paſſed over in Silence ſome of the Anſwers. For Example, it is ſaid in the Summary of Joan's Confeſſion, that ſhe had boaſted of ſeeing St. Michael, and yet it is not mentioned in the Examination.

3. Paſquier would not tranſcribe Joan's Letter to the King of England, or her Abjuration: Papers however of no leſs Importance, than all he has produced. Much more unwilling was he to mention her Confeſſion before ſhe died, that ſhe was ſeduced or deceived. Theſe Omiſſions gave occaſion to preſume, that Paſquier ſought in Joan's Trial, not ſo much what might be of ſervice to diſcover the Truth, as what he believed conducive to prove his Opinion. And indeed, he multiplies Words, to draw from Joan's Anſwers Conſequences favorable to his Notion, and to ſhew, that her Predictions were fulfilled, and her Aſſertions all true. He labours chiefly to prove, by very weak Arguments, that the Duke of Orleans was, as the Maid affirmed, greatly beloved of God. Among other Reaſons, he alledges this: That God had bleſſed that Prince with two illuſtrious Sons, the one, legitimate, afterwards King of France, by the Name of Lewis XII, the other Natural, namely, the great General, known firſt by the Name of the Baſtard of Orleans, and afterwards by that of Earl of Dunois and Longueville. But every one knows, this laſt was natural Brother, and not Son of the Duke of Orleans, mentioned by Joan. It is ſurpriſing that a Man ſo verſed as Paſquier in the Hiſtory of France, ſhould be guilty of ſo groſs a Miſtake.

Having related ſuch Facts concerning the Maid, as cannot be denied, ſince they are ſupported by inconteſtable Teſtimonies, nothing more remains, but to examine the three Opinions upon this Affair, in order to embrace the moſt probable.

Moſt of the French Writers maintain, that Joan was really inſpired, and ſent by God, and found their Opinion upon theſe four principal Reaſons. The firſt is, the Poſſibility of God's working ſuch Miracles. But this Point may be granted them, and yet they not able to draw any Inference from the Poſſibility, for the Truth of the Fact.

The ſecond is, Joan's own Evidence, grounded upon her Viſions of Saints and Angels. But this is the very Thing in queſtion, and conſequently cannot be urged as a Proof.

The third Reaſon is taken from her knowing King Charles in diſguiſe, among his Courtiers. This does not deſerve notice. Suppoſing, as a great many believe, that Joan was perſuaded to act this part, it is eaſy to conceive, ſhe might be very well inſtructed to know the King, tho' ſhe had never ſeen him before.

The fourth is founded upon the accompliſhment of her Prediction, of the raiſing of the Siege of Orleans, and the King's Coronation, at a time when theſe Events were extremely improbable. This Reaſon, added to her uncommon Valour on all Occaſions, is doubtleſs, the ſtrongeſt that can be alledged for this Opinion. However, the Objections this Argument is liable to, very much weaken, if not wholly deſtroy it.

Firſt, It may be objected, it is ſhe herſelf, who ſaid in her Examination, and after the Event, that ſhe had foretold to the King, the raiſing of the Siege of Orleans, and his Coronation. We have obſerved, that Monſtrelet does not make her ſpeak ſo preciſely. He only makes her ſay to the King in general Terms, That ſhe would exalt his Dominion, and drive his Enemies out of the Kingdom; which however ſhe did not perform, ſince the Engliſh were not expelled out of France, till above twenty Years after her Death.

Moreover, Joan ſays in her Examination, theſe two Things were revealed to her by St. Catherine and St. Margaret. I do not mean to conſider here, all the Objections that may be made to this Circumſtance. I am willing to ſuppoſe, God reveals ſometimes to the glorified Saints what is to happen upon Earth; that he commands them to aſſume a human Shape, to inform certain Perſons thereof, and that Catherine and Margaret were of the Number of thoſe glorified Saints, though it cannot be affirmed with Certainty. But it muſt be owned, at leaſt, that God very rarely makes uſe of ſuch means, and when he does, it is always for his own Glory, or the Good of his Church, or in favour of ſome Perſons very eminent for their Holineſs. Now, in the War which was then waging in France, neither the Glory of God, nor the Honour of Religion, nor the Good of the Church were directly concerned: And Charles VII, for whoſe ſake, according to the Suppoſition, God did ſo great Things, was far from being famous for Holineſs of Life. The Diſpute between the two Kings, and the two Parties, was purely about Temporal Concerns. They both profeſſed the ſame Religion, and could not tax one another either with Schiſm or Hereſy. It does not therefore appear, wherein it could be for the Glory of God, or the Advantage of Religion or the Church, that the Realm of France ſhould be governed by a Prince of the Houſe of Valois, rather than by a King of England, deſcended by a Daughter, from the Blood Royal of France. A Man may affirm, as much as he pleaſes, that the Uſurpation of the Engliſh was ſo heinous and manifeſt, that God's Honour was concerned to make them an Example of his Juſtice. This is ſuppoſing the Thing in queſtion. One need only read what has been ſaid upon this Point in the Reign of Edward III, to be ſatisfied, that the Suppoſition is not ſo manifeſt as is pretended, but is liable to great Difficulties. However, though it were undeniable, that the Engliſh were real Uſurpers, can it be affirmed, that God's Honour is concerned, to puniſh in an exemplary and ſupernatural manner, the heinous Injuſtices committed in the World? How many Uſurpations of Provinces and Kingdoms are to be met with in Hiſtory, without the Intervention of a Miracle to puniſh the Uſurpers? In fine, Charles VII, or his Succeſſors do not appear to have done Religion any Service, to make it preſumed, that God had it in view, in what he did by Joan's means. Beſides the French, in thoſe Days were no better Chriſtians, nor honeſter Men than the Engliſh. As for the Perſon of King Charles VII, for whoſe ſake, it is pretended, God miraculouſly raiſed up the Maid, all knew him to have been very immoral. To ſay nothing of the Duke of Burgundy's Murder, committed by his Order, and in his Preſence, contrary to the Faith of a Treaty ratified with an Oath, is it not certain, that at the very time Joan came to him at Chinon, he lived in open Adultery with Agnes Sorrel, in the Eyes of his whole Court? Are they Princes of this Character, whom God uſually honours with particular Favours? If to all theſe Reaſons be added Joan's Confeſſion before her Death, that ſhe was deceived, there will be room to be ſatisfied, ſhe was not really inſpired. But I inſiſt not on this Confeſſion, becauſe it is a diſputable Point, as being ſupported only by the Teſtimony of her Adverſaries.

I come now to the Opinion of the Engliſh, who obſtinately maintain, that Joan of Arc was a Witch, and acted only by the Inſtigations of the Devil. I ſhall only briefly obſerve, that this Opinion is liable to the very ſame Objections as the foregoing, ſince it is no leſs difficult to conceive, why, upon this Occaſion, God ſhould have given ſuch Power to the Devil. So whatever has been ſaid concerning her Inſpiration, may be applied to her Witchcraft, and retorted upon the Engliſh.

But there is a third Opinion, which is not liable to ſo many Difficulties. If it is ſuppoſed, that in King Charles's extreme Diſtreſs, himſelf, his Queen, Agnes Sorrel, or ſome one of his Miniſters, invented this Contrivance; nothing will be more eaſy than to reconcile the Events with ſuch a Suppoſition. The Buſineſs was to revive the Courage of the French, diſheartened by ſo many Loſſes, and perhaps, of the King himſelf, who was thinking of retiring into Dauphiné. Is it any wonder, that ſuch an Artifice ſhould be uſed for that purpoſe? This is at leaſt as poſſible as the Apparitions of Saints, or as Witchcraft. A Country Girl of good Senſe, (as there are many) of an undaunted Courage, and who knew how to ride, may have been choſen. She may have been taken from out of the Kingdom, that ſhe might be the leſs known, and impertinent Neighbours not obſtruct, by diſcovering her, the Execution of the Project. This being ſuppoſed, it will be eaſy to account for moſt of the Things, which appear extraordinary in the Maid. All the King ſays of her, and the Secrets ſhe diſcloſes, will be only a Conſequence of the Cheat. Thoſe that are in the Plot will not fail to extol her, and the reſt will be carried away by their Authority.

It muſt not however be concealed, that ſtrong Objections may be made to this third Opinion, which it will be proper to anſwer.

The firſt is, that it is only a Conjecture. I own it: But it is a very natural Conjecture in a thing, where it is ſo difficult to diſcover the Truth. The French ſay, ſhe was inſpired by God. This Notion is demonſtrated to be full of Difficulties, and highly improbable. The Engliſh affirm, ſhe was a Witch, and acted by the Inſtigation of the Devil: This is no leſs hard to conceive. It is however certain, ſhe performed great Actions. What remains therefore, in order to explain the Cauſe of the Revolution in France, but to have recourſe to natural means, ſince the ſupernatural are ſo doubtful, not to ſay worſe? In my opinion, this is a caſe, where, if ever, Conjecture is to take Place.

The ſecond Objection is taken from Joan's uncommon Valour, which is repreſented as ſupernatural. To this it may be anſwered, much more was certainly aſcribed to her than ſhe deſerved, as appears by the Teſtimony of Monſtrelet a cotemporary Writer. A Man muſt be very ignorant of the Way of the World, not to know how apt we are, on ſuch Occaſions, to run into Exceſſes, and how capable ſuch a Subject is of Imbelliſhment. It does not appear, by what Monſtrelet ſays, That Joan ever commanded in Chief. If this Author ſeems to ſay it in one Place, he unſays it in another, as may be ſeen in the Paſſages above-cited. It is true, the Generals carried her with them, and placed her at their Head to confirm the Soldiers Prepoſſeſſion. So, ſhe had only to ſhew Reſolution enough to keep always near them, and ſuch a Reſolution cannot be accounted Miraculous. And if the Glory of all the happy Succeſſes were aſcribed to her, where is the wonder, ſince it was for the Advantage of the King, and all his Adherents?

The third Objection is the ſtrongeſt, grounded upon the accompliſhment of Joan's Predictions. She told the King, ſhe would cauſe the Siege of Orleans to be raiſed, and himſelf to be crowned; which fell out accordingly. On Suppoſition therefore, that the whole was a Contrivance, it muſt be ſuppoſed withal, that ſhe had the Gift of Prophecy.

To this Objection, it may be replied in the firſt Place, that the Aſſurance, wherewith the French Hiſtorians have advanced, that theſe Predictions were before the Event, is what gives it the moſt Strength. But it muſt be obſerved, that of the two Articles, namely, the raiſing of the Siege of Orleans, and the King's Coronation at Rheims, the firſt only is atteſted by Joan herſelf in her Examination, without any mention of the Coronation. In the next place, this ſame Atteſtation comes after the Event; neither can it be well proved, that when ſhe waited on the King, ſhe gave him any Aſſurance of raiſing the Siege of Orleans. As Monſtrelet relates it, Charles does not ſeem to have relied on her Promiſes, when he undertook to ſend a Convoy to Orleans. Monſtrelet ſays, he was reſolved to ſend a Convoy to that City, and that Joan deſired to accompany it, which was granted her. Certainly, if that Deſign had been formed ſolely upon her Promiſes, ſhe would have had no occaſion to deſire to be preſent at the Execution, ſince in that Caſe, ſhe would have been the principal Actreſs.

But ſecondly, though Joan had foretold what is aſcribed to her, I do not know whether that will be a convincing Proof. Upon ſuppoſition that ſhe was perſuaded to act this Part, and had her Leſſon given her beforehand, nothing was more natural than to make her tell the King, ſhe was commiſſioned to raiſe the Siege of Orleans. This Siege was then the Cauſe of Uneaſineſs to the King and the whole Court. It was not known which way to ſave that important Place, and conſequently, to give hopes of raiſing the Siege was requiſite, in order to create a Belief of Joan's coming from God. Herein nothing was hazarded but the Reputation of a Country Girl, which would not have been regarded, had the Affair proved unſucceſsful. As to the King's Coronation, the hopes of that was likewiſe neceſſary to be inſtilled, ſince the raiſing the Siege was but a means to attain the chief End, which was to eſtabliſh the King on the Throne of his Anceſtors.

In the third Place, to Joan's Predictions a very perplexing Objection may be made. If ſhe was inſpired by God to foretel the future, how came ſhe to be miſtaken? She ſaid, ſhe would drive the Engliſh out of the Kingdom, and yet they were not driven out till above twenty Years after her Death. She foretold, they would be expelled by a great Victory gained over them by the French. Does not this raiſe the Idea of a bloody Battle, and an extraordinary Victory? But where is this Victory to be found after Joan's Death? There is only that of Fourmigni, which happened twenty Years after, and was, as I obſerved, very inconſiderable. She foretold likewiſe in her Examination, that within ſeven Years, the Engliſh ſhould leave a greater Pledge than that before Orleans. I don't underſtand that Expreſſion, unleſs it means the Loſs of ſome Battle. But there was no Battle within that Term. Let us however give the Words the moſt favorable Senſe we can, and underſtand them, if you pleaſe, of the Loſs of Paris. But this Event happened five Years after the Prediction. Is it uſual for the Holy Ghoſt to mark thus the Space of ſeven Years inſtead of five? Was it more difficult for him to foreſee this Event would happen in five, than in ſeven, Years?

Thus, all things conſidered, let the Difficulties of the third Opinion be compared with thoſe that ariſe from the Apparitions of Saints and Witchcraft, and I imagine, they will be found to be leſs in this than in the two other Opinions.

Beſides, the Inſpiration of the Maid was not ſo generally owned by the French themſelves, but that ſeveral queſtioned it. The Conſtable Richemont being upon the March to join the King before Baugenci, the King prepoſſeſſed that he was coming with ſome ill Deſign, reſolved at firſt to go and fight him. But altering his Mind, he ſent Joan to meet and receive him. As ſoon as ſhe ſaw him, ſhe alighted, and embraced his Knee: Whereupon the Conſtable ſaid theſe Words to her, which plainly ſhew what he thought of her: Joan, I am told you deſign to fight me. I neither know who you are, nor from whom you are ſent, whether from God or the Devil. If you come from God, I have no reaſon to fear you, for he knows my Intention as well as yours. If you are from the Devil, I have leſs reaſon to fear, and therefore do your beſt or your worſt.

The Lord of Langey, in his Treatiſe of military Inſtitution, ſays, that Joan's Inſpiration was like Numa's pretended Converſations with the Nymph Egeria.

Others have affirmed, ſhe was perſuaded to act this Part by the Lords of the Court. Du Haillan was of this Opinion, who even relates ſeveral Circumſtances, and then adds, Some have taken it ill that I ſay this, and put the French out of conceit with ſo holy and miraculous a Thing, by endeavouring now to turn it into Fable. But I was willing to ſay it, becauſe Time, which diſcovers all Things, has diſcovered this to be a Cheat. Beſides, it is not a Thing of that Moment as to be received for an Article of Faith.

Pope Pius II, under the Name of Gobelin his Secretary, after relating the Story of Joan and her Exploits, adds, It is very difficult to affirm, whether this was the Work of God, or the Invention of Man. Some think, the great Men at Court contending for the Command, ſome one more wiſe than the reſt invented this Contrivance, and perſuaded Joan to ſay ſhe was ſent from God, that none might ſcruple to ſerve under her.

In fine, there are French Writers who have defamed Joan of Arc, and ſaid, ſhe was corrupted by Baudricourt, or according to others by the Baſtard of Orleans, or by Xaintrailles, and that theſe three Lords, with the Duke of Alenſon, contrived the whole Plot. Polydore Virgil ſays, when Joan found ſhe was condemned, ſhe pretended to be with Child, and for that reaſon her Execution was delayed for ſome Months. In a word, among all the Hiſtorians both antient and modern, who have ſpoken of the Maid, there are no two to be found that agree in the Facts concerning her.

But, ſuppoſing Joan's Inſpiration to be a human Invention, it is not eaſy to determine, whether the King was in the Secret, or was himſelf cheated. It may be Joan herſelf was deceived, by certain Means but too frequently practiſed. For my part, I think this Opinion very plauſible, conſidering the Firmneſs wherewith ſhe anſwered her Judges, when ſhe muſt have perceived her great Danger. But after all, this is only Conjecture.

I conclude this Inquiry, that Joan's pretended Inſpiration may juſtly be deemed a Contrivance to revive the Courage of the terrified French. It is true, the Project ſucceeded doubtleſs beyond the Expectation of the Authors. However, it is not very ſtrange, the Courage of the French Troops ſhould be revived, when they thought to fight under the particular Direction of Heaven. This is not the firſt time that ſuch Invention has produced the like Effect. We meet with Inſtances in the Hiſtories of the Heathen Nations. The feigned Apparitions of the Pagan Gods and Goddeſſes, were not certainly the immediate Works of the Power of God, and yet, upon ſome Occaſions, they produced wonderful Effects.

Before I cloſe this Subject, I cannot help reflecting on the Barbarity exerciſed upon Joan. It is not poſſible to give any colour to this Injuſtice. As Joan was not a Native of France, Henry could not pretend ſhe was his Subject, and conſequently could treat her only as a Priſoner of War. Upon this Suppoſition, he could much leſs puniſh her for a Schiſmatick, Heretick, or Witch, tho' ſhe had been convicted. If the Rule which the Engliſh would then have eſtabliſhed, was once received, every Priſoner of War would be in danger of being condemned by his Enemies for forged Crimes, and ſacrificed to their Malice. Charles VII cauſed the Sentence to be reverſed by other Judges, and Joan's Honor to be retrieved, which by ſeveral is alledged in proof of her Innocence. But this is a weak Argument, ſince, without ſtrong Prejudice, the laſt Sentence can be no more depended upon than the firſt. This was paſſed by her Enemies, whoſe Intereſt it was to defame her, and the other by her Friends, who found their Glory and Advantage in proving her innocent.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK XIII.

[The Reigns of the Three Kings of the Houſe of York, EDWARD IV, EDWARD V, and RICHARD III: Containing the Space of Twenty Four Years and a Half.

16. EDWARD IV.

1461. Edward goes to fight the Queen. Hall. An Execution upon a ſlight Account. Stow. Habington.

EDWARD was proclaimed the 5th of March, and on the 12th or 13th of the ſame Month, he was obliged to put himſelf at the Head of his Army. Before his Departure from London, a Tradeſman was executed, for ſaying, he would make his Son Heir of the Crown (1). Probably, he added ſome contemptuous Words againſt the new King, and expreſſed too much Zeal for the Houſe of Lancaſter. However this be, ſome have conſidered this Man's Execution, in the beginning of this Reign, as a Preſage of the Blood which was yet to be ſhed, in the Quarrel of the two contending Houſes.

The Queen's Army is much increaſed. Habington.

Queen Margaret had acted with Prudence, in not hazarding a Battle at the Gates of London, and in retiring among the northern People, who had hitherto appeared firmly attached to the Houſe of Lancaſter. They even gave her, upon this occaſion, a ſenſible Mark of their Affection, by ſtrengthning her Army with Recruits, nay, whole Bodies of freſh Troops. This was done with ſuch Expedition, that in a few Days the Queen ſaw herſelf at the Head of ſixty thouſand Men, in condition to expect her Enemy, or even to march againſt him.

Edward reſolves to fight the Queen.

Though Edward had been proclaimed at London, he was very ſenſible, that Ceremony made no great addition to his Right, conſidering how irregularly it was performed. The Nobles of his Party, and the People of London, were not inveſted with Power to give the Kingdom a Sovereign: And therefore, he could not depend upon that extraordinary Election, unleſs it was ſupported with Force. Henry VI had reigned thirty eight Years, acknowledged for lawful King by all the Engliſh; and yet this Right, which ſeemed ſo well eſtabliſhed, had not been able to maintain itſelf againſt a ſuperior Strength. It was therefore eaſy to ſee, that Edward's Right, which had not greater Advantages, would ſubſiſt no longer than crowned with Succeſs. Matters ſtanding thus, the two Parties were once more to try the way of Arms. Happy Both, if one ſingle Battle could have decided this bloody Quarrel! Edward being young and lively, truſted to his Courage and Fortune. He was likewiſe excited to venture all, by the great Men of his Party, who having ſhewn ſo little regard for Henry, ſaw no ſafety but in Victory. He departed therefore from London a few Days after being proclaimed (2), and heading his Army, marched towards the North, with a Reſolution to go in queſt of Queen Margaret. 1461. Hall. Stow. He ſecures a Paſs. Biondi. Habington. Hall.

As ſoon as he was come to Pontfract, he detached the Lord Fitz-Walter (3), to ſecure the Paſſage of Ferri-bridge, upon the River Are, which was neceſſarily to be paſſed, in order to join his Enemies. Fitz-Walter ſucceeded according to the King's Deſires, and poſted himſelf on the other ſide of the River with his Detachment. In the mean time Henry and his Queen, who were at York, hearing that Edward was marching with all ſpeed, readily concluded, it was to give them Battle. This was what they themſelves earneſtly wiſhed, ſince the gaining of a Victory was the only Means left for their Reſtoration. They made therefore the Duke of Somerſet General of their Army, and waited at York the Iſſue of a Battle, which was to determine their Fate.

(3) There was at this time no Lord Fitz-Walter: For Walter Lord Fitz-Walter died in 1432; and Sir John Ratcliffe, Son of Ann, Daughter of the ſaid Lord Fitz-Walter, had not Summons to Parliament till the 1ſt of Henry VII. This Sir John, or his Son, is probably the ſame, whom Rapin, and other of our Hiſtorians, call by Anticipation Lord Fitz-Walter. See Dugdale's Baron. Vol. I. p. 223; and Vol. II. p. 285.

1461. His Men beat from thence.

The Duke of Somerſet hearing Edward had ſecured the Paſſage of Ferribridge, did not doubt that it was with intention to fight; and to oblige him to do it with Diſadvantage, reſolved to diſlodge Fitz-Walter, in order to have the River between him and his Enemies. Purſuant to this Reſolution, the Lord Clifford was detached to recover the Poſt ſeized by Fitz-Walter. Whether Fitz-Walter was guilty of any Neglect, or was not timely ſupported, he could not withſtand Clifford's Attack, who drove his Troops over the River with great Slaughter. Fitz-Walter, and the Baſtard of Salisbury (1), were ſlain in the Action.

The Earl of Warwick is alarmed at it. Hall. Hollingſh.

The Earl of Warwick, of whom I have had frequent Occaſion to ſpeak towards the end of the late Reign, was conſidered as the Soul of Edward's Army. The King was looked upon as a Valiant young Prince, without Experience, and the Earl of Warwick, as the real General. Accordingly, all Eyes were fixed upon him, to ſee by his Countenance whether there was Reaſon to hope or fear. The News of Fitz-Walter's Defeat being brought to the Earl, he ſeemed to be under great Conſternation, dreading, this firſt Check would diſcourage the Army. He immediately poſted to inform the King, with an Emotion, that plainly diſcovered how apprehenſive he was of the Conſequences. But withal, to ſhew his Fears were not perſonal, he ſtabbed his Horſe, and kiſſing the Hilt of his Sword, made like a Croſs, ſwore that though the whole Army ſhould take to Flight, he would alone defend the King's Cauſe.

The King's Steadineſs. Hall. Hollingſh.

Edward perceiving the Earl's Concern, judged it neceſſary to prevent the ill Effects it might produce among the Troops. Inſtead therefore of being alarmed at the News, he made Proclamation, that all who deſired it, might depart: That he would reward thoſe that ſhould do their Duty; but there was no favour to be expected for thoſe that ſhould fly, during the Battle. At the ſame time, he detached William Nevil, Lord Fauconbridge, to paſs the Are at Caſtleford, about three Miles from Ferribridge, with Orders to attack thoſe who guarded the Poſt lately loſt. Fauconbridge executed his Orders, with ſuch Secrecy and Expedition, that he paſſed the River at Caſtleford, before the Enemies had the leaſt Notice. Then marching along the River, he met Clifford at the Head of a Body of Horſe, ſuddenly attacked him, and put him to Rout. Clifford was ſlain with an Arrow in the beginning of the Fight, too light a Puniſhment for his inhumanity to the young Earl of Rutland, Brother of Edward, at the Battle of Wakefield. With him was killed likewiſe, the Earl of Weſtmoreland's Brother. The Poſt of Ferribridge being thus fortunately recovered, Edward, who kept himſelf ready, paſſed his Army over the River, and immediately marched in queſt of his Enemies.

He recovers the Paſſage. Hall.

The Battle of Towton. Hall. Hollingſh.

The two Armies met on Palm-Sunday (2), between Saxton and Towton (3), where they drew up. Henry's Army was ſixty thouſand ſtrong, and Edward's about forty thouſand (4). The Air was darkened by the Snow, which fell very thick, and was blown by the Wind in the Faces of the Lancaſtrians. Theſe laſt began the Fight with a Volley of Arrows, which being diſcharged too far off, did no great Execution (5). Fauconbridge, who commanded the Van of Edward's Army (6), diſdaining to fight at ſuch a Diſtance, ordered his Men to lay by their Bows and take to their Swords. Whereupon, the Armies approaching one another began a furious Fight, wherein both Sides ſeemed equally brave and reſolute, to exert their utmoſt to gain the Victory. It would be very difficult to deſcribe this terrible Battle at large; moſt of thoſe that have mentioned it, not underſtanding the Art of War, have, inſtead of repreſenting the ſeveral Circumſtances, given only a confuſed Idea thereof. Beſides, the two Armies are to be conſidered, as truſting more to their Courage, than the Experience of their Generals. It will ſuffice to obſerve, that the Battle laſted from Morning (7) to Night; and from thence, it may be judged, how obſtinately it was fought on both Sides. Edward ſignalized himſelf by an uncommon Valour, which did not a little contribute to maintain his Troops in their Reſolution of conquering or dying for his ſake. At length, the Lancaſtrians began, towards the Evening, to give ground, not flying, but retreating as they fought, and making a ſtand now and then, ſo that their Enemies could not be entirely ſure of the Victory. However, this Advantage encouraging Edward's Soldiers to make freſh Efforts, they ſo preſſed their Enemies, that at laſt they forced them to fly. Then it was that a dreadful Slaughter enſued. Edward had, before the Battle, made Proclamation in his Army, that no Quarter ſhould be given, well knowing, the taking of Priſoners would but weaken his Army. The flying Troops ſhaped their Courſe towards Tadcaſter Bridge, but deſpairing to reach it, becauſe they were ſo hotly purſued by their Enemies, they turned aſide, in order to paſs the Cock, which runs into the Wherf. This was done with ſuch Confuſion and Hurry, that the River was immediately full of thoſe that were drowned, and who, in their Misfortune, ſerved for a Bridge to their Companions. The Slaughter is ſaid to have been ſo great in this Place, that the Waters of the Wherf were all dyed with the Blood. And indeed, it is not to be thought ſtrange, ſince the Hiſtorians affirm, no leſs than thirty ſix thouſand ſeven hundred and ſeventy ſix were killed in the Battle. Among the Dead, were found the Earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland (8), the Lords Dacres and Wells, Sir John Nevill, and Andrew Trollop. The Dukes of Somerſet and Exeter had the happineſs to eſcape. Thomas Courtney Earl of Devonſhire was taken. He was at firſt ſpared, notwithſtanding the King's Orders, but it was only to put him to a more inglorious Death on the Scaffold.

An Italian Author (9), who wrote the Hiſtory of theſe Civil Wars, makes this remark on the Battle of Towton; That if France or Scotland had then invaded England, the Kingdom would, doubtleſs, have been ſubdued, in its weak Condition, after ſo violent a Bleeding. This might have been the Caſe, and the Example of France, which in much the ſame Circumſtances was almoſt entirely conquered by Henry V, gives weight to this Reflection. But however, the Battles, fought before the Quarrel between the two Houſes was decided, ſhew there was ſtill much Engliſh Blood to be ſhed before it was poſſible to give England a mortal Wound.

After this ſignal Victory, Edward marched directly to York, perhaps in expectation of finding Henry and Margaret. But as after the Loſs of the Battle they could not hope for Safety at York, they choſe to retire to Berwick, and from thence fled for Refuge to Edinburgh. Upon his Arrival at York, Edward ordered the Heads of the Duke his Father, and the Earl of Salisbury to be taken down, and thoſe of the Earl of Devonſhire and ſome others, beheaded at Pontfract (10), to be ſet up in their room. He ſtayed ſome time at York, to take meaſures for the Defence of the Borders, in caſe the Scots ſhould think of making an Incurſion. But as he perceived, though they had ſuch a Deſign, they were not yet ready to execute it, he believed there would be no great Danger in returning to London, where he arrived the 8th of June.

All appearing quiet in England ſince the Victory of Towton, Edward would no longer defer his Coronation, which was fixed to the 20th of June (11). Whilſt the Preparations were making, he conſidered how to guard againſt Scotland, from whence he foreſaw the fugitive King and Queen might have Aſſiſtance. For that purpoſe, he ſought means to find the Scots Employment, that ſhould hinder them from meddling with their Neighbours Affairs. To this he was likewiſe induced by the Sollicitations of the Earl of Douglaſs, who had taken refuge in England ſeveral Years ſince. But for the better Underſtanding how Matters then ſtood between England and Scotland, it will be neceſſary briefly to relate the then Situation of that Kingdom.

1461. ballanced the two firſt. The Earl dying about two Years after, William his Son ſucceeded him, who ſtill more haughty and impetuous than his Father, raiſed great Diſturbances in the Kingdom. Sworn Enemy of the Regent and Chancellor, he ſhowed in all his Proceedings that he was labouring the Deſtruction of both, in order to eſtabliſh himſelf upon their Ruins. This obliged them for their Intereſt, to unite againſt their common Enemy. Some time after, they found means to draw him to the Aſſembly of the States, upon the Aſſurance of a Safe-Conduct, notwithſtanding which, they cauſed his Head to be ſtruck off. Beatrix his Daughter inherited his Eſtate, and James his Brother his Title. But James died two Years after, leaving William his Son head of that powerful Family.

William was no leſs proud and ambitious than his Predeceſſors. He ſo well gained the young King's Confidence, who began to look into his Affairs, that he became his prime Miniſter and Favorite. When he ſaw his Credit ſufficiently eſtabliſhed, he attacked the two Heads of the oppoſite Factions, and forced Levingſton to retire from Court. He met with ſtronger Oppoſition from Creighton. But however this be, he ſo abuſed his Power, and acted ſo arbitrarily, that he put People to Death, not only by his own Authority, but even contrary to the King's Will. In ſhort, James II, blinded by his Affection for the Earl, was not content with forgiving all his Exceſſes, but moreover, made him his Lieutenant-General of the whole Kingdom. Probably, this high Promotion inſpired the Earl of Douglaſs with two ambitious Projects. Without ſaying any thing to the King, he took a Journey into England, where it was known he privately conferred with Henry VI's Miniſters. This Proceeding gave his Enemies, what they had long ſought, an Opportunity to ruin him in the King's Favour. They inſtilled into him ſo many Suſpicions and Fears, that in order to hinder the Earl from executing his pretended Deſigns, he removed him from all his Poſts, not daring perhaps to attempt to puniſh him more rigorouſly. At the ſame time he gave the Adminiſtration of Affairs to the Earl of the Orcades (1), mortal Enemy of Douglaſs, and reſtored the Seals to William Creighton.

The Earl inraged to ſee his Enemies triumph, formed a League againſt them, and brought the Kingdom to the very Brink of Deſtruction. In a word he committed ſo many Outrages and Violences, that the King juſtly provoked with him, reſolved to be freed from a Subject who created him ſo much Uneaſineſs. But as he was ſenſible he could not openly execute this Deſign, he had recourſe to Policy. By means of ſome of his Friends, he put him in hopes of being reſtored to Favour upon the ſame foot as before. Then ſending for him to Court, upon a Safe-Conduct ſigned with his own hand, he carried him alone into his Cloſet, and ſtabbed him with a Dagger. This Deed, though violent and irregular, was approved by the States, who, at the ſame time, declared James, Brother and Heir of the deceaſed, with the reſt of his Brothers, Enemies of their Country.

James, the new Earl of Douglaſs, thinking only of revenging his Brother's Death, and ſupporting the Credit of his Family, raiſed a Civil War in the Kingdom. During which, the King beſieging one of his Places, Douglaſs was preparing to relieve it, but was ſuddenly forſaken by all his Friends, and forced to fly for Refuge into England. Some time after, he entered the County of Anandale with ſome Troops, and being defeated, was once more forced to fly his Country. George Earl of Ormond (2), one of his Brothers, was taken and beheaded.

Theſe Misfortunes were not capable of diſcouraging the rebellious Earl. He gained the Earl of Roſs Lord of the Iſles, Donald his Brother (3), and the reſt of that Family, and perſwaded them to take arms againſt the King. Then they entered together the County of Merch, and ravaged it from one end to the other. But when Douglaſs was preparing to purſue his Progreſs, the Earl of Roſs repenting of his Fault, deſerted him, and went and caſt himſelf upon the King's Mercy. The King gave him hopes of a Pardon, on condition he would merit it by his Services. Douglaſs unwilling to follow this Example, once more retired into England.

Theſe Commotions being appeaſed by the Earl of Roſs's Submiſſion, and Douglaſs's Retreat, James II, at the Duke of York's Sollicitation, beſieged Roxburrough. The Earl of Roſs, willing to render himſelf worthy of the King's Pardon, came and offered him his Service with a Body of choſen Troops. James as was before ſaid, was unfortunately killed at this Siege, and left James III, his Son, about ſeven Years old, for his Succeſſor. 1461.

The Death of James II, and the tender Years of the new King, revived the Earl of Douglaſs's Hopes; but as he could not then expect any Aſſiſtance from England, by reaſon of the Civil War which raged in that Kingdom, was obliged to wait till Affairs were in another Situation. He believed the favorable juncture, he expected, was at length come, after Edward's Victory at Towton. Wherefore, applying himſelf to to that Prince, who ſeemed firmly ſettled in the Throne, he intimated to him, that by means of his Friends in Scotland, it would be very eaſy for the Engliſh to conquer that Kingdom. Edward had no Inclination, in his preſent Circumſtances, to undertake ſo difficult a Task. However, to find the Scots Employment, and hinder them from aſſiſting Henry, he embraced the Opportunity offered him by the Earl of Douglaſs, in hopes of kindling a Civil War in Scotland. So, Douglaſs aſſuring him, the Earl of Roſs, Donald his Brother, and Donald's Son, were diſpoſed to riſe againſt the King of Scotland, he gave him a full Power to treat with them. Act. Pub. XI. p. 474.

Whilſt Douglaſs was negotiating this Affair with the Earl of Roſs, Edward was crowned at Weſtminſter with the uſual Solemnities (4). Edward crowned. Hall.

Though Queen Margaret was out of the Kingdom, ſhe gave the new King great Uneaſineſs. He was juſtly apprehenſive, the Succours of the Scots would enable her to make a freſh Attempt upon his Crown. So, in order to obſtruct her Deſigns, he propoſed a Truce to the Regents of Scotland. That Kingdom was then divided into two Parties, formed on the account of the Regency. Mary de Gelders, the King's Mother, was at the Head of the firſt, and the Earl of Angus, of the ſecond. They both claimed the Regency, but the States, to diſoblige neither, nominated two Regents of each Party, and petitioned the Queen, to be contented with the Care of her Children's Education. Thus the two Factions ſtill ſubſiſted, becauſe it was not poſſible to ſatisfy both. The Affairs of Scotland being in this Situation, when Edward propoſed the Truce, the Regents reſolved to conſent to it, and even ſent Ambaſſadors to treat with him. But Queen Margaret, who was then at Edinburgh, perceiving how prejudicial this Truce would be to her, found means to break Edward's Meaſures, by ſurrendering Berwick to the Scots (5), and concluding a Marriage between Prince Edward her Son, and Margaret Siſter of King James. Whereupon the Negotiation of the Truce was entirely broke off. He propoſes a Truce with Scotland. Ib. p. 475, 477. Margaret prevents it. Hall. Stow.

Whilſt Margaret was employed in gaining the Scots to her Intereſt, Edward called a Parliament at Weſtminſter (6), to confirm the Revolution, which had placed him on the Throne. It is eaſy to conceive, that in ſuch a Juncture, the Parliament did not want much Sollicitation, to confirm whatever had been done in favour of Edward. How irregular ſoever his Election might be, he was victorious; that was ſufficient to hinder any Perſon from venturing to diſpute his Right. Several foregoing Inſtances demonſtrate, that the Parliaments of England never attempted to ſwerve from that wholſome Principle, of declaring for the ſtrongeſt; and what we ſhall ſee in the Sequel of this very Reign, will ſtill farther confirm it. Purſuant to this Maxim, the Parliament approved of Edward's Coronation, confirmed his Title, and repealed all the Acts made in the late Reign, againſt the Houſe of York. Henry VI, after a thirty-eight Years Reign, was deemed an Uſurper, and all he had done, whilſt on the Throne, annulled, as wanting a lawful Authority, and as being of no Force, till confirmed by the new Parliament (7). Thus the People's Credulity was abuſed, and they were made to believe, that what had been juſt for ſixty Years, was become unjuſt, by a contingent Event, I mean, by Edward's Victory at Towton. The Parliament confirms Edward's Election. Cotton's Abridg. Hall. All the Acts againſt the Houſe of York are repealed. Cotton's Abridg. Statutes.

Diſpoſition of foreign Princes with regard to England.

After Edward had thus ſettled his domeſtick, he ſeriouſly thought of the foreign Affairs. The Kingdom was actually in War with France, Scotland, Bretagne, and the Low-Countries. There was equal Danger from all theſe Quarters. If theſe States had all joined againſt him, it would have been very difficult for Edward to withſtand their Forces, conſidering his preſent Situation, and little Dependence upon the Aſſiſtance of his Subjects. Happily for him, France had a new King who never thought of conquering England. I mean, Lewis XI, who was wholly intent upon the Project of rendering himſelf abſolute in his own Kingdom, and humbling the great Men, among whom the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne were the principal. It is true, his Deſigns had not yet been diſcloſed. But what he was meditating, was more than ſufficient to hinder him from renewing the War with the Engliſh. The Duke of Bretagne took care not to ſtir alone in a War againſt Edward, which could not but be to him, upon all accounts, very prejudicial. As for the Duke of Burgundy, the ſame Reaſons that made him deſirous of a Truce with England, ſtill ſubſiſted. Beſides, he ſaw plainly, it was againſt his Intereſt to unite with France and Bretagne, in order to weaken England, and much more, to maintain alone a War, which muſt be very deſtructive to the Trade of his Subjects. Indeed his Inclination led him to ſupport the Houſe of Lancaſter, rather than That of York, becauſe of his Marriage with Iſabella of Portugal, a near Relation of Henry VI. But Reaſons taken from the Inclinations of Princes, do not always prevail above thoſe of Politicks. The Duke of Burgundy was perfectly acquainted with the Character of Lewis XI, and conſequently ſaw, he ought to guard againſt him, inſtead of endeavouring to render him more powerful by the weakening of England. So, contenting himſelf with wiſhing well to the Houſe of Lancaſter, without giving it any Aſſiſtance, he judged it for his Intereſt, to live in a good Underſtanding with Edward IV, whom he perceived to be firmly eſtabliſhed, without any likelihood of being dethroned. To that end, he ſent Ambaſſadors to congratulate him upon his Acceſſion to the Crown, and withal, to demand Satisfaction for certain Outrages, committed by the Engliſh contrary to the Truce. Edward gladly anſwered the Duke of Burgundy's Advances, and immediately appointed Commiſſioners, to examine the Breaches of the Truce complained of by that Prince. His Affairs would not allow him to be haughty to any of the Princes his Neighbours, and ſtill leſs, to the Duke of Burgundy, who was very powerful, and allied to the Houſe of Lancaſter.

Diſpoſition of Scotland.

There was only Scotland left which could create the King any Uneaſineſs. He knew, Margaret had delivered Berwick to the Scots, and contracted the Prince her Son to King James's Siſter. He could not therefore queſtion but that ſhe expected the Aſſiſtance of that Kingdom. Mean while, the Queen having ſettled her Affairs in Scotland, had left there the King her Husband with the Prince her Son, and was gone into France. The Deſign of this Journey was to deſire Aid of Lewis XI. But he was not of a Character to ingage in an Enterprize which he did not perceive to be very advantagious. He gave however the fugitive Princeſs, as being his near Relation, hopes of Aſſiſtance. But being unwilling to break entirely with Edward, he was contented with making Proclamation, that all the Friends of the Houſe of Lancaſter ſhould be well receiv'd in his Dominions, and the Adherents of the Houſe of York not admitted. 1462. Edward's Treaty with the Earl of Roſs.

Edward did not doubt that Margaret would contrive ſome freſh Enterpriſe. Her Voyage to France, and eſpecially the late Alliance with the King of Scotland, were too plain indications. So, thinking it would be in vain to try to break her meaſures by a Truce with Scotland, to which the Scots daily raiſed freſh Obſtacles, he reſolved to renew his Negotiation with the Earl of Roſs. In all Appearance, the Earl of Douglaſs had already prepared that Lord to take arms; the Terms only were to be ſettled. To conclude this Affair, which Edward hoped would turn to his advantage, he impowered the Biſhop of Durham, the Earl of Worceſter, and others, to make in his Name a Treaty with the Earl of Roſs, which was accordingly done. The Subſtance of the Treaty was,

1462. Act. Pub. XI. p. 483, 484.

That John Earl of Roſs, Lord of the Iſles (3) Donald Balagh, his Brother, and John of the Iſles, Son of Donald, ſhould do Homage to King Edward.

That they ſhould never acknowledge any other King of England, but Edward or his Succeſſors deſcended from Lionel Duke of Clarence.

That they ſhould be always ready to ſerve him in all his Wars with Scotland, or with the Scots in Ireland.

That in Time of Peace the Earl of Roſs ſhould have a yearly Penſion of a Hundred Marks Sterling, Donald one of twenty pound, and John his Son one of Ten Pound; and that theſe Penſions ſhould be doubled in Time of War (4), during actual Service.

That in caſe Scotland ſhould be conquered by the Arms of Edward, and with their Aſſiſtance, the King ſhould inveſt them with all the Iſles beyond the Sea of Scotland, to be equally divided among them.

That James Earl of Douglaſs ſhould likewiſe be inveſted with all the Lands formerly held by him in the Kingdom of Scotland, from the North-Sea to England.

Laſtly, That Edward ſhould make neither Peace nor Truce with the King of Scotland, without including them if they deſired it.

As this Treaty is mentioned by no Engliſh Hiſtorian, probably it lay concealed among the Records of England, till it was inſerted in the Collection of the Publick Acts. Indeed, it was of little moment ſince it was not executed. Edward had too many affairs upon his Hands to think of the Conqueſt of Scotland; his ſole View was to make uſe of the Earls of Douglaſs and Roſs to raiſe Diſturbances in that Kingdom. But 'tis likely, the Earl of Douglaſs's Meaſures were not very juſt, ſince the Hiſtory of Scotland ſpeaks of no Inſurrection at this Time.

The reſt of the Year 1462 was quiet enough, the Storm which was gathering not being yet ready to break.

Pius II congratulates Edward. Act. Pub. XI. p. 489.

Pope Pius II believing Edward ſufficiently eſtabliſhed in the Throne, writ him a congratulatory Letter upon his coming to the Crown, in Anſwer to one ſent him by the King to notify him of it. The Pope expreſſed himſelf ſo, that it appeared he reſerved the Liberty of retracting if there was Occaſion, ſince his Approbation was founded only upon the Proofs Edward himſelf had given him of his Title, whereby he made it conditional.

Exeter's Lands given to his Ducheſs, the King's Siſter Ib. p. 489, 490.

The Duke of Exeter who had married Edward's Siſter, having followed Henry into Scotland, the King gave the Confiſcation of his Eſtate to his Ducheſs, who choſe rather to remain with the King her Brother, than follow the Fortune of her Husband.

All being quiet in the Kingdom, and no appearance of any freſh Attempt againſt Edward, the Duke of Somerſet, and Ralph Percy, the Earl of Northumberland's Brother came and threw themſelves upon the King's Mercy, who generouſly granted them a Pardon.

Pretended Expedition of the Engliſh into Bretagne and France. Hollingſh. Stow.

Hiſtorians affirm, that in the Courſe of this Year, the Engliſh Fleet made an expedition into Bretagne and the Iſle of Ree, mentioned neither by the French nor the Bretons. And indeed, it is hard to conceive what could induce Edward wantonly to renew the War, at a Juncture when he ſhould have thought himſelf very happy in being left unmoleſted. Nay it appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he was not without Fear of an Inſurrection of the Lancaſtrians. At leaſt it ſeems, to this only can be aſcrib'd his care to gain the Clergy to his intereſts, by granting them a Favour, none of his Predeceſſors had ever willingly granted; namely, that for the future all Eccleſiaſtical Perſons indicted for any Crime, ſhould be tried in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, without the Interpoſition of the King's Judges upon any pretence whatſoever. By this ſame Patent, he ſcreened the Clergy from the Penalties of the Statutes of Proviſors and

(3) The weſtern Iſles, called by the Inhabitants Inch Gall; by a Writer of the laſt Age, Hebrides; by the Antients, Beterica, Inchades, Leucades, Hæbudes, commonly thought to be forty four in Number, but are really more. Among them is Jona, which Bede calls Hy or Hu, given to the Scotch Monks by the Picts, for preaching the Goſpel amongſt them. Here ſtands a Monaſtery famous for the Burial of the Kings of Scotland. The Inhabitants of theſe Iſles ſpeak the Iriſh Language, and retain the Cuſtoms, &c. of the antient Scots, as the Highlanders do. They are enjoyed at preſent by the Mac-Conells, who derive themſelves from this Donald, who took the Title of King of the Iſles, and ravaged Scotland in a cruel manner.

Præmunire,

1462. Præmunire, paſſed in the 16th Year of Richard II. He pretended, he was induced to this Conceſſion from his great Zeal for Religion, his Dread of the Excommunications decreed by the Holy Canons, and his Belief that all the Calamities with which England had been for ſome Time afflicted, were the juſt Judgments of God for the diſregard ſhown to his Miniſters. But, very probably he was led by quite another Motive, to break ſo many Statutes, which the Parliaments had deemed neceſſary to check the Growth of the Clergy's Power.

Rb. p. 493, 497. About the end of this Year, the Truce of Commerce between England, and the Duke of Burgundy's Dominions, was prolonged for ſome time (1).

1463. Edward calls upon the Earl of Roſs to perform his Promiſe. p. 499. Mean while, Edward hearing that Preparations were privately making in Scotland, and probably againſt him, called upon the Earl of Roſs to perform his Promiſe; and for that purpoſe, appointed Commiſſioners, who were ordered to receive his Oath. But the Earl, who had his Spies in England, not ſeeing that Edward was really preparing to ſupport him, did not think proper to begin, for fear of being deſerted.

Queen Margaret arrives in the North of England; Biondi. Habington. Hall. It was not without Reaſon, that Edward dreaded a Storm from the North. Preſently after, Queen Margaret having obtained of the King of France, an Aid of five hundred Men, with the Promiſe of a greater, embarked to make a Deſcent into England. As ſhe hoped, the Inhabitants of the Northern Counties would take Arms in her favor, ſhe landed at the Mouth of the Tine. But ſhe found there a Body of Engliſh Troops, who forced her to re-embark with Precipitation. A few Hours after, her Ship being ſeparated from the reſt of the Fleet by a Storm, it was with great difficulty that, having entered the Tweed, ſhe at laſt landed at Berwick. The reſt of the Ships were driven towards Bamburgh, where the French would have landed; but the Baſtard Ogle (2), who was in thoſe Parts, having hindered their Deſcent, they retired to the little Iſle of Lindisfarn; for the Weather would not ſuffer them to put to Sea. Thither Ogle followed them, and attacking them ſlew part, and took four hundred Priſoners. Their Leader (3) was the only Perſon, that found means to eſcape in a Fiſher-boat to Berwick.

and is forced to fly to Berwick.

The King ſends Montague into the North. Act. Pub. XI. p. 500, 501. Stow. Edward, upon receiving this news, eaſily perceived, Margaret was ſecure of the Aſſiſtance of the Scots, and would ſoon march into England. This fear cauſing him ſeriouſly to attend to his Affairs, he diſpatched the Lord Montague, with what Troops were ready, whilſt himſelf haſtened a great Armament, he was making by Sea and Land, to oppoſe his Enemy (4).

Henry and Margaret re-enter England. Hall. Montague having begun his March, heard upon the Road, that the Queen was entered Northumberland at the Head of an Army, which daily increaſed, by reaſon of the great Licence the Soldiers were allowed (5). He advanced however as far as Durham, where he ſtaid ſome days expecting a Reinforcement, ſent by the King. Theſe Supplies being arrived, he continued his March, and meeting a Detachment of the Enemies (6), commanded by the Lords Hungerford and Roſs, attacked and put them to Rout. Ralph Percy, who ſerved Henry, though he had taken the Oath to Edward, was ſlain in this Action. The Duke of Somerſet making no more Scruple than Percy, of breaking his Oath, was likewiſe gone to join the Queen.

Montague defeats a Detachment of their Army.

He attacks Henry's Camp, and puts him to Rout. Habington. Hall. Montague, incouraged with this Succeſs, marched immediately to Hexham, where Henry lay intrenched (7), and attacking him in his Lines, without giving him time to recover himſelf, gained a compleat Victory. The Duke of Somerſet, the Lords Roſs and Hungerford, (8), were taken Priſoners; but Henry, Margaret, and the Prince their Son, fled into Scotland. The Priſoners were not long ſuffered to languiſh. Some Days after, the Duke of Somerſet was beheaded at Hexham, Roſs, and Hungerford, elſewhere; and twenty Officers of Diſtinction at York. Many others, who had concealed themſelves in ſeveral Places, being diſcovered, or given up to the Conqueror, were likewiſe ſacrificed to his Vengeance.

Henry eſcapes; Somerſet is beheaded.

Edward returns to London, and leaves the Earl of Warwick in the North. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh. After this Victory, Edward, who was advanced to Durham, ſent the Earl of Warwick farther Northwards, to recover ſome Places taken by the Queen; after which, he returned to London. The Earl of Warwick having nothing to fear after his Brother's Victory, divided his Army into three Bodies, and beſieged at once Bamburgh, Dunſtanburgh, and Alnwick (9). The two firſt of theſe Places were eaſily taken, and the commanding Officers puniſhed. Alnwick, where a Frenchman commanded with ſome Troops of his Nation, held out till the Earl of Angus came to its Relief with a Body of Scotch Troops (10). But the Earl could do no more than draw out the Garriſon, probably by a Treaty with the Beſiegers, though Buchanan ſays otherwiſe. 1463.

Montague is created Marquiſs, and Herbert Earl of Pembroke. Biondi. Hall. Stow. Edward being arrived at London, ordered two Patents to be drawn under the Great Seal, to reward the Lord Montague and Sir William Herbert, with the Dignity he conferred on them. The firſt had done him a great Service in his two late Victories. The other had all along diſtinguiſhed himſelf by an extraordinary Zeal for the Houſe of York. So, being pleaſed to give them both Marks of his Gratitude, he created the former Earl of Northumberland, and the latter Earl of Pembroke; Henry Percy, and Jaſper Tudor, who bore theſe Titles, having forfeited them by adhering to King Henry. But Percy ſubmitting afterwards to the King, and obtaining his Pardon, Montague willingly reſigned him the Title of Earl of Northumberland, for that of Marquiſs of Montague. As for the Title of Earl of Pembroke, care muſt be taken not to confound the two Lords that bore it; namely, Jaſper Tudor Half-Brother of Henry VI, and William Herbert, who was in Edward's Service.

Preparations are making in France againſt Edward. Whilſt Edward was enjoying the Tranquillity procured by his late Victory, he received Advice that Preparations were making in France, to ſupport the Intereſts of Henry and Margaret. Whereupon he reſolved to ſend for the Earl of Warwick, and leave the Marquiſs of Montague in the North, with a Patent of Governor of the Northern Marches, and a Power to levy what Troops he thought neceſſary. He did not doubt, that his Enemies had reſolved to make their greateſt Efforts from that quarter, by reaſon of the Neighbourhood of Scotland. Theſe Precautions, joined to his late Victory, probably cooled the Ardour of the French and the Scots. Soon after the Scots demanded a Safe-Conduct for Ambaſſadors they intended to ſend to him. At the ſame time, Lewis XI, negotiated a Truce with him, by the Duke of Burgundy's Mediation. This Truce was actually concluded at St. Omer, to the 1ſt of October 1464, on the condition, that neither of the two Kings ſhould aſſiſt the Enemies of the other. The Duke of Burgundy agreed likewiſe to renew, for one Year, the Truce of Commerce between England and the Low-Countries.

and Duke of Burgundy, p. 507.

After Edward had thus ſecured himſelf againſt France, he concluded with Scotland a Truce for a Year, negotiated by the Archbiſhop of St. Andrew's at London, in the Name of the Regents. Thus having nothing to fear from his Neighbours, at leaſt for one Year, he ſaw himſelf at leiſure to ſtrengthen himſelf in the Throne, in caſe of another Attack.

and with Scotland. p. 510.

Henry and Margaret in great Perplexity. Mean while, the unfortunate Henry, deſerted by the King of France, the King of Scotland, and the Duke of Burgundy; who alone, were able to aſſiſt him, ſaw himſelf entirely without Refuge. He was ſtill at Edinburgh, but not without Uneaſineſs. Beſides that the late Truce between the Engliſh and Scots, did not allow theſe laſt to give him any Aſſiſtance; very likely, in concluding the Truce with Scotland, Edward had ſtipulated, that his Enemy ſhould not be ſuffered to remain any longer in that Kingdom. It even appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that before the Truce was ſigned, the two Kings of England and Scotland, agreed upon certain ſecret Articles, which could only concern the unfortunate fugitive King. Be this as it will, Henry not knowing where to retire, prepoſterouſly imagined he might be concealed in England. Perhaps, he flattered himſelf that the Inhabitants of the northern Counties would riſe in his favour. But unhappy Princes ſeldom meet with faithful Friends. At leaſt, it may be preſumed, that fearing to be delivered up by the Scots, and having no Conveniency to eſcape by Sea, he hoped to find a ſafe Retreat with ſome Friends in England, till an opportunity offered of paſſing into France. Whatever his Deſign might be, he had no ſooner ſet foot in England but he was known, ſeized (11), ignominiouſly conducted to London (12), and confined in the Tower. Some affirm, he was taken the laſt Year at the Battle of Hexham, or at leaſt a few Days after. But it appears in ſome Publick Acts, that in October, that Year, he was not yet in Edward's Power. It is therefore more probable he was taken, as I ſaid, in endeavouring, after ſome ſtay in Scotland, to conceal himſelf in England. An Adventure which befel Margaret, and is related by Monſtrelet, makes it thought, ſhe had likewiſe reſolved to hide herſelf in England, in expectation of an opportunity to imbark, not daring to truſt the Scots any longer; and, the better to accompliſh her Deſign, had parted from the King her Husband. Monſtrelet ſays, Margaret being in England with the Prince her Son, attended with La Verenne a French Lord, fell into the hands of Robbers who would have killed her, if a ſudden Quarrel amongſt them, had not afforded her an opportunity to eſcape into a Wood with the Prince. He adds, that afterwards ſhe found means to imbark for Sluice in Flanders, where the Duke of Burgundy gave her an honorable Reception. If this Adventure be true, it muſt have happened at the time I am now ſpeaking of. However that be, after her departure from Scotland, ſhe retired to René of Anjou her Father, with the Prince her Son. Edmund, the new Duke of Somerſet, Brother of him beheaded at Hexham, with the Duke of Exeter, fled for refuge into the Low-Countries, where however they durſt not make themſelves known, for fear of being delivered to Edward. They endured in Flanders all that a wretched Exile, attended with extreme Want, was capable of bringing upon Perſons of their Character. Philip de Commines ſays, he ſaw the Duke of Exeter, before he was known, following barefoot the Duke of Burgundy's Equipage, and ſerving probably as Footman for his Livelihood. But theſe two Lords being at length known, the Duke gave them a mean Penſion for their Subſiſtence, not daring doubtleſs to carry his Generoſity any farther, for fear of offending Edward. Theſe are ſtrange Turns for a King who had ſat thirty-eight Years on a Throne, for a Queen who had for many Years governed England with an abſolute Sway, for a Prince deſtined by his Birth to wear a Crown, for Lords related or allied to the Royal Family, who had always enjoyed the higheſt Offices. Such Inſtances of the Viciſſitude of worldly Grandeur often make but little Impreſſion at the time they are ſeen, becauſe thoſe who are concerned, are generally induced to aſcribe their Misfortunes to the malice of their Enemies. But they who read them impartially in Hiſtory, can they help obſerving, and acknowledging the direction of Providence (1)?

He makes himſelf very popular. Biondi.

1464. Edward having King Henry in his Power, and Queen Margaret being retired to the Duke her Father, there was no Perſon capable of raiſing Commotions in the Kingdom. Then it was, that after offering in vain a Pardon to all the Lancaſtrians, that would make their Submiſſion and ſwear Allegiance by ſuch a time, he confiſcated their Eſtates, and liberally beſtowed them upon thoſe that had ſerved him. Then, willing to gain the Affection of his Subjects, after giving them convincing Proofs of his Severity, he made himſelf extremely popular, even to ſuch a Degree that the Italian Author before mentioned, taxes him with running into Exceſs on that account.

He demands in Marriage Bona of Savoy, Lewis's Siſter. Hall, Hollingſh.

During this Calm, which ſeemed to be laſting, the King's chief Counſellors preſſed him to think of marrying, in order to leave the Crown to his Poſterity. He took their Advice, and three Matches were propoſed. The firſt was Margaret Siſter of the King of Scotland. But beſides that this Princeſs was already affianced to Henry's Son, ſhe was ſo young, the Marriage could not have been conſummated many Years. The ſecond was Iſabella of Caſtile, afterwards married to Ferdinand of Arragon. The Engliſh Writers ſay, ſhe was rejected by reaſon of her being too young: And yet, it is certain ſhe was then thirteen Years old (2). Bona of Savoy, Siſter of the Queen of France, was the third. Edward reſolved upon this laſt, and ſhortly after, ſent the Earl of Warwick to demand her in marriage. She was then at the Court of France with the Queen her Siſter. It is time now to ſpeak of the Affairs of France by reaſon of their Connection with thoſe of England. Otherwiſe, the Reader would underſtand but imperfectly, what paſſed in England in the Reign of Edward IV.

State of Affairs in France. Mezerai.

Lewis XI, a Prince of a turbulent and reſtleſs Spirit, was no ſooner on the Throne of France, but he formed the deſign of rendering himſelf abſolute. This is what ſome Flatterers have called rendering himſelf free, but what a famous Hiſtorian ſays ought rather to be termed, running Mad. To execute this grand deſign, the overgrown Power of the Peers was firſt to be humbled, among whom the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne were the moſt conſiderable. They not only upheld one another, but were moreover a Support to the reſt. The firſt held Burgundy and Flanders, the only two ancient Lay-Peerdoms which ſtill remained to be united to the Crown. This Prince, who was moreover Sovereign of almoſt all the Low-Countries, was ſo powerful, that to attack him firſt would have been very imprudent. So it was with the Duke of Bretagne that Lewis reſolved to begin the execution of his Projects. An old Quarrel about Homage afforded him a Pretence. Ever ſince Peter, ſirnamed Mauclerc, had done Homage to St. Lewis, the Nature of that Homage had been a continual Subject of Diſputes between the Kings of France and the Dukes of Bretagne. The Kings pretended it was Liege or Full, and the Dukes affirmed, it was not. This was a very important Queſtion, becauſe of the great Difference between bare Homage, and Homage-Liege. The firſt was paid by thoſe, who without being naturally dependent on a Prince, did him Homage however for other reaſons, as for his Protection, for his Aſſiſtance when wanted, or even for a Penſion. The Collection of the Publick Acts contain ſundry Homages of this Kind, paid to the Kings of England by Sovereign Princes of Germany and the Low-Countries, and by Earls of Savoy. But Homage-Liege was paid by thoſe that held Lands diſmembred from the Dominions of the Prince to whom it was paid; ſuch were the Dukedoms and Peerdoms of France. As theſe two Sorts of Homage were of a different Nature, they were likewiſe performed in a different Manner. The Perſon that did Homage-Liege was uncovered, on his Knees, ungirded, without Sword or Spurs; he held his Hands joined within thoſe of the Sovereign, and ſwore Fealty to him. But Simple-Homage was paid ſtanding, with the Sword and Spurs on, and without Oath. Thus Liege-Homage was for Lands diſmembred from a State, and denoted their being liable to Confiſcation, and Re-union. But Simple-Homage was perſonal, upon certain Conditions advantagious to the Vaſſal: So that the Default of Homage deprived him only of the Benefit of theſe Conditions. And therefore, the obliging the Duke of Bretagne to do Liege-Homage, would have put him under a neceſſity to own his Dukedom liable to Confiſcation, and to be re-annexed to the Crown of France. To avoid this Inconvenience, the Dukes of Bretagne had found the expedient of doing their Homage, like their Predeceſſors, in general Terms. Whether the Right of the Kings of France, with regard to the Nature of the Homage, could not be well proved, or the Circumſtances of Affairs obliged them to manage the Dukes of Bretagne, it is certain they long received their Homage in that manner. It is true, after Homage done, the Chancellor or High-Chamberlain ſaid aloud, the Homage was Liege, to which the Duke anſwered it was not; and thus the Pretenſions of each remained entire. Charles V plainly ſhowed he ſuppoſed the Homage to be Liege, ſince he cauſed the Dukedom of Bretagne to be confiſcated and annexed to his Crown, by a Decree of the Court of Peers. A Peace being concluded between France and Bretagne in the beginning of the Reign of Charles VI, the Duke of Bretagne was reſtored to his Dukedom, and, as nothing was ſettled concerning the Nature of the Homage, the Pretenſions of both Parties ſtill ſubſiſted. Arthur III, who had been Conſtable of France, when he became Duke of Bretagne, ſolemnly declared in doing his Homage to Charles VII, that he meant not to do Liege-Homage, and was allowed to pay it in general Terms, like his Predeceſſors. Francis II his Succeſſor made the ſame Declaration, and Charles VII received his Homage, though without approving his Proteſtation.

1464. Conteſts between the Kings of France and the Dukes of Bretagne, Argentré.

Lewis XI attacks the Duke of Bretagne, who forms a League againſt him. Argentré. P. Daniel.

The Affairs between France and Bretagne, were in this Situation, when Lewis XI came to the Crown. Probably, this Prince would have been no harder to pleaſe than Charles his Father, in reſpect of the Duke of Bretagne's Homage, had he not, as I ſaid, reſolved to begin with him, his grand Project of humbling all thoſe that could hinder his arriving at arbitrary Power. He had taken this reſolution the moment he was ſeated in the Throne, and it may be, before the Death of the King his Father; but it was not till 1464, that he began to execute it. To that end, having firſt ordered ſome Troops into Anjou, he ſent the Chancellor de Morvilliers to the Duke of Bretagne, to forbid him in his Name to aſſume any Right of Sovereignty in his Dukedom. Francis II finding himſelf unprepared for his Defence, had recourſe to Artifice, and demanded three months delay to conſult his States. This Term being granted him, he made uſe of it to cabal in France among the great Men, and to form againſt Lewis a powerful League, called the great League of the Publick Good, which will be preſently mentioned.

Negotiations between Edward and Lewis XI. Hall. Stow.

At the very time Lewis thought of attacking the Duke of Bretagne, Edward ſent the Earl of Warwick to demand

(1) This Year a Parliament met at Weſtminſter, on April 29, and was prorogued to November 4, and thence to February 20, at York. 1464. Bona of Savoy his Sister-in-law in Marriage. This Propoſal could not but be very agreeable to him, ſince he deſired nothing more ardently than to make an Alliance with the King of England, in order to prevent his interpoſing in his future Quarrels with the great Men of his Kingdom. But before the Concluſion of the Marriage, he was willing to be ſure of reaping this Benefit by it. To that end, he cauſed the Affair of the Marriage to be a little prolonged, whilſt he negotiated at London, and with the Earl of Warwick at Paris, a Treaty of perſonal Amity between him and Edward. This appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, where are ſeveral Papers concerning this Negotiation. We ſee there a full Power given by Edward to the Earl of Warwick, to treat of a final Peace, an Alliance, or Truce with Lewis XI, and another to conclude a Treaty of Amity and Friendſhip between the two Kings. Lewis's Deſigns were ſtill more extenſive. In order to deprive the Duke of Bretagne of all Protection, he would have drawn the Duke of Burgundy into his intended Alliance with England, and for that purpoſe agreed with Edward and Philip upon a Congreſs of Ambaſſadors at Heſdin, which was afterwards removed to St. Omer. He managed his Affairs at London by the Lord Launoy Governor of Amiens, ſent thither towards the end of the laſt Year. But all theſe Negotiations ended only in the Concluſion of a Sea-Truce, to laſt as long as that before made for the Land (1).

Whilſt theſe things were in agitation at London and Paris, Edward concluded with Scotland a fifteen Years Truce. John Kennedy (2), a Lord of great Abilities, and very zealous for his King and Country, thought he could not, during his Regency, do a greater Service to both, than to preſerve a good Underſtanding with the Engliſh. Otherwiſe it was almoſt impoſſible to maintain Tranquillity in Scotland, becauſe, during the War, the Male-Contents always relied upon the Protection of England.

This Affair being ended, Edward offered to all that had taken arms againſt him, an abſolute Pardon, excepting only Ralph Grey and Humphrey Nevill. Grey having been taken in Banborough, where he commanded for Henry, had been degraded (3). Probably, he had done ſomething ſince, which cauſed him to be excluded from the Pardon granted to the reſt. Shortly after, the King iſſued out a Proclamation, commanding all his Subjects from ſixteen to ſixty Years of Age to take Arms. But the Hiſtorians mention not this Armament, nor the Occaſion.

He concludes a Peace with Bretagne. Act. Pub. XI. p. 531, 532, 536.

In Auguſt this Year, Edward received Ambaſſadors from the Duke of Bretagne, who came to negotiate a Truce. As the Duke then found himſelf preſſed by the King of France, and was labouring to form the League of the Publick Good, he was glad to ſecure himſelf againſt England. He obtained from Edward a Truce for one Year, beginning the 1ſt of October.

About the ſame time the See of York becoming vacant, George Nevill, Brother of the Earl of Warwick, was promoted to it by the King's Recommendation (4).

Mean while, the Earl of Warwick, who was ſtill at the Court of France, having preſſed Lewis upon the principal occaſion of his Embaſſy, Edward's Marriage with Bona of Savoy was at length concluded and agreed. Preſently after, Lewis appointed the Earl of Dammartin for his Ambaſſador to Edward, to ſettle with him what ſtill remained to be done in the Affair, but all theſe Projects were demoliſhed by Love. What I am going to relate is not a Romance, but a true Story, which ſhews how far that Paſſion is ſometimes concerned in the moſt important Revolutions; for this Affair was attended with great Conſequences.

Edward falls in love with Elizabeth Woodville, Hall. Stow. Habington, Biondi.

Whilſt the Earl of Warwick was haſtening in France, with all his Power, the Concluſion of his Negotiation, Edward, by mere Accident, rendered it uſeleſs in England. This Prince being in Northamptonſhire near the Manor of Grafton (5), had a mind to viſit Jaquelina of Luxemburg, Ducheſs of Bedford, who had married Sir Richard Woodville. By him ſhe had, among other Children, a Daughter called Elizabeth, who had been Wife to Sir John Grey [of Groby] and upon his Death (6) was retired to her Father. She had the Affliction to ſee her Huſband's Eſtate confiſcated, on account of his attachment to the Intereſt of the Houſe of Lancaſter, in whoſe Service he had loſt his Life. The King's Viſit appearing to this young Lady to be a favorable opportunity, ſhe came and threw herſelf at his Feet, imploring the Reſtitution of her deceaſed Husband's Lands, and his Pity upon their Children. Edward, who was young and very amorous, no ſooner ſaw the charming Widow at his Feet, but he fell deſperately in Love with her. He immediately gave her hopes, as he raiſed her from the Ground, that he would grant her Requeſt, and even intimated, it was not in his Power to refuſe her any thing. Afterwards, in his private Converſations with her, he would fain have perſuaded her to purchaſe the Favour at a very high rate. All the Hiſtorians agree, he was the handſomeſt Man in England, and the moſt proper to make Conqueſts on the fair Sex. As he knew this, he did not queſtion to gain this Lady's Heart, with the ſame eaſe he had done many others. But ſhe plainly told him, though ſhe thought her ſelf unworthy to be a Queen, ſhe was above being a Concubine. This Declaration, which ſhewed ſo great Virtue in Elizabeth, made ſuch Impreſſion on the King, that deſpairing to attain his ends any other way, he offered her Marriage. A Heart like Edward's, with a Crown, could hardly be refuſed. The young Lady, agreeably ſurprized at ſo advantagious a Propoſal, accepted it immediately in ſo reſpectful and grateful a manner, as compleated the Conqueſt of this Monarch's Heart. However, as he was unwilling to diſoblige the Ducheſs of York his Mother, he could not think of proceeding any farther without acquainting her with his Intention. The Ducheſs, ſurprized at this haſty Reſolution, uſed all her Endeavours to diſſuade him from it. She repreſented to him the Injury he would do the Earl of Warwick, to whom he was ſo much obliged, and who, it was to be feared, would highly reſent it: That by the Affront he was going to put upon the King of France, he would make him his mortal Enemy, and render a Peace impracticable: That the Nobles of England would behold with Envy, the Woodville Family raiſed ſo high above them, and their Diſcontent might be attended with fatal Conſequences. In a word, he was going to marry a Woman with nothing, his Subject, who had Children by another Husband. Edward briefly replied, it was uncertain whether the Earl of Warwick would conſider his Change as an Injury; but, as for him, he was ſure of his Affection: That the King of France was like to have Affairs upon his hands, that would probably divert him from thinking of Revenge: That a King's marrying a Subject, inſtead of offending the Great Men, would rather be agreeable to them, ſince for the future all the noble Families might aſpire to the ſame Honour. Laſtly, That a Dower ought to be of no conſideration in a King's Marriage; and whatever elſe he could expect, would be ſupplied by his Love, and her Virtue, whom he choſe for his Wife. The Ducheſs, perceiving the King was not perſuaded by her Arguments, added another, and, as ſhe thought, a much ſtronger, reaſon. She remonſtrated to him, that he was contracted to the Lady Elizabeth Lucy, and could not in Conſcience take another Wife. Edward poſitively denied he was engaged to that Lady. Nevertheleſs, for his Mother's Satisfaction, or for fear this pretended Contract might one day furniſh a pretence to diſpute the Validity of his Marriage, he conſented that Elizabeth Lucy ſhould be examined by ſome Biſhops. Upon her Examination, ſhe confeſſed, the King had not made her a poſitive Promiſe: But ſhe ſaid however, ſhe ſhould never have yielded to his Deſires, had ſhe not been perſuaded of his Intention to marry her. This Anſwer ſhewing, there was no abſolute Promiſe on the King's part, the Biſhop's were of opinion the King might with a ſafe Conſcience marry another. Accordingly, Edward eſpouſed Elizabeth Woodville in the preſence of a few Perſons (7), ſo that his Marriage was divulged only by the Orders given to prepare for the new Queen's Coronation (8).

already concluded. Sir Richard Woodville the Queen's Father was immediately raiſed to the Dignity of Earl of Rivers, and his Son Anthony Woodville, married to the only Daughter of the Lord Scales, the greateſt Heireſs in the Kingdom (1). This created great Envy in the Nobles, particularly in the Duke of Clarence, who could not forbear being angry, that the King his Brother ſhould not think of procuring him ſo rich a Match. But this was nothing in compariſon of the Earl of Warwick's Indignation for being thus mocked. He thought the King ſhould have had more reſpect for him, than to uſe him ſo diſhonourably. In this belief, he expreſſed his reſentment to the King of France, who did not fail to inflame it to the utmoſt of his power. Lewis himſelf could not but look upon Edward's Proceedings as a deadly Affront. But his Affairs not permitting him to demand immediate Satisfaction, he concealed his reſentment, till he had a favorable Opportunity to ſhew it. As for the Earl of Warwick, he left the Court of France, and returned into England, with a Heart full of Hatred and Revenge againſt Edward, whoſe Ingratitude he abhorred. He took care however, to conceal his Sentiments, becauſe it was not yet time to diſcover them; but his very diſſimulation ſhewed the King he was extremely diſguſted. In this belief, Edward himſelf began to conſider him as a ſecret Enemy, though he ſtill gave him ſome ſlight Marks of his Confidence. Thus amidſt the diſguiſes of the King and the Earl, a mutual Hatred was nouriſhed, which induced the King to give him ſeveral Mortifications, as well to gratify his Paſſion, as to leſſen the Earl's Credit with the People. As he could not believe, that he who had by his Intereſt raiſed him to the Throne, might likewiſe have it in his power to pull him down, he was not careful to ſhew him any regard. Warwick plainly perceived the King's Aim, but wiſely diſſembled, for fear an unſeaſonable reſentment might oblige Edward to diſable him to be revenged. All the Hiſtorians unanimouſly agree, that preſently after his Return from France, he retired into the Country on pretence of his Health. But we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that during the Years 1465 and 1466, he was at Court, and even employed in Negotiations of Importance with Ambaſſadors of foreign Princes. So, it was two Years after his Return that he withdrew, when he could no longer bear to be entirely removed from Affairs, whilſt the new Earl of Rivers had all the King's Confidence.

Act. Pub. XI. p. 540, —— 578.

The reſt of the Year 1465 was ſpent in ſundry Negotiations with the King of France, the Duke of Burgundy, the Earl of Charolois, and the Duke of Bretagne. As theſe ſeveral Negotiations concerned the Affairs of France, and as upon theſe depends, in great meaſure, the Knowledge of the Hiſtory of England, it will be neceſſary briefly to relate their Situation at that time.

Affairs of France. Monſtrelet. P. Daniel.

Lewis XI was one of the ſubtleſt and leaſt ſcrupulous Princes then in Europe. His Deſign was, as I obſerved, to ruin the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, the former by Artifice, and the latter by Force. With regard to the Duke of Bretagne, he had, as I ſaid, begun to execute his Project, by aſſembling an Army in Anjou, ready to fall upon Bretagne, and which only waited till the Delay granted the Duke was expired. As for the Duke of Burgundy, Lewis had not thought proper to proceed ſo haughtily with him. He was too powerful a Prince to hope to ſucceed by attacking him openly; but he made uſe of a ſecret expedient, which partly procured him what would have been with great difficulty obtained by way of Arms. He bribed the Lords of Croy and Chimay, Brothers, prime Miniſters and Confidents of the Duke, who perſuaded their Maſter to deliver to the Crown of France, the Towns on the Somme (2), for four hundred thouſand Crowns, purſuant to the Treaty of Arras. Charles Earl of Charolois, only Son of the Duke of Burgundy, conſidered this Reſtitution as a mortal Wound to him and his Houſe. He believed, the Duke his Father ſhould at any rate have kept thoſe Places, which rendered him more formidable to France than all the reſt of his Dominions. He was ſo angry with the Miniſters, that he openly threatned to puniſh them one day for their pernicious Advice to his Father. This Affair created between the Father and Son a Quarrel, which the Favorites took care to foment; ſo that the Earl at laſt in great diſcontent retired into Holland. He pretended, it was not ſafe for him to be any longer at Court; that the Favorites had counſelled his Father to apprehend him, and even bribed People to poiſon him.

Memoirs of Commines.

Whilſt the Earl of Charolois was in Holland, Lewis XI ſent thither privately the Baſtard of Rubempré, in a Veſſel fitted out at Dieppe, with ſome choſen Soldiers, who, without knowing where they were going, had orders to obey Rubempré's Commands. The Baſtard landing with four of theſe Soldiers, was known and diſcovered to the Earl of Charolois, who immediately cauſed him to be ſeized. Some ſay, there was found upon him an Order under the King's own hand to apprehend the Earl, and bring him away dead or alive. In the mean time, Lewis was upon the Somme, with a conſiderable Army drawn together upon ſome pretence. He had appointed the Duke of Burgundy to meet him, on purpoſe, as it was afterwards reported, to ſeize his Perſon as ſoon as he knew the Succeſs of Rubempré's Plot. But the Earl of Charolois ſending ſpeedy notice to his Father of what he had diſcovered, the Duke immediately rode away from Heſdin, where he was now come. Thus, if it be true, that Lewis intended to ſeize at once the Father and Son, his Project miſcarried. This Attempt, whether it was only ſuſpected, or there was ſome Proof of it, greatly increaſed the Earl of Charolois's hatred to Lewis. He every where proclaimed, that the King of France deſigned to aſſaſſinate, or carry him away by force, and the Report immediately flew all over Flanders.

1465.

Lewis eaſily perceived, his Honour could not but be concerned in this Affair, eſpecially if the Baſtard of Rubempré, whoſe Trial was preparing in Holland, ſhould be convicted of the Fact laid to his charge. So, to prevent this Trial, he ſent the Chancellor de Morvilliers with ſome other Ambaſſadors to the Duke of Burgundy, to require him to deliver the Priſoners into his hands. The Earl of Charolois being preſent at the Audience, the Chancellor ſpoke very haughtily to the Duke, and even dropt ſome offenſive Expreſſions againſt the Earl his Son. The Earl would have frequently replied; but the Chancellor ſtill interrupted him, with ſaying he was ſent to his Father, and not to him. The Duke of Burgundy's Anſwer was, that being Sovereign in Holland, without any Dependance on France, he would cauſe the Priſoner to be tried, and either puniſhed or acquitted, according as he was found guilty or innocent. When the Ambaſſadors of France took their Leave of the Duke, the Earl of Charolois taking one of them aſide, ſaid to him: The King your Maſter has been very ſevere upon me by his Chancellor, but he ſhall repent it before a Year is at an end. And indeed, he was as good as his word.

War of the Publick Good againſt Lewis XI. Commin. Argentré. Mezerai.

This paſſed in the Year 1464, whilſt the Duke of Bretagne, to defend himſelf againſt Lewis, was labouring to form the League of the Publick Good above-mentioned. The Earl of Charolois was one of the firſt to come into it, and had obtained his Father's Permiſſion to raiſe Troops and join the Duke of Bretagne, with almoſt all the great Men of France, who were to be near Paris in June 1465. When the Duke of Bretagne ſaw himſelf ſecure of a powerful Aſſiſtance, he ſent Ambaſſadors to the King, under colour of deſiring a longer delay, but in reality to corrupt the Duke of Berry his Brother. They ſucceeded ſo well, that they brought the Duke with them into Bretagne. As ſoon as he was out of the King's power, the Confederates declared him Head of the League, and every one went and prepared to be at the Rendezvous. The Duke of Bourbon was the firſt that ventured to take Arms, with a deſign to draw the King into his Country, at a diſtance from Paris. Lewis, who had yet no intelligence of the League, marched immediately towards Bourbonnois. But quickly after he received advice, that the Earl of Charolois, at the head of a powerful Army, was approaching Paris, and the Duke of Bretagne with the reſt of the Confederates, were preparing to join him. Upon this News, he ſpeedily left Bourbonnois, to ſave his Metropolis. In the mean time, the Earl of Charolois attempted to become maſter of it, but as he ſaw no appearance of Succeſs, went and encamped at Montlhery, expecting the Dukes of Berry and Bretagne. Mean while, the King, who was advancing with great Marches, being come near Montlhery, the two Armies met and joined Battle. The Succeſs was ſo doubtful, that both Sides claimed the advantage. But as the King decamped in the night, to throw himſelf into Paris, he gave occaſion to his Enemies to ſay, he owned his Defeat. Some days after, the Dukes of Berry and Bretagne joined the Burgundians. But the King had now ſo well provided for the defence of his Capital, that it was impoſſible for the Confederates to take it. At length, the War ended in a Treaty ſigned at Conflans the 30th of October. Lewis reſtored to the Duke of Burgundy the Towns upon the Somme, for which he had paid four hundred thouſand Crowns, and gave Normandy in Appennage to the Duke his Brother (3). After the ſigning of the Treaty, the Earl of Charolois retired into the Low-Countries, and the Birth of the Princeſs Elizabeth. Hall.

Edward having greatly affronted Lewis XI, conſidered him as a ſecret Enemy, who would not miſs an opportunity to be revenged. He behaved however with great Caution, during the War of the Publick Good, for fear of affording him a freſh Cauſe to ſupport the Houſe of Lancaſter, in caſe he ſubdued the Confederate Princes. The ſame reaſon induced him to hearken to the Propoſals of the Dukes of Berry and Bretagne; but he had taken care to conclude nothing, either with them or the King of France. Afterwards, Lewis's Diſadvantage at the Treaty of Conflans, might have cauſed Edward to pay him leſs regard, had not the Revolution immediately after in Normandy, made him act with deliberation. Mean time, he was equally preſſed on both ſides. The King of France, feigning to forget the Affront he had received, urged him to enter into Treaty with him for a final Peace between the two Crowns, or at leaſt, for a long Truce. On the other hand, the Duke of Burgundy, the Earl of Charolois, and the Duke of Bretagne, repreſented to him, that if he ſuffered the French Princes to be oppreſſed, the King of France would become ſo powerful, as could not but prove fatal to England. The Courſe he took upon this occaſion, was to manage them all, and keep both Sides in hopes. The truth is, it was by no means his Intereſt to concern himſelf in their Quarrels, and create new Enemies, when the Lancaſtrian Party, though humbled, were ſtill very numerous in England. This is the real Motive of his Conduct, and of all his Negotiations, as well with the King of France, as with the other Princes, who preſſed him to declare himſelf. Mean while, to keep Affairs upon the ſame foot, till farther Diſcoveries could be made, he concluded a ſhort Truce with France, and the like with the Duke of Bretagne. In managing the King of France he had a farther Aim, to haſten the concluſion of a Marriage propoſed to him, between Margaret his Siſter, and the Earl of Charolois. He was ſenſible, the leſs inclined he appeared to break with Lewis XI, the more eager would the Duke of Burgundy and his Son be for the Marriage. And indeed, his Policy had all the ſucceſs he expected. Theſe two Princes perceiving how difficult it was to engage him in their Party, imagined there was no ſhorter way to attain their Ends, than to effect the Marriage propoſed. As ſoon as Edward ſaw them in this Diſpoſition, he delayed not to enter into Engagements with them. He loved not the King of France, as knowing he was not beloved by him. Beſides, he conſidered there was no reliance upon that Prince's Word; that his Proceedings were inſincere, and at one time or other he would ſhew his reſentment. Moreover, it was not for the Intereſt of England, to ſuffer the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne to be ruined, which, as it evidently appeared, was Lewis's grand Deſign. Wherefore, October the 23d, he ſigned a Treaty of perſonal Alliance, Amity, and Friendſhip with the Earl of Charolois. A few days after, he ſent a Safe-Conduct to Lewis of Bruges Lord of Gruthuyſe, appointed by the Duke of Burgundy to treat with him of a perpetual Peace, and ſettle the Articles of the Marriage of the Earl of Charolois with the Princeſs Margaret.

All this ſeemed to tend to a League between Edward and the Duke of Burgundy for the Duke of Bretagne's defence, who was vigorouſly preſſed. Since the Duke of Berry had been expelled out of Normandy, the Duke of Bretagne had undertaken to ſupport him, and cauſe the Treaty of Conflans to be executed. This was projected by him and the Earl of Charolois, who promiſed to make a powerful Diverſion in Picardy. But unhappily for the Duke of Bretagne, the Duke of Burgundy was engaged in a War with the Liegeois, which hindered the Earl of Charolois from performing his Promiſe. Mean while, Lewis XI, improving this Juncture, preſſed the Duke of Bretagne extremely, who being unable to withſtand him alone, gave him hopes he would comply with his Will. But this was only to gain time, till the Duke of Burgundy was ready. At length the War with Liege being ſuſpended by a Truce, the Earl of Charolois prepared to march into Picardy. But, when leaſt expected, Lewis by his ſecret Practices cauſed the Liegeois to take Arms again. Thus the Duke of Bretagne was ſtill greatly diſtreſſed. He defended himſelf however as well as he could, in expectation of being quickly aſſiſted.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in France, Edward concluded a Treaty of perpetual Alliance with the King of Caſtile. He had done the ſame with the King of Denmark the beginning of this Year. Tho' theſe Alliances were inconſiderable with reſpect to his principal Affairs, they gained him reputation, and rendered him more formidable to his Enemies.

Edward's Alliances with Caſtile and Denmark. Act. Pub. XI. p. 537, 551, 560, 569, 580.--583. Hall.

The firſt part of the Year 1467 was wholly ſpent in Negotiations with France and the Duke of Burgundy. The Duke only waited the end of the War with Liege, to give all his Forces to his Son, and prevent, by a powerful Diverſion, the Duke of Bretagne's ruin, who having already loſt his Towns in Lower-Normandy, ſaw himſelf upon the point of being attacked in his own Country. On the other ſide, Lewis, who ſpared no Coſt to have good Spies, was informed of what paſſed between Edward and the Duke of Burgundy, and eaſily perceived, their Union tended to the Duke of Bretagne's defence. As he ſtill intended to ruin that Prince, he omitted nothing to divert Edward from the Engagements he was entering into with his Enemies. For that purpoſe, in February 1467, he ſent the Baſtard of Bourbon into England, and in June, the Archbiſhop of Narbonne. Edward pretending to be entirely diſengaged, appointed immediately Commiſſioners (3) to treat with theſe Ambaſſadors. But as it is eaſy to gain time in theſe Negotiations, nothing was concluded. Mean while, Lewis was afraid to diſtreſs the Duke of Bretagne, for fear of obliging Edward to declare for him.

Death of the Duke of Burgundy. The Earl of Charolois ſucceeds him. Monſtrelet. Mezerai.

Mean while, Lewis, fearing his Prey would eſcape out of his Hands, ſent and offered the new Duke of Burgundy to deſert the Liegeois whom he had hitherto aſſiſted, provided he would, in return, abandon the Duke of Bretagne. If Charles had cloſed with this Propoſal, the Duke of Bretagne would have been irrecoverably loſt, ſince there was now a French Army of thirty thouſand Men in the heart of his Country. But he bravely rejected it, declaring, let what would be the conſequence, he would aſſiſt the Duke of Bretagne to the utmoſt of his Power. He only waited the end of the War with Liege, to throw himſelf into Picardy, and did not queſtion that Edward would declare againſt France, when he ſaw himſelf ſecure of being ſo ſtrongly ſupported. The very Day of his Father's Death (4), he ratified his Alliance with Edward, and the new Bond whereby they were going to be farther united, namely, his Marriage then upon the Point of concluſion, ſeemed to promiſe him, he ſhould never want the Aſſiſtance of England. Mean while, the Duke of Bretagne, fearing to be oppreſſed before the Succours arrived, put Lewis in hopes of all the Satisfaction he deſired, and by that means obtained a Truce which gave him ſome reſpite.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in France, conſiderable Alterations were made in the Court of England, which in the end occaſioned great Troubles. Chancellor, 1467. Chancellor, but at length was removed to make room for the Biſhop of Bath and Wells (1), one of the Queen's moſt zealous Adherents. The Earl of Warwick was no longer employed as before in Affairs of Importance. This manifeſtly appears in the Collection of Publick Acts, where his Name is not found after the middle of this Year. As for the Marqueſs of Montague his Brother, Governor of the northern Counties, that Poſt being of no great Conſequence, ſince there was no danger from Scotland, he was not diſplaced. Beſides, Edward had leſs Inclination to diſpleaſe him, becauſe in the decline of his Family's Credit he behaved with more circumſpection than his Brothers. On the other hand, the Earl of Rivers, the Queen's Father, was raiſed to the higheſt degree of Favour. Beſides the Office of Lord-Treaſurer, he was likewiſe made High-Conſtable, upon the voluntary or forced Reſignation of the Earl of Worceſter (2), whom the King requited, by making him Lieutenant in Ireland, under the Duke of Clarence. Thus the Earl of Rivers held at once two of the greateſt Offices of the Crown, and moreover, his Son Anthony Woodville had a Grant of the Reverſion of the High-Conſtableſhip. Probably it was about this time, that the Earl of Warwick retired from Court, and the Archbiſhop of York went and reſided upon his Dioceſe.

The Earl of Warwick withdraws from Court. He is extremely incenſed againſt the King. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

It was very hard for a Man of the Earl of Warwick's Character to ſuffer ſuch a Diſgrace without reſentment. He was the proudeſt Lord that had ever been in England, and his natural Pride was ſtill encreaſed by the great Services he had done the King. The Affront put upon him by the King, in marrying in England without his knowledge, at the very time he was employed by him at Paris to negotiate another Marriage, which too was concluded, had extremely incenſed him. The Contempt ſhewn him by the King at his return from France, in not making him ſome civil Excuſe, had very much increaſed his Diſguſt. To this was added, an extreme Indignation to ſee his Credit entirely ſunk. In fine, the Favours, heaped by the King upon the Queen's Relations, racked him with Envy, and threw him upon the moſt violent Reſolutions (3). If we may believe certain Hiſtorians, he had a ſtronger reaſon to hate Edward than thoſe I have mentioned. And that is, Edward attempted the Chaſtity of one of his Daughters (4); and this Prince's Character, who was not very ſcrupulous in that reſpect, makes the thing credible. Be this as it will, the Earl mortally hated Edward, though he concealed his Averſion in order to ſhew it effectually. It is certain the King, to whom he was not unknown, committed a great Error in not giving him ſome Satisfaction, or in not ruining him entirely. With Perſons of this Character, Policy requires that one or other of theſe two Courſes be taken. The Continuator of Monſtrelet ſays, that in June 1467, the Earl of Warwick met Lewis XI at Roan, and ſtaid with him twelve days. If ſo, it may be preſumed, that being ſent into France upon the King's Affairs, he took that Opportunity to ſecure Lewis's Protection, and concert meaſures with him concerning the Execution of his Project to dethrone Edward (5).

1468. Mean while, the Negotiation of the Marriage of Edward's Siſter with the Duke of Burgundy ſtill continued, whilſt Edward kept Lewis in hopes of concluding a perpetual Peace with him. But it was only to amuſe him, and haſten withal the Marriage of the Princeſs his Siſter. However, for fear his Embaſſy to Paris might give ſome ſuſpicion to the Duke of Burgundy, he iſſued out a Proclamation, expreſsly ordering the Coaſts to be well-guarded, as ſoon as the Truce with France, which was to end in March, ſhould be expired. Shortly after, the Marriage was at laſt concluded, and Margaret ſent to Bruges with a ſplendid Retinue, being attended by the Ducheſſes of Exeter and Suffolk (6). There the Nuptials were ſolemnized with a Magnificence worthy the two Princes who were allied by this Marriage. The ſame day the Truce of Commerce between England and the Duke of Burgundy's Dominions was prolonged for thirty Years.

The reſt of the Winter was ſpent, in negotiating an Alliance between Edward and the Duke of Bretagne: The Duke of Burgundy ſtrongly ſollicited the concluſion of that Affair, becauſe he was ſo incumbered with the War of Liege, that it was not poſſible for him to aſſiſt his Ally. The thing was not without difficulties, ſince it was to paſs from a long War between England and Bretagne, to a ſtrict Alliance. So, all that could be done at firſt, was to prolong the Truce till July. After that,

Edward and the Duke of Bretagne ſent one another Letters Patent, promiſing mutual Aſſiſtance to the utmoſt of their Power. The Duke of Burgundy ſent the like to the King to induce him the ſooner to declare againſt France. Indeed, it was of the utmoſt conſequence to him to prevent the Duke of Bretagne's Ruin, and procure the Duke of Berry a Settlement, which might enable him to keep the King his Brother in awe. He was almoſt certain, that after Lewis had put it out of the power of theſe two Princes to hurt him, he would not fail to attack him with all his Forces. On the other hand, Edward ſaw but too plainly how prejudicial Lewis's growth of Power might be to him. Wherefore by his Orders his Commiſſioners ſigned, the 2d of July, a Treaty of Commerce with Bretagne, and the next day a Levy of Troops was ordered for the aſſiſtance of that Duchy. In the beginning of Auguſt, he ſent Ambaſſadors (7) to France, on pretence to treat with Lewis of a perpetual Peace, and yet two days after he ſigned a Treaty, whereby he ingaged to ſend the Duke of Bretagne an Aid of three thouſand Archers. As the Duke ſaw himſelf preſſed by the King of France, it was neceſſary to haſten that Affair, as well on his own as on the part of Edward, without ſtanding too much upon Terms. The Fleet and Troops deſigned for Bretagne being ready in the beginning of October, the King gave the Command to Anthony Woodville, Lord Scales, his Brother-in-law.

Whilſt theſe Affairs were negotiating at London, the Dukes of Berry and Bretagne were not a little embarraſſed. The Truce granted them by Lewis being about to expire, they ſaw the Duke of Burgundy too remote and too buſy elſewhere, to hope to be delivered by his means. As for the Succours expected from England, they were neither ſpeedy nor ſtrong enough to free them from their Danger. Mean while, the Duke of Burgundy made all poſſible haſte to end the War with the Liegeois, knowing how the Duke of Bretagne was preſſed. At laſt he found means to force his Enemies to a Battle, wherein he obtained a complete Victory, which obliged them to ſue for Peace. As ſoon as the Treaty was ſigned, he marched for Picardy. He was now come upon the Somme, ready to enter upon action, when he heard, the Dukes of Berry and Bretagne had made a Peace with the King of France, and after renouncing all foreign Alliance, the Duke of Berry was contented with an Appennage of ſix thouſand Livres a Year in Land, and an annual Penſion of ſixty thouſand in lieu of Normandy, granted him by the Treaty of Conflans. This News, which Lewis ſent him by an Expreſs, was the moſt unwelcome. However, without being diſcouraged with this unexpected accident, he reſolved to remain incamped where he was. He hoped, as the Duke of Bretagne had been compelled to a Peace, he would repent what he had done, when he ſaw himſelf ſupported, and eaſily find an excuſe to break it. This is what he plainly told thoſe who adviſed him to ſue to the King of France for Peace.

The Duke of Burgundy beats the Liegeois.

He hears the Dukes had made a Peace with Lewis.

He reſolves to go to War without them.

The Duke of Burgundy's reſolution inſpired Lewis with fear. He was apprehenſive, the Dukes of Berry and Bretagne would receed, when they ſaw Aſſiſtance ſo near. In that caſe, he might depend upon having to deal with the King of England, the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, and many of the moſt potent Lords of the Kingdom, who were diſſatisfied with him. In this Uneaſineſs, which was not ill grounded, he departed from Paris, where he then was, into Picardy, to treat with the Duke of Burgundy. This Deſign ſucceeded to his Wiſh. The Duke, uncertain of the reſolution the Duke of Bretagne might take, agreed to retire, for four hundred thouſand Crowns, which Lewis gave him to defray his Expences.

He gets advantagious Terms of Lewis.

Hitherto Lewis had reaſon to be ſatisfied with his Advantages. He had diſperſed the League made againſt him, and reduced the Duke his Brother to a very moderate Appennage. However, he could not think of abandoning his firſt Project. He was reſolved to ruin the Duke of Bretagne, that he might afterwards attack the other Peers, and the Duke of Burgundy himſelf, with more ſafety. His extreme deſire to execute this Project, made him commit the groſſeſt fault that ſo politick a Prince could poſſibly be guilty of. After ſigning his Treaty with the Duke of Burgundy, he would go and confer with him. He had ſuch a Conceit of himſelf, that he fancied he ſhould perſuade that Prince to relinquiſh the Intereſts of the Duke of Bretagne. At leaſt, he hoped to ſow Jealouſies between them, from which he could not fail to reap great Advan-

As ſoon as it was received, he repaired to that Town with a ſlender Retinue, the better to gain the Duke by that extreme Confidence. But before his departure, he forgot to recal the Ambaſſadors ſent to the Liegeois, to perſuade them to break the Peace with the Duke of Burgundy, upon his Aſſurance of a powerful Aid. This was ſufficient to induce that People to take Arms again, and the News of it was brought to the Duke of Burgundy at Peronne, the ſame, or the next, day, after the King's Arrival. A proceeding ſo contrary to good Faith, convincing the Duke that Lewis ſought only to deceive him, he even impriſoned him in the Caſtle of Peronne, where he was lodged, and detained him ſeveral days, uncertain what to reſolve. Lewis judging of his Enemy by himſelf, was in mortal Agonies. So, not knowing how to eſcape, he ſaw no other remedy, but to ſubmit to what Terms the Duke ſhould pleaſe to impoſe upon him. He met with more Generoſity in that Prince than he could have expected. After a very ſhort Negotiation, it was agreed between them, that the King ſhould give Champagne and Brie to his Brother, inſtead of Normandy, which he was to have had by the Treaty of Conflans, and ſhould accompany the Duke in the War with Liege. A few days after, they departed together towards the Territories of Liege, and Lewis had the mortification to be himſelf witneſs of the Deſtruction of the Capital, which he had prepoſterouſly thrown into that misfortune. At laſt, he got out of the Duke of Burgundy's hands, after having been in continual fears either of loſing his Life, or undergoing a grievous Captivity during the reſidue of his days. Mean while, he had no Inclination really to execute the Treaty made at Peronne. He found means afterwards to evade it.

Edward's Alliance with Aragon. Act. Pub. XI. p. 631. ---- 635.

It is time now to leave the Affairs of which it was neceſſary to give a general Knowledge, and reſume thoſe of England, where a more affecting Scene is going to open, by the Variety of the Events which render this Part of Edward's Reign very remarkable. The 20th of October, Edward renewed the antient Alliance between England and Aragon. The Engliſh Hiſtorians place this Treaty in the Year 1466, but in the Collection of the Publick Acts, it is dated October 20, 1468. Probably, they have confounded the Alliance with Caſtile, in 1466, with that which was renewed two Years after with Aragon. Edward is ſaid, upon this occaſion, to ſend the King of Aragon a Preſent of ſome Ewes and Rams (1), which ſo multiplied in Spain, that it proved very detrimental to the Wool-Trade of England.

He preſents the King of Aragon with ſome Sheep. Biondi. Habington. Hall.

It was about the end of the Year 1468, or the beginning of 1469, that the Earl of Warwick believed himſelf in condition to begin the execution of his Project againſt Edward. Since he had quitted the Court, he was ſo forgot, that he was not thought of, unleſs it was neceſſary to ſend him Orders concerning his Government of Calais. If he went to France the laſt year, as Monſtrelet's Continuator affirms, it is hardly to be doubted that he communicated his Deſigns to Lewis XI, and took meaſures with him accordingly. But ſuppoſing he left not England, it was not difficult to treat with that Prince by ſecret Emiſſaries. However this be, the Earl paſſionately deſiring to ſhow that he was not to be offended with Impunity, believed it proper to begin with gaining his two Brothers, the Archbiſhop of York and the Marquiſs of Montague, whoſe Intereſt was the ſame with his. To that end, he repreſented to them the Services they had all three done the King, and the little Account made thereof, ſince their Rewards bore no proportion to what they had done for him: That not content with being ungrateful to all their Family, he had put upon him in particular a grievous Affront in the Affair of his Marriage: That moreover, he had attempted to diſgrace their Family in a manner inſupportable to Men of Honour. In fine, after many other things tending to convince them of the King's Ingratitude, he told them, he was determined to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to ſhow him, that he who had raiſed him to the Throne was powerful enough to pull him down, and for the execution of this Deſign, deſired their advice and aſſiſtance. The Archbiſhop of York was very eaſily led to follow his Brother's Paſſion, but the Marquiſs of Montague was not ſo forward to reſolve. He alledged Arguments and Objections which the Earl of Warwick anſwered with great vehemence.

1469. The Earl of Warwick draws his Brothers into the Plot to dethrone the King. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

At laſt he was prevailed with, but intimated, it was more out of complaiſance to his Brother than inclination. 1469.

This firſt Step being made, the Earl of Warwick addreſſed himſelf to the Duke of Clarence, the eldeſt of the King's Brothers. He knew the Duke was diſſatisfied, that the King his Brother had done nothing for him, but given him an empty Title which he did not want: That moreover he had ſeen with extreme Jealouſy the Lord Scales, the Queen's Brother, married to the richeſt Heireſs in the Kingdom, without any thought of procuring him ſo advantagious a Match. Theſe Conſiderations cauſing the Earl of Warwick to believe, the Duke would gladly embrace an opportunity of being revenged, he imparted to him his Deſign. The Duke was really inclined as the Earl wiſhed him, and, as he burned with deſire to be revenged for the little Affection ſhown him by the King, readily entered into the Plot. The better to confirm him in this reſolution, the Earl of Warwick promiſed him his eldeſt Daughter (2) in marriage with a very conſiderable Fortune. All the Hiſtorians affirm, that preſently after this Conference, they went together to Calais (3), where the Nuptials were ſolemnized; but do not ſay whether it was privately, or with the King's conſent. What they add, that the Duke and the Earl ſtaid at Calais till the Inſurrection, mentioned hereafter, cannot be true. It appears, on the contrary, by ſeveral Papers in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that they were in England moſt part of this Year, before the Inſurrection, and even in the King's Favour, who had no Intelligence of their Plot. Nay, it ſeems he began to repent his great Neglect of the Earl of Warwick, ſince on the 17th of Auguſt he made him Juſticiary of South-Wales, and ſome time after, Seneſchal of the whole Country (4).

Act. Pub. XI. p. 647.

Notwithſtanding theſe Favours, the Earl of Warwick's Projects began to be executed. In the beginning of October, there was a Sedition in Yorkſhire, which all the Hiſtorians unanimouſly aſcribe to the ſecret Practices of the Marquiſs of Montague (5), and his Brother the Archbiſhop of York. The occaſion or pretence, was this. There was at York an Hoſpital (6), to the Maintenance whereof the whole County had always contributed, without however being obliged. In time, theſe voluntary Contributions were changed into a kind of Right, wholly founded upon Cuſtom, and for which there were Collectors appointed. They who had been bribed to ſtir up the People, artfully ſpread a report, that the Contributions were miſapplied, and ſerved only to inrich the Directors of the Hoſpital: That beſides, the Hoſpital being ſufficiently endowed, theſe Collections were needleſs. Whereupon the Country People took fire, as if it had been an Affair of the utmoſt Importance. They aſſembled to the number of fifteen thouſand, and killing ſome of the Collectors, marched towards York, under the command of one Robert Huldern. Upon this news, the Marquiſs of Montague, who reſided at York, aſſembling a Body of the Citizens, ſallied out upon the Rebels, ſlew a great number, and taking their Leader, ordered his head to be ſtruck off. This conduct would give occaſion to preſume, the Sedition was not raiſed by himſelf, had not his after-Proceedings been leſs ambiguous.

An Inſurrection in Yorkſhire, raiſed by Warwick's Friends. Hall. Hollingſh.

Montague defeats the Mutineers, and beheads their Leader.

The firſt rumour of this Commotion made the King apprehenſive of the conſequences. Indeed the Cauſe was not very important, but knowing how numerous the Lancaſtrian Party ſtill were, he did not doubt that it was raiſed by ſome Lord, Friend to that Houſe. However, he was very far from miſtruſting his Brother and the Earl of Warwick to be the chief Authors. Whatever the Iſſue might be, he diſpatched Orders to the Earl of Pembroke Governor of Wales, to aſſemble all the Forces of thoſe Parts, and keep himſelf ready to march (7). Mean time, the Yorkſhire Male-Contents, rather animated than diſcouraged at the ill Succeſs of their firſt attempt, took arms again, and ſet at their head Henry Son of the Lord Fitz-Hugh, and Henry Neville Son of the Lord Latimer. Theſe two young Leaders had not much experience, but were directed by Sir John Conyers, a Perſon of great conduct and valour, and well verſed in the art of War. Their firſt Project was to make themſelves maſters of York, but ſuddenly altering their reſolution and rout, they marched towards London, not at all doubting that their Army would encreaſe by the way, as it really Mean while, the Earl of Pembroke having drawn together about ten thouſand Men (1), began his March in queſt of the Male-Contents. The two Armies being come near one another, the Earl of Pembroke ſent Sir Richard Herbert his Brother, with a Detachment (2) to view the Enemy as near as poſſible. Sir Richard, who was a very good Officer, executed his Orders with great conduct, without expoſing himſelf however to be attacked. But his Men, who had not his experience, prepoſterouſly imagining, he would loſe a fair opportunity to defeat the Enemies, fell, againſt his Will, upon their Rear. But Conyers, who foreſaw it, was ſo well prepared, that the Detachment was routed with great Loſs.

Edward hearing this news, writ to the Earl of Pembroke not to be diſcouraged for ſo inconſiderable a Loſs, aſſuring him he would come in perſon and join him, or ſend a ſtrong Reinforcement. Mean while, the Seditious finding they had near them an Army which might daily encreaſe, and fearing to meet the King in the way, reſolved to retire to Warwick, where, very likely the Leaders knew, they ſhould be received. But the Earl of Pembroke, impatient to have his revenge, marched directly towards them, and forced them to halt near Banbury, where the two Armies incamped at a ſmall diſtance one from another (3). Mean time, the Earl of Pembroke and the Lord Stafford quarrelling about an Inn (4), Stafford withdrew in the night with his eight hundred Archers. On the morrow, at break of day, the Male-Contents marched in good order to attack the King's Army. They had heard by Deſerters of the Lord Stafford's retreat, and were reſolved to improve it. Henry Neville (5), one of their Generals, advancing in order to ingage, for fear the Royaliſts ſhould retire, was fiercely repulſed, made Priſoner, and ſlain in cold blood. This barbarous Action inſpiring the northern Men with a ſort of Fury, they ruſhed upon their Enemies, and notwithſtanding the Valour of Sir Richard Herbert, who performed that day Actions extolled by all the Hiſtorians (6), the King's Army was put to rout (7). The Earl of Pembroke and his Brothers fell into the hands of the Conquerors, who carrying them to Banbury, ordered their Heads to be ſtruck off, in revenge for the Death of Sir Henry Neville. After this Victory, the Male-Contents continued their march to Warwick. Hitherto the Earl of Warwick and the Duke of Clarence had not declared themſelves. It may be, they were gone ſome time before to Calais, to avoid the Suſpicion of being concerned in the Inſurrection, in caſe it miſcarried, and to improve it, in caſe of Succeſs.

The King's Blindneſs in regard to the Earl of Warwick.

The Death of the Earl of Rivers ſhould, one would think, have convinced the King, that the Earl of Warwick, though abſent, was the real Author of theſe Troubles; ſuppoſing the March of the Male-contents towards London, and the Battle of Banbury had not been ſufficient to make him ſuſpect it. Warwick was ſworn Enemy of the Earl of Rivers, he was angry with the King, and the Male-contents had been received without oppoſition into Warwick. In a word, theſe People had no reaſon to take Arms againſt Edward on account of York-Hoſpital, if they had not been privately incouraged by ſome powerful Enemy of the King, who could be no other than the Earl of Warwick. For, there was not then in the Kingdom, any Prince of the Houſe of Lancaſter, or any Lord of that Party, of ſufficient power to cauſe theſe Inſurrections. As therefore, Edward could not be ignorant of the Diſcontent and great Credit of the Earl of Warwick and his Brothers, he ought to have naturally concluded, they were the ſecret Authors. And yet, though it appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that the Earl of Rivers was put to death before the 16th of November, the King did not clearly ſee till the following March, that he had to deal with the Earl of Warwick! Strange and inconceiveable Blindneſs! 1469. Act. Pub. XI. p. 649.

1470. The War ceaſes during the Winter.

The Sharpneſs of the Seaſon interrupted for ſome time the Civil War lately kindled. Beſides, the King, to whom it was very unexpected, wanted time to prepare. On the other hand, the Male-contents having yet no declared Head, remained quiet, in expectation of more particular Directions.

Embaſſy from France, p. 650.

During this Winter, Lewis XI, ſent Ambaſſadors into England, under colour of renewing the Truce. Probably, his ſole Aim was to be perfectly informed of the Situation of Affairs in that Kingdom. At the ſame time Edward, p. 651. deſirous of ſtrengthening his Alliance with the Duke of Burgundy, ſent him the Order of the Garter, which that Prince received at Bruges, the 4th of February, with great Solemnity.

If the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick were at Calais during the late Troubles, it is likely, they returned not to England till about February 1470. For, p. 652. they are not mentioned in the Collection of the Publick Acts ſince Auguſt the laſt Year. After their return, Edward was ſo far from ſuſpecting them, that on the 7th p. 654. of March he ſent them, jointly, a Commiſſion to levy Troops againſt the Rebels in the North. Seven Days after, he conferred on the Earl of Worceſter the Office of High-Conſtable, vacant by the Death of the Earl of Rivers.

Warwick and Clarence declare for the Rebels. Hall.

But, ſhortly after, the King's Eyes were fully opened with regard to the Duke his Brother, and the Earl of Warwick. They levied Troops by virtue of his Commiſſion, but not for his Service. Beſides, the Rebels made no ſcruple to own them for their Heads. Thus, both Sides were preparing more than ever to renew the War. Mean time, Edward was ſo prepoſſeſſed, that his Brother and the Earl of Warwick durſt not appear before him, that he imagined their Deſign was to retire into Ireland, of which the Duke of Clarence was Lieutenant. In this belief he iſſued out a Proclamation, dated March the 23d, forbidding the Iriſh to obey the Duke his Brother, and ordering them to apprehend him as well as the Earl of Warwick, in caſe they came there. Moreover, he promiſed any Perſon that ſhould take them, a Penſion of a thouſand Pounds Sterling, or the Sum of ten thouſand Pounds in Money, which he would. By the ſame Proclamation, he conferred the Government of Ireland upon the Earl of Worceſter. Three days after, he gave Orders to levy Troops in all the Counties under his Obedience, which was very diligently performed (10). The King's Security ill-grounded. Act. Pub. XI. p. 654. p. 655.

The Duke and Earl levy Troops and join.

But the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick were very far from any Thoughts of retiring into Ireland. On the contrary, they were very intent upon raiſing Troops, each in different Quarters. At laſt, having advice the King was preparing to march againſt them, they thought proper to join, leſt by remaining ſeparate, they ſhould give him too great an advantage. So, Edward when he marched to attack them, found them ready to expect him, and bent to decide the Quarrel by a Battle. However, the Uncertainty of the Iſſue keeping both Sides equally in ſuſpence, ſome of the moſt prudent Lords interpoſed, to procure an Agreement before it came to a deciſion by Arms. The King paſſionately deſired it, becauſe he conſidered he was going to hazard his Crown by the loſs of a Battle, whereas the Victory could procure him no great Advantage. On the other hand, he flattered himſelf, that the Earl of Warwick ſeeing him in ſo good Poſture, would be glad, by an honorable Compoſition, to get clear of his preſent ill State. So, thinking the Negotiation could not fail of Succeſs, he neglected to take the uſual Precautions for the defence of his Camp, contrary to the moſt conſtant Maxim of War, that a Man ought never to be more upon his guard, than whilſt he is in Treaty.

The victorious Earl no sooner had him in his power, but he caused him to be conducted to Warwick. After that, he ordered him to be removed to Middleham Castle (2), under Custody of his Brother the Archbishop of York, who was no less concerned than he, carefully to guard such a Prisoner.

and takes him Prisoner. Hall. Hollingsh.

This Accident seemed to have ended the War. Indeed Edward being a Captive, nothing more appeared that could oppose the two victorious Lords. Wherefore, they so relied on their good fortune, that they disbanded most of their Troops, as not wanting them after this decision. They had only to resolve, in what manner the Government should be settled; for it does not appear, they had any desire to restore Henry to the Throne. But an unexpected Event, no less surprizing than what had just happened, broke all their Measures. Edward being confined in Middleham Castle, in the Custody of the Archbishop of York, behaved so obligingly to that Prelate, that he had leave with a small Guard to hunt now and then in the Park. This first Step being taken, he prevailed with one of his Guards to deliver a Letter to two Gentlemen of the Neighbourhood, wherein he pointed out to them, what Course they should take to free him. The Gentlemen (3), overjoyed at the opportunity to do the King so great Service, privately assembled their Friends, and lying in ambush near the Park, easily carried him away. Edward being at liberty, contrary to all Expectation, immediately repaired to York. But he did not long remain there, whether he mistrusted the Inhabitants, or thought it more convenient to be nearer London. Be this as it will, he made haste into Lancashire, where he found the Lord Hastings his Chamberlain, who had assembled some Troops. After that, taking a compass, to deceive the Vigilance of the Earl of Warwick, he went directly to London, where he was received without any difficulty. The Earl of Warwick so little expected such a turn, that he had neglected to secure the Metropolis, not imagining it to be in any danger.

Warwick dismisses his Troops.

Edward makes his Escape, and comes to London. Hall. Hollingsh.

It is easy to conceive the Earl of Warwick's Surprize, when he received this fatal News. The Indiscretion of his Brother the Archbishop, was so very great, that he could not help suspecting him of being bribed. But as it was not then proper to examine his Conduct, he thought only of re-assembling his dispersed Troops, which could not be done in few days. Edward was likewise in the same Confusion, since he was without an Army. So, however desirous both were to end their Quarrel by a Battle, they were obliged to stay till their Forces were assembled. In the mean time, some peaceable Lords proposed to renew the Negotiation begun before the King's Imprisonment. The Proposal being accepted, the Mediators judged an Interview of the King, and the two Chiefs of the opposite Party, might conduce to a Peace. In this belief, they so ordered it, that these last came to Westminster upon the King's Safe-Conduct. But the Conference had not the desired Effect. It was wholly spent in mutual Reproaches, by which Men are not very apt to be softened.

Presently after the Interview, every one prepared for War (4). The Earl of Warwick commissioned Sir Robert Wells, Son of the Lord Wells, to levy Troops in Lincolnshire, which he performed with great ease, by reason of his Family's Interest in those Parts. Edward having notice of it, sent an express Order to the Lord Wells, to come immediately to Court. His design was to oblige him to use his Authority, to perswade his Son to forsake the Rebels. The Lord Wells being come to London, and hearing how much the King was incensed against his Son, in a dread of feeling himself the Effects of his Resentment, took Sanctuary in Westminster Abby. But the King sending him a Safe-Conduct, he immediately came to Court. He even writ to his Son, enjoining him to quit the Earl of Warwick's Party, and dismiss his Troops; but the Son refused to obey. Then Edward, inraged at not being able to succeed, ordered the Lord Wells to be beheaded, with Sir Thomas Dymock his Brother-in-law, who had accompanied him. Probably, he imagined them guilty of Connivance.

This violent Action was very injurious to Edward's reputation, and inspired young Wells with a desire of Revenge, which occasioned his own Ruin, and proved extremely prejudicial to the Earl of Warwick's Affairs. The King perceiving that Wells's Troops visibly increased, thought proper to fight him, before he was joined by the Duke of Clarence, and the Earl of Warwick, who were raising Men in other Counties. Wells was encamped near Stamford, where he might easily have retired; but the desire of revenging his Father's death, made him resolve to expect the King. He fought with an undaunted Courage as long as he was supported by his Troops. At last, finding Victory declared for the King, he would have provoked his Enemies to kill him, but they refused him that favour, and spared his Life only to make him lose it, a few Days after (5), on the Scaffold. In this Battle Edward obtained a compleat Victory over his Enemies, of whom ten thousand were slain (6).

1470. The King defeats young Wells, and beheads him. Hall. Hollingsh. Stow.

Sir Robert Wells's defeat broke all the Measures of the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick. They were not yet ready (7), and the King was now marching to attack them. In this Extremity they found no other remedy than to imbark, in order to screen themselves from the impending Danger (8). The Earl of Warwick took his two Daughters with him, the eldest of whom, Wife of the Duke of Clarence, was ready to lye-in. His Intent was to retire to his Government of Calais, where he had left for his Lieutenant Vauclair, a Gascon Captain, in whose Fidelity he entirely confided. But how great was his Surprize, when approaching Calais he saw the Cannon fired at him! He thought to move Vauclair by the consideration of the Duchess of Clarence's Case, who was just delivered in the Ship of a Prince, named Edward. But all he could obtain, was a Present of two Bottles of Wine for the Duchess. Mean while, Vauclair took care to send this small Present by a trusty Messenger, who told the Earl of Warwick from him, that he was still devoted to him, though forced to behave in this manner, the better to serve him, because if he entered the Town, he would not be safe; but he might depend upon his Fidelity. Edward, who knew not the Motive of Vauclair's Proceedings, was so pleased with his Conduct, that he gave him the Government of Calais, to which the Duke of Burgundy, of his own accord, added a yearly Pension of a thousand Crowns.

Warwick seeing himself thus repulsed, steered his Course to Dieppe, where he safely landed with the Duke of Clarence, and his two Daughters. A few Days after, they departed from thence to wait upon the King of France, then at Amboise, who received them very civilly. Lewis, as I before observed, would not concern himself with the Affairs of England, when Edward and Henry were contending for the Crown. But when he saw the strict Alliance between Edward and the Duke of Burgundy, he found it equally his Interest to labour the ruin of both. To this reason of State was added, the desire of revenging the Affront put upon him by Edward, on account of his Marriage. In short, the Assistance Edward would have given the Duke of Bretagne, evidently showed, so long as he was on the Throne, the French Princes would ever find in him a Protector. All these reasons together moved Lewis, not only to receive the fugitive English, but moreover to promise them a powerful Aid. For, nothing could be to him more agreeable, and withal, more advantagious, than to see the Civil War re-kindled in England. Nay, very probably, he had already taken, for that purpose, private measures with the Earl of Warwick, and the Earl would never have ventured to declare against Edward, had he not been secure of this Assistance. However that be, an opportunity naturally offering to create Edward, in his own Country, Troubles which would prevent his interposing in the Affairs of his Neighbours, he sent for Queen Margaret to Court (9), who, some Years since was retired to the King of Sicily her Father. It was the Earl of Warwick that had been Author of all that Princess's Misfortunes, and the Earl, on his part, looked upon her as his mortal Enemy. And yet, their common Interest requiring them to stifle their Animosity, Lewis very easily reconciled them. At present, they could hardly proceed without each other. Warwick perceived, he wanted a pretence to dethrone the King, and could find none more plausible than Henry's Resto-

On the other hand, the Queen ſaw this to be the only way to reſtore the King her Huſband, or rather herſelf, to the Throne. So, beholding a ray of hope from that quarter, ſhe readily received her old Enemy for Protector. Their Reconciliation therefore was made by the King of France's mediation, upon theſe Terms: That the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick ſhould endeavour to reſtore Henry to the Throne: That the Queen ſhould promiſe with an Oath to leave the Government of the Kingdom in their hands during the King's Life, and the Prince his Son's Minority, in caſe he came to the Crown before he was of age: Laſtly, To ſtrengthen their Union, the Prince of Wales ſhould marry the Earl of Warwick's youngeſt Daughter (1). The Duke of Burgundy, who had good Spies at the Court of France, being informed of theſe Tranſactions, gave Edward warning, who was very unconcerned. He could never believe, the Earl of Warwick, who was forced to quit the Kingdom for want of ſupport, would be powerful enough, in his abſence, to cauſe the People to riſe in his favour. As for the Preparations in France, they gave him no uneaſineſs, being ſenſible how difficult it is for a foreign Nation to conquer England, if the People themſelves don't aſſiſt. Thus, reaſoning upon very doubtful grounds, namely, the People's Affection, and the Earl of Warwick's little Credit, he neglected his principal Affair, to abandon himſelf to Voluptuouſneſs and Senſuality, to which he was extremely inclined.

Edward gains the Duke of Clarence. Commin. Hall. Biondi. Habington.

What gave him moſt Uneaſineſs was to ſee the Duke of Clarence his Brother ſtrictly united with his Enemies. This Union had already produced ill effects, and might in time produce worſe. He believed therefore, to make himſelf eaſy, he ought to endeavour to gain his Brother to his Intereſt. To that end he bribed one of the Ducheſs of Clarence's Women, and inſtructing her in the part ſhe was to act, granted her a Paſſport, to go to her Miſtreſs. This Woman departing for Paris, paſſed through Calais, where ſhe ſaw the Governor without telling him the Secret. It was very happy for Edward that Vauclair, who was in the Intereſts of the Earl of Warwick, was not acquainted with the Affair; for he would have entirely diſcovered all. When the Woman came to her Miſtreſs, ſhe very artfully and ſucceſsfully diſcharged her Commiſſion. She repreſented to the Duke of Clarence from the King his Brother, "That the Courſe he "was taking muſt end in his own Ruin: That ſuppoſing "the deſigns he had formed with the Earl of Warwick "ſhould ſucceed to his Wiſh, he could not expect, the "Houſe of Lancaſter would put any truſt in a Prince of "the Houſe of York, when there was no farther need of "him: That his very Life would be in danger: That "inſtead of relying on the Queen's Oath, he ought ra"ther to conſider it as a Snare to ſurpriſe him: That "the Earl of Warwick would be the firſt to oppreſs him, "as well to free himſelf from a Collegue in the Govern"ment, as to be rid of a Prince, who might one day "have it in his Power to revenge the Injuries done "to his Houſe: That on the other hand, the King "his Brother having only a young Daughter, whom "Death might eaſily ſnatch out of the world, he was "next Heir to the Crown: But if the Houſe of Lancaſ"ter was reſtored, he would loſe all hopes of mounting "the Throne, ſince Henry's Son very poſſibly would "have a numerous Iſſue." To theſe reaſons, which were very ſtrong, ſhe added Motives taken from the Ties of Blood, ſome Excuſes from the King, with a poſitive Promiſe to conſider him for the future as his real Brother and the chief ſupport of their Family. A Man muſt have wanted common ſenſe not to yield to ſuch convincing Arguments. The Duke of Clarence ſeeing at laſt his true Intereſts, charged the Woman to tell his Brother, he would not fail to declare for him, when he could do it with ſafety and probability of rendering him a conſiderable ſervice. Edward being informed how the Duke of Clarence ſtood affected, grew perfectly eaſy, believing the Earl of Warwick's future Attempts would be fruitleſs, when no longer ſeconded by the Duke his Son-in-law. It muſt be confeſſed, the Earl of Warwick's Policy was very extraordinary, in making the Duke of Clarence an Inſtrument to ruin the King his Brother. He muſt have ſuppoſed, the Duke would openly act againſt his own Intereſt, which was not to be expected from the moſt ſtupid of Men. And indeed, he was afterwards very ſenſible, when it was too late, that he had taken falſe meaſures. 1470.

Hall. Hollingſh.

Whilſt Edward lived in a deceitful ſecurity, the Earl of Warwick was preparing to return into England. He was ſure of finding a powerful Party, to which were joined all the Friends of the Houſe of Lancaſter, whom he had taken care to acquaint with his deſign. Lewis XI furniſhed him, though ſparingly, with Money and Troops. As far as can be judged, that Monarch's ſole Aim was to foment diſcord among the Engliſh, to prevent their interpoſing in his Affairs. He ſtill perſiſted in his deſign of ſubduing the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, in which he thought he could not ſucceed, ſo long as theſe two Princes might expect the Protection of England. Mean while, to facilitate the Earl of Warwick's deſcent, he ordered the Baſtard of Bourbon to convoy him with ſome Ships of War; but it was not eaſy to paſs into England. The Duke of Burgundy's Fleet, much ſtronger than that of France, waited in the Mouth of the Seine to ingage the French if they ſailed, and it was not likely, the Baſtard of Bourbon would venture upon ſo unequal a Fight. Notwithſtanding this, the Earl of Warwick repaired to Havre de Grace, to be ready to embrace any opportunity that ſhould offer. This precaution was not in vain. Some days after his Arrival, a violent Storm ſo diſperſed the Flemiſh Ships, that not being able to keep the Sea, they were forced to retire to their Ports. The Storm being over, the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick ſet ſail and arrived at Dartmouth (3), from whence they had paſſed into France four or five Months before.

The News of their landing was ſo far from alarming Edward, that he rejoiced at it. Poſſeſſed with the Notion that it was impoſſible for the Earl of Warwick to accompliſh his deſigns, he fancied he could wiſh for nothing more advantagious, than to ſee his Enemy come and deliver himſelf into his hands. Thus poſſeſſed, he deſired the Duke of Burgundy to continue his Fleet at Sea, to hinder the Earl of Warwick's eſcape. But the Duke of Burgundy thought otherwiſe of this Expedition. He could not believe ſo prudent a Perſon as the Earl of Warwick, would have thus ventured, if he had not been ſure of a Party in England capable of ſupporting him. And indeed Warwick had no ſooner landed his Men, but he ſaw himſelf at the head of an Army, which in a few days increaſed to ſixty thouſand. Immediately he cauſed Henry VI to be proclaimed, publiſhing an Order in his name, for all his Subjects from ſixteen to ſixty, to take arms and expel the Tyrant and Uſurper.

So unexpected an Event opened Edward's Eyes, and ſhowed him the Folly of his expectations. Mean time, he gave Orders to levy Troops, and appointed the Rendezvous about Nottingham (4). Some affirm, his Army was more numerous than the Earl of Warwick's. Others again ſay, it was much inferior, and this indeed is moſt probable (5). For, had Edward been ſuperior in number of Troops, he would moſt certainly have marched to his Enemies; whereas upon their approach he retired towards the Sea. The News he received, that the Marquiſs of Montague, who commanded in the North, had declared againſt him, troubled him exceedingly, apprehenſive as he was, that this defection would be followed by many others. He wanted to avoid a Battle, but knew not where to retire, becauſe he was ignorant who were his real Friends. At length, he encamped near Lynn, a little maritime Town in Lincolnſhire (6), and lodged in the Caſtle. This precaution, though perhaps taken without deſign, proved of great ſervice. The Earl of Warwick being come within three Miles of his Army, cauſed the cry of King Henry! King Henry! to be every where reſounded. And the ſame cry, by ſome unknown practices, began likewiſe to be heard in Edward's Camp. Whereupon he commanded the Caſtle Gates to be ſhut, and the Bridge to be ſtrongly guarded, whilſt a Council was held to conſider of what was to be done. But the Shoutings, which grew louder in his Army, not affording him time to deliberate, he ſaw no other remedy than to imbark with four or five hundred of the moſt truſty Men (7), on board three ſmall Veſſels which had ſerved to bring Proviſions for his Army. Edward being reduced to this sad condition, ordered his Ships to steer for Holland, not knowing where to retire, except into the Dominions of the Duke of Burgundy his Brother-in-law. Whilst he was beating the Seas, his Ships were descryed by eight Corsairs of the Low-Countries or Germany, whom the English called Easterlings, from their Country lying Eastward of England. Immediately these Corsairs gave chace to the three Ships, but as these were the more light, they had time to get into Alcmar Road at low-Water, which hindered the Corsairs from pursuing them any farther, because they durst not come so near the Shore. Mean while they anchored in sight, designing to attack them at high-Water. In this extremity, Edward had no other refuge than to make Signals to implore the protection of the Country. Happily for him, the Lord Gruthuyse, of whom I have before spoken, being then Governor of Holland, chanced to be at Alcmar. When he was told, these Ships desired assistance, he sent a Sloop to know what they were. As soon as he heard the King of England was there, he sent an order to the Corsairs not to approach, on pain of incurring the Duke his master's indignation. These people, though so near their prey, not durst disobey. They too often wanted the Governor's protection, to displease him. So, Gruthyse went himself in a Sloop to wait on the King, and paid him all the respect due to him. Edward not having money to reward the master of the vessel that brought him over, made him a present of a rich robe lined with Sables. After that he was conducted to the Hague, where Gruthuyse bore his Expences, till he had received the Duke of Burgundy's orders.

Mean while, the Queen, who was at London, hearing of the King's flight, took sanctuary in Westminster Abbey (2), where she was followed by a great number of Yorkists. There she was delivered (3) of a Prince called Edward, born Heir of a noble Kingdom, at the very time it was lost by his Father (4). Whilst Edward's friends were in the utmost consternation, the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick, victorious without drawing their Swords, were marching to London, where they entered in triumph the beginning of October. On the 6th of the same month (5) the Earl of Warwick, attended by several Lords and a great crowd of people, went to the Tower and freed King Henry, who had been Prisoner six Years.

Whilst these things were transacting, the populace of Kent flocking together marched directly to London, with design to inrich themselves with the plunder of the City. But the Earl of Warwick meeting them with part of his Troops, easily repulsed this multitude, and ordered the most mutinous to be executed. He could not however prevent their plundering Southwark, parted from the City by the Thames.

Sedition in Kent. Hall. Hollingsh.

The Tumult being appeased, Henry was solemnly proclaimed, as remounting the Throne. Next day there was a Procession, at which the new King, assisted with his Crown on his head (6), and followed by an innumerable crowd of people, who by their Acclamations shewed their Approbation of the late Revolution. Thus the Earl of Warwick had the Honour of restoring Henry to the Throne, after having deposed him, and of pulling down Edward, who had been raised entirely by his means. Wherefore, he was commonly called, The King-Maker.

Montague is made President of the North. Act. Pub. XI. p. 665. Hall.

THE new King's first care, or rather the Earl of Warwick's, who governed in his name, was to restore the Marques of Montague to the Government of the northern Counties, which Edward had taken from him, and given to the Duke of Glouceſter his Brother. Then, a Parliament was called for the 26th of November, to confirm the new Revolution.

Remark upon the Parliaments.

This was a necessary Formality to satisfy the people, though the Parliament's Confirmation was of no great weight in an Affair transacted without it, and in which it could make no alteration. The same thing happened when Edward mounted the Throne. The contrary Resolutions of the Parliaments, in regard to the Quarrel between the Houses of Lancaster and York, clearly shew, these Assemblies acted not with freedom, but were swayed by the Events which happened before their deliberations. It is in vain therefore to urge the Authority of the Parliaments in support of the Rights of either House. Their Determinations are properly of no force, since they had not the liberty to judge according to their Undestanding; unless it is said, their Understanding directed them always to side with the strongest.

Edward declared a Traitor and Usurper.

An extraordinary Act to settle the Succession. Hall. Hollingsh.

Be this as it will, the Parliament voted Edward a Traitor and Usurper of the Crown, confiscated all his paternal Estate, and annulled all the Statutes made in his Reign, as wanting a lawful Authority.

By another Act, the Crown was confirmed upon Henry VI, and his Male-Heirs. But in default of such Heirs, the Crown was to descend to the House of York, that is, to the Duke of Clarence and his Heirs; Edward, eldest Son of the late Duke of York, being excluded for his Rebellion. Here would be a large field to expatiate upon the unlimited Authority of the Parliaments, if the Statute had been made with freedom, and after mature deliberation. But it is easy to see the little Freedom there was in this Parliament, if it is considered, this Act was only a bare Confirmation of the Earl of Warwick's Engagements. Moreover, out of pure condescension for the Earl, or rather by his direction, and contrary to the Laws and Customs of the Realm, it was not scrupled to deprive the Daughters of the House of Lancaster, of a Right enjoyed by the Princesses of the Royal Family, ever since the Norman Conquest. Thus, by a hasty Resolution, was established in England a kind of Salic Law, which the English had so much censured and derided, when Edward III, and Philip de Valois were contending for the Crown of France. This same Parliament restored to all their Honours and Rights, Jasper Tudor Earl of Pembroke, Half-Brother to Henry, and John Earl of Oxford, who were attainted under Edward.

Moreover, in consequence of Queen Margaret's Engagements at Amboise, the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick were declared and appointed Governors of the Kingdom. By this, the Parliament manifestly supposed Henry's Inability, who indeed was considered only as the Shadow of a King. A Pardon was likewise granted to the Marques of Montague, for his crime in serving Edward; since by deserting him at so critical a time, he was the principal Cause of his Flight. But this was not all. To give the Earl of Warwick a plausible pretence to be revenged on his private Enemies, all that had born arms in defence of Edward's pretended Right, were declared Traytors and Rebels (7). By virtue of this Act, John Tiptoft Earl of Worcester, Governor of Ireland, and High-Constable of England, having been found hid in a hollow Tree (8), was brought to London and beheaded (9). By these Acts of private revenge, the Nobles of the opposite Party were forced, as one may Shortly after the breaking up of the Parliament, the Earl of Pembroke went for Henry Earl of Richmond his Nephew, who had concealed himself in Wales (1), and brought him to the King. It is pretended, Henry stedfastly fixing his Eyes upon that young Prince, foretold, he should one Day mount the Throne, and put an end to the Quarrel of the two Houses. But I do not know whether this fact be so well proved, as some Historians affirm. There seems to be reason to presume, it was invented in the Reign of Henry VII, whilst the Canonization of Henry VI was solliciting at Rome. For, the chief cause of the Pope's opposition, was, that though he was willing to own Henry VI for a good Man, he could not see in his Life any proof of an eminent Sanctity. So, this pretended Prophecy, if it had been well attested, would have been very proper to remove the Objection.

The Duke of Burgundy's Trouble about Edward. Commin. Hall.

I left Edward at the Hague in a very melancholy State, deprived of his Kingdom, and living at the expence of the Lord Gruthuyse, till the Duke of Burgundy was informed of his case. The news of the King his Brother-in-law's arrival in his Dominions, was by no means pleasing to the Duke. Philip de Commines affirms, he would have been less uneasy at the news of his Death. For, in that case, he would have had but one course to take; namely, to approve of Henry's Restoration. But Edward being alive and in Holland, could not but throw him into great perplexity. He had made an Alliance with him not out of Affection, but solely for reasons of State. He had sacrificed to his Interest his Aversion for the House of York; an Aversion wherein he had been educated by Mother, Daughter of a Princess of the House of Lancaster. Mean while, he was reduced to the sad Necessity either of deserting his Brother-in-law, who was come for refuge into his Dominions, or of exposing himself, in protecting him, to the danger of drawing upon him the united Forces of France and England. On the other hand, the Dukes of Exeter and Somerset, who made a different sort of figure at his Court from what they did before this Revolution, earnestly pressed him to abandon Edward, and threatned him, in case of Refusal, with the Indignation of England. Moreover, the Earl of Warwick had now sent to Calais a Body of Troops, which only waited for orders to join the French, and invade some Province of the Low-Countries. Vauclair had not only received these Tooops into the Town, but by many other Steps had shewn, that he was far from being unfaithful to
L. 3. c. 6. the Earl of Warwick. Philip de Commines relates, that the Duke his Master having sent him to Calais, for a Confirmation of the Truce of Commerce between that Place and the Low-Countries, found the Governor, Garrison, and Townsmen entirely for Henry (3). He adds, that he saw no other way to succeed in his Negotiation than to tell the Inhabitants of Calais, that the Truce being made with England, and not with Edward's Person (4), the change of King was not a sufficient motive to break it. By that, he intimated his Master disliked not the Revolution.

Posture of the Duke of Burgundy's Affairs.

It is certain, it greatly concerned that Prince to keep fair with the English. But the better to understand his embarassment caused by Edward's retreat into his Dominions, it will be necessary to know the Situation of his Affairs. By the Treaty, Lewis XI signed at Peronne, he promised to give in Appennage to the Duke of Berry his Brother, Champagne and Brie in lieu of Normandy, which he had taken from him. He was not a little embarrassed by this Ingagement. He plainly perceived, the Duke of Burgundy's Aim was to have Prince Charles for neighbour, to be able by his means to stir up Commotions in France whenever he pleased. But for the same reason he himself wanted to keep his Brother at a distance from the Duke. For that purpose, he tried to persuade the Duke of Berry to accept of Guienne and Rochelle, instead of Champagne, and, to succeed in this Project, bribed all those who had any influence upon him. The Duke of Burgundy being informed of this design, opposed it to the utmost of his power, by representing to the Duke of Berry, how much that Exchange would be to his prejudice. But perceiving these Reasons to be ineffectual, he insinuated to him, by private Emissaries, that, if he demanded his only Daughter in Marriage, he would certainly obtain her, and might, to prevent his Brother's Opposition, retire into England till the Marriage was concluded. This Negotiation had been carried so far, that Edward, at the Duke of Burgundy's Instance, had ordered a Safe-Conduct to be dispatched for that Prince. But these measures were broken, because the Duke of Berry, persuaded by his treacherous Counsellors, determined at last to accept of the Exchange offered by the King his Brother. 1470. Act. Pub. XI. p. 644.

Upon this the Duke of Burgundy listened but coldly to the proposal of the Marriage, which could no longer be subservient to his Designs. Mean while, the Duke of Bretagne and the Constable de St. Pol, who were deeply concerned in the Negotiation (5), were extremely desirous of its Success. As they loved not the King, they considered, this Marriage would be an infallible means to keep up, between the two Brothers, a Dissension from which they hoped to reap great Advantages. There was nothing wanting but the Duke of Burgundy's Consent, and as they saw he had no Inclination, they undertook to obtain it by an extraordinary method. They pretended to be dissatisfied with the Duke, and advised the King of France to make War upon him, promising to assist him to the utmost of their power. Their Aim was to offer the Duke, when he should come to be pressed, to espouse his Quarrel, on condition he would give his Daughter to the Duke of Guienne. Lewis XI desired nothing more than to see the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne at variance. Besides, he most passionately wished to take from the Duke of Burgundy, the Towns upon the Somme, delivered to him by the Treaty of Conflans. He would not however have attempted to make war upon him, for fear the Duke of Bretagne and the Constable should have raised Disturbances in the Kingdom, whilst he was elsewhere employed. But when he thought himself safe from that quarter, he immediately resolved upon the War, as having no Intelligence of their Plot. Before he declared himself, he sent private Emissaries to the Towns he wanted to recover, to win the principal Burghers to his Interest. It must be observed, that the Duke of Burgundy kept but slender Garrisons in his Towns, and upon the Peace, disbanded his Troops to ease his Subjects. Commin. Commin. Argentre.

Lewis having laid all his Plots, assembled the Estates at Tours in March 1470, where, upon frivolous Complaints brought by the Earl of Eu against the Duke of Burgundy, he was summoned before the Court of Peers, and the Citation was sent by a Summoner of the Parliament. The Duke not appearing, War was proclaimed against him, and St. Quentin taken, where the Constable de St. Pol entered without opposition. Amiens opened her Gates to the King by the like Practices, and the Duke was also very near losing Abbeville. Lewis XI. declares War against Burgundy. Mezerai.

Such was the Situation of the Duke of Burgundy's Affairs, when Edward came for refuge into his Country. He saw himself unexpectedly attacked by the King of France, and presently after the Earl of Warwick sent (6) four thousand Men to Calais to join the French, or make a Diversion. So, the Duke could do nothing more prejudicial to his Interest, than exasperate the Earl of Warwick by protecting Edward. It is not therefore strange, if Edward endured some mortifications during his retreat. It was necessary for the Duke of Burgundy's interest, that it should be thought in England, he was sorry to see him, and had no inclination to protect him. But in private, he promised to give him assistance as soon as he could do it with safety. The Duke is afraid of incensing the Earl of Warwick. Commin.

This policy did not serve Edward's turn. He could have wished, the Duke of Burgundy would have openly declared for him, imagining such a declaration would have greatly conduced to the support of his party in England. At last, finding the Duke remained firm to his resolution, and his Duchess's sollicitations made no impression upon him, he demanded a private Audience. As the Duke could not refuse it, he represented to him, "That a "longer delay was extremely prejudicial to him: That "he lost his friends and creatures in England, whilst the "Earl of Warwick was daily strengthning himself in his "usurped power: That therefore there was no medium be-"tween assisting him speedily, and abandoning him to his "ill-fortune. The Duke of Burgundy reſolves to aſſiſt Edward. Commin. Hollingſh.

The Duke of Burgundy was moved with this diſcourſe. He perceived, that in effect there was no medium in the alternative propoſed to him by Edward. Above all, he ſeriouſly conſidered what that Prince had ſaid in the laſt place, that he could not hope to repulſe the attacks of the King of France, without the aſſiſtance of England, which could be expected only by Edward's reſtoration. That on the contrary, by deſerting him, he would run the risk of ſeeing France and England unite all their forces againſt him. But on the other hand, he conſidered, he could give Edward but a very ſmall aid, conſidering the preſent poſture of his own affairs. That it was to be feared this attempt happening to miſcarry, he ſhould furniſh the Earl of Warwick with a plauſible pretence to attack him. In this perplexity, he deviſed an expedient, whereby he imagined he could at once ſalve the appearances with Warwick, and give ſome ſmall aſſiſtance to the fugitive King. He equipped four large Ships at Vere, a free Port in Zealand, in other Perſons names, who were furniſhed with Money. Moreover, he privately hired fourteen Ships of the Eaſterlings, to convoy the King into England, and to keep upon the Coaſt a fortnight after his landing, to conduct him back in caſe of neceſſity. Then, giving Edward a good ſum of money (1), he left him in Holland, and went himſelf into Flanders. When all theſe Ships were ready, Edward diſappearing, notice was ſent to the Duke, who immediately ordered Proclamation to be made, that none of his Subjects ſhould aſſiſt him directly or indirectly upon pain of Death. It is likely, if Edward's attempt had miſcarried, the Earl of Warwick would not have been deceived by this Artifice.

Warwick has ſome Intimations of Edward's Deſign. Act. Pub. XI. p. 676.

Whatever care was taken by Edward and the Duke of Burgundy to conceal their deſigns, the Earl of Warwick had received ſome intelligence of them. It was too much for his intereſt to have good Spies in Holland, to neglect ſo neceſſary a precaution. It appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that on the 21ſt of December the Marqueſs of Montague had orders to levy Troops in the North, on pretence of a Rebellion (2), not mentioned by the Hiſtorians. Probably, it was only a farther precaution taken by the Earl of Warwick, upon ſome general advices of a Plot forming in Holland.

The advices from Holland being ſomething more certain than hitherto, the Duke of Clarence, who was by no means ſuſpected of holding intelligence with his Brother, was commiſſioned to raiſe an army to oppoſe his deſigns in caſe he ſhould return into the Kingdom.

Truce between England and France. p. 667, 681. 683.

Theſe meaſures being taken, the Earl of Warwick made haſte to conclude with Lewis XI an alliance, projected ſome time before. But as it was difficult, to make an alliance with a Prince actually in War with England, and as a Peace could not be concluded by reaſon of Henry's pretenſions to the Crown of France, a long Truce was reſolved upon, almoſt equivalent to a Peace. In the Treaty upon this occaſion, it was agreed the Truce ſhould laſt till one of the two parties deſired to break it, in which caſe he was to give the other five years notice, and the Truce was to continue ten years without being revocable (3). It was farther agreed, that a place ſhould be appointed to treat of a final Peace. Lewis XI, was pleaſed, I know not for what reaſon, that the Duke of Guienne his Brother ſhould be particularly included in the Truce.

Mean while, Edward having finiſhed all his preparations, ſailed from the Port of Vere about the middle of March (4), bringing with him two thouſand Men. He diſimbarked at Ravenſpur (5), where Henry IV had formerly landed when he came to wreſt the Crown from Richard II. He expected to be received with acclamations; but, contrary to his expectation, found the Inhabitants of thoſe parts extremely diſpleaſed with his coming. Some were well affected to the Houſe of Lancaſter: Others, ſeeing Edward ſo thinly attended, were afraid to venture openly to eſpouſe his cauſe. Mean while, as there were no regular Troops, he met with no oppoſition. But that was not all he deſired. He would have been glad to be met by the People and ſee his army increaſe. This diſappointment obliging him to march with circumſpection, he cauſed it to be rumoured, that he was come only as Duke of York to claim the private inheritance of his family, which had been confiſcated (6). Henry IV had formerly uſed the ſame artifice, but more juſtly, ſince he was baniſhed without legal Cauſe. But if Edward had no Right to the Crown, as he ſeemed to own, he muſt have been guilty of Uſurpation, and conſequently could not with juſtice complain that his Eſtate was confiſcated. The reaſon why he did not carry his pretenſions any farther, upon his arrival in the Kingdom, ſeems to be this: He was ſtrongly perſuaded, that the people in general were much more inclined to him than to his Rival, but that the Magiſtrates were againſt him. Indeed, as ſoon as the Earl of Warwick had the Government in his hands, after Henry's Reſtoration, his firſt care was to fill all the offices with his creatures. It was therefore convenient, that Edward ſhould furniſh the People with a pretence to favour him, how ſlight ſoever it might be, thereby to oppoſe the authority of the Magiſtrates, who would have had too great an advantage, could they have affirmed, he was come in arms to dethrone the reigning King. Whereas by demanding only his private patrimony, he moved the People's compaſſion, and inſpired them with hopes that the quarrel between the two Houſes might at length be ended, by reſtoring his Inheritance. Be this as it will, Edward, though little pleaſed with the People's coldneſs, marched towards York, giving Henry every where the title of King, and ſtiling himſelf only Duke (7).

The apparent Reaſon of it.

Edward, upon his approach to York, is deſired to take another Rout. He anſwers with great Moderation. Hall. Hollingſh.

Mean while, Edward approaching York (2), two of the Aldermen came and intreated him, in the name of the Magiſtrates, to march another way; repreſenting, that they could not receive into their City, a Prince that was come to take the Crown from their lawful King. Edward, purſuant to the Plan he had formed, replied, "That "he was not come to take the Crown from the King: "That ſince the people had declared for Henry, he ac- "knowleged him for his Sovereign, and had no inten- "tion to do him any prejudice: That he was come to "requeſt the King for the reſtitution of his eſtate, not "with an army to uſe force, but only with a few fol- "lowers, to ſecure him from the malice of his enemies: "That the Parliament ſhould be the Judge of his cauſe, "and deſired only to have means to paſs his days quietly, "in the allegiance becoming a good ſubject: That how- "ever, the inhabitants of York ſhould of all others be the "laſt to deny him admittance, ſince his Lands in the "County, as well as his Title of Duke of York rendered "him their Countryman. In fine he prayed them to "remember the favors which, on ſeveral occaſions, the "City had received from his Family."

The People oblige the Magiſtrates to admit him. Hall. Hollingſh.

The Aldermen returned with this anſwer, which was not ſufficient to ſatisfy the Magiſtrates, devoted as they were to the Earl of Warwick; but Edward's Adherents in the City, perſuading the People, that it would be very cruel to refuſe the gates to a Prince, who, ſubmitting himſelf to the King and Parliament, was only come to demand his Inheritance, there was ſuch a Commotion, that the Magiſtrates were not able to appeaſe it. All they could obtain of the People was, that Deputies ſhould be ſent to Edward to make Terms with him, in order to preſerve, as far as poſſible, the Rights of the King, and ſave the City from plunder. The Deputies found Edward ready to promiſe whatever they deſired. He proteſted he was ſincere, and promiſed he would do no damage to the City, and always remain the King's faithful Subject. Whereupon the gates were opened to him, and entering the City, he went to the Cathedral, and confirmed his engagements with a ſolemn Oath. Every thing being thus tranſacted, on his part, with great mildneſs and moderation, he borrowed ſome Money of the Citizens, and leaving a Garriſon, departed, in order for London. During his ſhort ſtay at York, his Army was greatly increaſed. He would not however have ventured to march towards London, had he not expected, it would continue to increaſe in his rout, and the Duke of Clarence perform his promiſe (3).

Clarence and Warwick command each an Army. Act. Pub. XI. p. 706.

In the mean time, the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick were parted in order to aſſemble their Forces. Their deſign was afterwards to join their Troops into one Body, and ſet at their head the Prince of Wales, Son of Henry, who was expected from France. The Earl of Warwick thought, he had ſufficient time to prepare and join the Duke of Clarence, becauſe he did not doubt that his Brother Montague would be ſtrong enough to ſtop Edward. But contrary to his Expectation, he heard that Montague had ſuffered him to paſs without oppoſition; and that his Army continually increaſed upon his rout with great numbers of Officers and Soldiers, that came to him from all Parts of the Kingdom. He was extremely ſurprized with this News, and could not tell what to think of Montague, who behaved ſo remiſsly in an affair of ſuch Importance. He diſſembled however, and after ſending him expreſs Orders to come and join him, and deſiring the Duke of Clarence to advance with all poſſible diligence, reſolved to encamp near Coventry, and there expect Edward. His deſign was to follow him in caſe he had the boldneſs to come between him and the Duke of Clarence, or amuſe him in thoſe parts till his two other Bodies were arrived. Indeed, Montague began his march to join his Brother, and the Duke of Clarence likewiſe advancing, kept within diſtance, as if he intended the ſame thing.

1471. The Duke prepares to join him.

Mean while, Edward, who was now about Coventry (4), approached the Earl of Warwick's Intrenchments, with a ſhew of attacking them. The Earl finding himſelf weak, ſent frequent Expreſſes to the Duke of Clarence, to deſire him to advance with all poſſible expedition. But the Duke ſtill found ſome excuſe to defer the Junction. Whilſt the two Armies were thus in ſight, and ready, in all appearance, to ingage, the Duke of Glouceſter, with a ſmall Train, rode forth from the Camp of Edward his Brother, and without demanding a Safe-Conduct, went directly to the Duke of Clarence. At their firſt meeting the two Brothers tenderly embraced one another. Then, after a ſhort Conference, the Duke of Clarence having gained the principal Officers, cauſed Edward to be proclaimed in his army. The ſame day Edward headed his own Troops, and joined the Duke of Clarence with all the marks of a mutual Friendſhip.

The Duke offers his Mediation to the Earl who rejects it. Hall. Hollingſh.

This was a ſtunning Blow to the Earl of Warwick, who little expected it. However, in ſpite of this misfortune, which would have diſcouraged any other Man, he could not reſolve to hearken to any propoſals of agreement, though the Duke of Clarence offered him his mediation. But ſuch a mediator, who had ſo openly betrayed him, could not but be ſuſpected by him. As his army would be ſoon reinforced by Montague's Troops, and he was ſtrongly intrenched, he did not think proper, too haſtily to treat of an accommodation, which muſt have been very diſadvantagious to him. Beſides, he hoped that London, where he had left the Duke of Somerſet (5), and the Archbiſhop of York (6), would ſhut her gates againſt Edward, if he appeared before the City. In that caſe, he was reſolved to follow him, immediately after Montague's arrival, and force him, either to retire elſewhere, or join battle at the gates of the Capital, with a manifeſt diſadvantage. But theſe meaſures proved not very juſt.

Edward marches towards London. Hall. Hollingſh.

Preſently after the junction of the two Brothers, it was debated, whether they ſhould attack the Earl of Warwick in his Intrenchments, or march directly to London; and the laſt was deemed moſt convenient. Firſt, becauſe Edward having many friends in the City, it was likely, that ſeeing him approach with a powerful army, they would uſe their endeavours to procure him admittance, and the Earl of Warwick's diſtance would greatly facilitate their attempt. Secondly, nothing could be more for Edward's advantage than to have London on his ſide. He wanted Money, and could not eaſily find it elſewhere. Moreover he could not abſolutely rely upon his Reſtoration, ſo long as he was not maſter of the Metropolis. Laſtly, it was of the utmoſt importance to have Henry in his power. He began therefore his march to London (7), leaving the Earl of Warwick behind him, not without danger of being reduced to great ſtraits, in caſe the Londoners refuſed to receive him.

The Londoners are determined to receive Edward. Hall. Hollingſh.

When the news reached London, that the two Brothers were joined, and approaching the City, the Earl of Warwick was given over for loſt. This belief inſpired the People with a terror which Edward's Friends carefully cheriſhed, by aggravating the City's danger of being expoſed to Edward's Indignation, unleſs it was averted by a ſpeedy ſubmiſſion. At the ſame time, they, that after Edward's flight had taken Sanctuary in Weſtminſter-Abbey, came out and ſupported that Prince's Intereſt. On the other hand, thoſe that were againſt him durſt hardly open their mouth, for fear their endeavours ſhould turn to their ruin. So, without waiting the Reſolution of the Magiſtrates, the People were ready to open the gates to Edward, and run out to meet him (8). In vain did the Duke of Somerſet and the Archbiſhop of York oppoſe this reſolution; they were not heard. In vain did they promiſe the People, that the Earl of Warwick would come to their relief in three days: Edward's army, which was now at the gates of the City, wrought a contrary effect. In fine, Edward's Party prevailing, the People went out in crowds to receive him with acclamations, which, whether real or feigned, were to him of great ſervice. Whilſt

Edward enters the City. Hall. Hollingsh. Edward entered London the 11th of April, and immediately thanked the People for their Affection, and promised to have it in everlasting remembrance. He seconded this promise with several acts of Clemency, which entirely won him the hearts of the Citizens. Mean while, Henry, who had not found means to escape, nor perhaps so much as thought of it (1), was again imprisoned in the Tower, from whence he had been taken seven months before to re-mount the Throne. 1471.

Continuation of the Reign of EDWARD IV.

Edward goes out to meet Warwick.

EDWARD had not time to make a long stay at London. Two days after his arrival, he departed to put himself at the head of his Army, hearing the Earl of Warwick was advanced to St. Albans. Undoubtedly the Earl was extremely embarrassed. He had decamped from Coventry, and marched with great diligence, in expectation that the City of London would keep Edward at least a few days before the Walls, and the news of his approach hinder the Inhabitants from receiving him. But he saw the Metropolis lost, King Henry in prison, and the whole Kingdom, as it were, ready to declare for his Enemy. In this extremity there was no other refuge, but to fight and vanquish Edward. A Victory was the only means of restoring his Affairs. But on the other hand, though he had a good Army, it was far from being so strong as Edward's, which too continually increased, since his being master of London. Besides, the Conduct of the Marquis of Montague his Brother was so mysterious, he could not tell what to think of it. He remembred he entered with reluctance into the Project of dethroning Edward, and had lately twice neglected to fight him, upon occasions where all hazards were to be run. It is true, he was come to join him, but this farther increased his suspicions. The Duke of Clarence his Son-in-law's example, made him apprehensive, his own Brother was corrupted. In this state of fear and uncertainty, he would willingly have dismissed him, if he had not been afraid of discouraging his army. In short, after many reflections upon the posture of his affairs, flight being difficult and dishonourable, and the success of the Battle yet uncertain, he concluded, his only way was to venture a Battle, and die honorably, if Victory declared for his enemy. But withal, he resolved so to order it, that the Marquis his Brother should run the same fortune with him, since it was the event only that could assure him of his fidelity. In this resolution, he marched from St. Albans, and advancing to Barnet, which is but ten miles from London, met Edward, who was likewise advancing to fight. There, upon the 14th of April, being Easter-Day, a terrible Battle was fought, which decided the fate of the two Competitors. Edward had brought Henry with him, not daring to commit him to any one's custody. Thus, that unfortunate Prince seemed born only to be the sport of fortune. Happy in being, by his natural weakness of mind, less sensible of his misfortunes than any other would have been (2).

Warwick resolves to fight. Hall.

The Battle of Barnet. Warwick and Montague defeated and slain. Hall. Hollingsh. Stow.

The Battle began early in the morning, and lasted till Noon. Never perhaps had two Armies been seen to fight with more bravery and obstinacy. Every one considering himself as a Rebel in case the Enemy was victorious, no favour was expected. The barbarity usually practised in civil Wars was well known, and more especially in this, where sundry revolutions in favour of both parties, had carried animosity to the highest degree. This probably was the true cause of the continuance of the Battle. The Earl of Warwick's Troops, though inferior in number (3), fought desperately, being determined, by the example of their General, either to conquer or die. They had even reason to hope, for some time, that victory was going to declare in their favour. Some Squadrons detached by the Earl of Warwick from the third line, gained so much ground upon their Enemies, that several posted to London with the news of their defeat. But Edward not losing the presence of Mind so necessary to a General on such perilous occasions, ordered a body of reserve to advance, who falling upon the victorious Enemies in the Flank, put them in extreme disorder. The small number of the Earl of Warwick's Troops suffered him not to make a detachment to oppose to that body. At the same time, the Earl of Oxford, who had beat back Edward's Troops, considering he had left the line where he was posted, too much exposed, wheeled about, to return to his Post. This precaution, though prudent, occasioned the Earl of Warwick's Defeat. The Earl of Oxford's Badge upon his arms and colours was a Star with Streams, and Edward's device was a Sun. A small Mist, which arose during the Battle, hindering the Earl of Warwick's Troops from discerning the difference, they furiously charged these Squadrons as they were returning to their Post, and put them to rout before the Earl of Oxford had time to remove their mistake. This bred an extreme confusion in the Army. Some imagining they were betrayed, because attacked by their own men, ran away to the Enemies. Others seeing them fly that way, thought themselves attacked in the rear, and knew not what course to take. Mean while, Edward improving this mistake, cut in pieces the Troops that were flying towards him. The Earl of Warwick perceiving the disorder, did his utmost to remedy it, but it was to no purpose. At last, willing to animate his Troops by his example, he rushed, tho' on foot, among the thickest of his Enemies, where he quickly fell, covered with wounds. The Marquis of Montague his Brother, desirous to rescue him, perished in the attempt a few moments after him. Thus ended the Battle about Noon, by the entire defeat of Warwick's Army, ten thousand whereof were slain on the spot (4). It is said, Edward, who in all the other Battles was wont to publish before the fight, that the common Soldiers should be spared, and the Officers put to the sword, had ordered now that no quarter should be given. The Earl of Oxford and the Duke of Somerset fled into Wales, to the Earl of Pembroke, who was levying Troops for the Earl of Warwick. The Duke of Exeter was left for dead among the slain, but coming to life again, he crawled to the next house, from whence he found means to be carried to London, where he took sanctuary in Westminster Abbey.

Edward having thus obtained a complete victory which seemed to secure him the Crown, returned to London (6), where he was triumphantly received. The Inhabitants could not sufficiently express their Joy, to see themselves freed from the danger to which they would have been exposed, had the Earl of Warwick been conqueror. The King's first care was to return God thanks for the victory at St. Paul's Church; after which, he ordered the unfortunate Henry to be sent to his old prison. A few days after, he granted a Pardon to the Archbishop of York, probably not to incense the Clergy by the punishment of one of their principal Members. Queen Margaret arrives with the Prince. Hall. Hollingſh. Whilſt theſe things paſſed, Queen Margaret who was juſt arrived from France in Dorſetſhire (1), ſaw herſelf in a ſtate worthy of pity. She had ſcarce time to refreſh herſelf two Days, when ſhe received the fatal news of the deſeat and death of the Earl of Warwick. Though ſhe had hitherto bravely withſtood all the attacks of fortune, ſhe was ſo affected with this new diſgrace, that ſhe fell into a Swoon, out of which ſhe recovered with great difficulty. She ſaw in an inſtant all the conſequences, and perceiving no refuge, ſhe gave way to her Grief, and loſt upon this occaſion that wonderful Firmneſs, by which ſhe had ever been ſo glorioufly diſtinguiſhed. Thus yielding to her unhappy Lot, and thinking only of ſaving the Prince her Son, ſhe took Sanctuary in the Abbey of Beaulieu in Hampſhire. She was ſtill in the mortal agonies, cauſed by this fatal Accident, when ſhe ſaw arrive the Duke of Somerſet, John Beaufort his Brother, the Earls of Pembroke and Devonſhire, and the Lord Wenlock. The two laſt had been for Edward, and unhappily for them had deſerted him. The Queen had alſo with her the Grand Prior of St. John's, ſent into France to conduct her to England. All theſe Lords, with ſeveral other Officers of diſtinction, ſtrove to comfort her and revive her hopes. They repreſented to her, "That ſhe had no reaſon yet to deſpair; That "indeed Edward was victorious, but might be vanquiſhed "again; That the Kingdom ſtill abounding with friends "to King Henry, it was not ſo difficult as ſhe imagin-"ed to form a new Army capable of ſtopping the Uſur-"per's progreſs: That as the gaining of one battle had "reſtored him to the Throne, ſo the loſs of another "might caſt him down: That the ſundry revolu-"tions for and againſt the two Houſes, ſince the quar-"rel began, ought to teach her, that there was ſtill hope, "provided ſhe would not by an unſeaſonable fear relin-"quiſh her own intereſts, with thoſe of the King her Huſ-"band and the Prince her Son: That her Armies had "been frequently victorious under her conduct, and it was "by no means impoſſible that victory ſhould once more "incline to her ſide. Laſtly, That all the world con-"ſidered the Prince of Wales as undoubted Heir of the "Crown, and by ſetting him at the head of the Ar-"my, there was ſtill room to expect a happy revolu-"tion."

She ſwoons at the news of the Defeat, and takes Sanctuary. Hall. Hollingſh.

Her Friends come to her, and exhort her to try her Fortune once more.

She would put her Son out of danger. Hall. Hollingſh. If Margaret was afraid to expoſe herſelf once more to the viciſſitude of fortune, it was not upon her own account. The Prince her Son was the cauſe of all her uneaſineſs. Her tenderneſs for him made her ſee all the fatal conſequences of the undertaking propoſed to her, in caſe it was not crowned with ſucceſs. She plainly perceived, he could not attempt to recover the Crown of his Anceſtors, without hazarding at the ſame time his own life, and that conſideration was ſo grievous to her, as to hinder her coming to any reſolution. In this perplexity, ſhe propoſed ſending the Prince into France, that in caſe the enterprize ſucceeded, he might reap the benefit, and if it miſcarried, might at leaſt be in ſafety. But the Duke of Somerſet repreſented to her, that it was chiefly upon the Preſence of the Prince that her hopes could be founded, which alone would be capable of drawing multitudes into his ſervice, and induce the Troops to fight valiantly for him. At length the Queen, after enduring a violent conflict in her Soul, between the fear of loſing her Son, and the deſire of procuring him a Crown which ſhe believed his lawful right, conſented to follow the advice of her friends.

The Duke of Somerſet is againſt it.

She yields to him.

The Speed wherewith the Lancaſtrians levy a freſh Army. This reſolution being taken, it was agreed, that the Queen and Prince ſhould retire to Bath, and the reſt go and aſſemble their friends, with the remains of the Earl of Warwick's Army (2). The Earl of Pembroke undertook to levy an Army in Wales, where his intereſt was great, and immediately departed, only deſiring the Duke of Somerſet, who was to command in chief under the Prince of Wales, to run no hazard till joined by the Welſh. The ſuddenneſs wherewith all theſe Lords levied or aſſembled their Troops, would be moſt ſurpriſing, if in the firſt place, the aſtoniſhing effects uſually produced by hatred and revenge, eſpecially in civil Wars, were not conſidered. Secondly, it muſt be remembered, that the remains of the Earl of Warwick's Army having diſperſed themſelves after the Battle of Barnet, wanted only a Leader to head them. Laſtly, as it was but a few days ſince the Battle, it was not yet known how the Conqueror would behave to the vanquiſhed. So moſt having greater reaſon to expect ſeverity than mercy, choſe rather to venture again their Lives in a Battle, than run the risk of dying on the Gibbet and Scaffold. Be this as it will, it appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that the 27th of April, thirteen days after the Battle of Barnet, the Lancaſtrian Lords had now re-aſſembled an Army. 1471.

Proclamation againſt the Queen. Act. Pub. XI. p. 709. Upon the ſame day, as appears by the date, Edward iſſued out a Proclamation, ſetting forth, that his title to the Crown was unqueſtionable: Firſt, by Reaſon: Secondly, by Authority of Parliament: Thirdly, by his Victories, and particularly the laſt, where the Marquis of Montague and the Earl of Warwick were ſlain. That notwithſtanding theſe three moſt firm Foundations, namely, Reaſon, parliamentary Authority, and Victory, ſundry Perſons had taken Arms againſt him: But to avoid the effuſion of more blood, he had thought proper to give his People a liſt of the names of thoſe Perſons who were pronounced Traitors and Rebels, that their incouragers might not complain if any miſchief befel them. The Perſons proſcribed were, Margaret, ſtiling herſelf Queen of England, Edward her Son, the Duke of Exeter, the Duke of Somerſet, John Earl of Oxford, John Courtney Earl of Devonſhire, William Viſcount de Beaumont, John Beaufort Brother to the Duke of Somerſet, Hugh Courtney, with eleven others.

Edward marches againſt her. Hall. Hollingſh. Mean while, Edward loſt not a moment. As the Troops were ready to march, he put himſelf at their head (3), to give his Enemies battle, before the Earl of Pembroke joined them with Welſhmen. How diligent ſoever the Lords in league with the Queen had been, they were far from being in ſo good poſture as the King, becauſe of their want of Arms and Ammunition. So, knowing that Edward was marching in queſt of them, they reſolved to retire into Wales, where the ſituation of the Country would help them to avoid fighting as long as they pleaſed. Beſides, they expected to be joined very ſoon by the Earl of Pembroke, and then ſhould be in condition to give battle. The point was to paſs the Severn before the King overtook them, and for that purpoſe they marched to Gloceſter (4). But that City refuſing her gates (5), and there being no likelihood of taking it at the firſt Aſſault, much leſs of beſieging it in form, they reſolved to paſs the Severn at Tewksbury. Mean time, Edward ſo cloſely purſued them, that upon their Arrival at Tewksbury, they conſulted, whether they ſhould venture to paſs the River, at the peril of ſeeing their rear put to rout, or intrench themſelves in a Park adjoining to the Town, till the Earl of Pembroke arrived. The Queen, who thought only of ſaving the Prince, was for paſſing. Some others, more out of complaiſance to her than for any good reaſon, ſeconded her opinion. But the Duke of Somerſet ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it. He repreſented the Enemy was ſo near, that before the Army had all paſſed, he would certainly have it in his power to attack them, and cut in pieces thoſe who ſhould have the misfortune to be left behind: That ſuch an accident, which ſeemed unavoidable, could not but prove very fatal, and diſcourage ſuch as were ſtill friends to the Houſe of Lancaſter: In fine, tho' their Army was inferior in number to that of the Enemy, that diſadvantage might be repaired by intrenching in the Park, and drawing lines which would balance the ſuperiority of his Troops. After mature deliberation, this opinion was thought moſt adviſeable, conſidering the circumſtances of time and place. Hiſtorians, of whom few underſtand the art of War, have taxed the Duke of Somerſet with imprudence and raſhneſs, ſolely becauſe they conſidered not the difficulty of paſſing a River like the Severn, with the Enemy in the rear. But if that General had been guilty of no other fault, perhaps the Queen's Affairs would have taken another turn. At leaſt ſhe might have waited the Earl of Pembroke's arrival (6), and by fighting upon equal terms, cauſed her Enemy to run his ſhare of the peril. This the Sequel will demonſtrate.

1471. He intrenches himſelf by Tewkſbury. Edward reſolves to attack him. Hall. Hollingſh.

The Reſolution being taken of expecting Edward, the whole night was ſpent in making intrenchments round the Park, which were finiſhed before day; ſo ardently was it laboured to be ſecured from ſurprize. Edward approaching to view them, judged it abſolutely neceſſary to attack them, before they were rendered more impenetrable, and before the Arrival of the Earl of Pembroke, who was hourly expected. So, without loſs of time, he drew up his Army in two lines. He gave the command of the firſt to the Duke of Gloceſter his younger Brother, and headed the ſecond himſelf with the Duke of Clarence. The Duke of Somerſet ranged his Army behind the intrenchments, in three bodies, of which he commanded the foremoſt himſelf (1), in order to ſuſtain the firſt ſhock. Wenlock (2) conducted the ſecond, under Prince Edward, who was conſidered as the Commander in chief. The Earl of Devonſhire (3) was placed at the head of the third. Edward taking a cloſer view of the intrenchments, perceived an opening to be left to go out upon occaſion. This made him think, the Duke of Somerſet hoped to repel the firſt charge, and if he obſerved any diſorder among the aſſailants, had reſolved to ſally out and improve the advantage. So, the more eaſily to draw him out of his lines, he ordered the Duke of Gloceſter who was to begin the fight, to retreat with ſome precipitation, in caſe he met with too ſtrong a reſiſtance; and, if he was purſued, to face about, and vigorouſly attack his purſuers, in the aſſurance of being ſupported by all the reſt of the army. This order was founded upon Edward's knowledge of the Duke of Somerſet's intrepidity, and good opinion of himſelf.

Every thing being thus diſpoſed, the Duke of Gloceſter began the attack of the intrenchment with great vigour. But finding, the enemies ſtood their ground, and appeared every where ready to ſuſtain his aſſaults, he retreated toward the ſecond line, with a precipitation that made the Duke of Somerſet believe the whole Body to be entirely diſheartened. Then it was that the Duke, not being able to curb the impetuoſity of his Courage, and thinking he ought to improve the preſent Advantage, ſallied out of his intrenchments to preſs the enemy's army, which he imagined to be now in confuſion. At the ſame time, he ſent Wenlock word to come immediately to his ſupport. Mean while, the Duke of Gloceſter, who was again drawn up at a good diſtance from the intrenchments, ſeeing the Duke of Somerſet advancing towards him in good order, ſaved him ſome part of the way. As he was ſure of being ſupported by the King his Brother, who was not far off, he furiouſly fell upon the Troops that were marching againſt him, and by this vigorous and unexpected attack, ſo aſtoniſhed them, that they ſaw no other refuge than to fly in diſorder to their Camp. The Duke of Somerſet was in a fury when he perceived himſelf unſupported. He had depended upon Wenlock, and inſtead of finding him without the intrenchments with the ſecond line, to oppoſe the Duke of Gloceſter, he ſaw him motionleſs in the very place where he firſt drew up his Men. Not being able at this ſight, to bridle his rage, he furiouſly rode up to him, and clove his skull with a Battle-Axe.

The Duke of Glocester enters the Enemy's Camp. Hall. Hollingſh.

Mean time, the Duke of Gloceſter entering the enemy's Camp together with the run-a-ways, made a terrible Slaughter. Wenlock being dead, the young Prince knew not what to do, and the Duke of Somerſet tranſported with paſſion, was incapable of giving orders, and making himſelf obeyed. Thus confuſion inſtantly ſpreading in the army, and the King, who cloſely followed the Duke his Brother, entering likewiſe the Camp, the Queen's Troops thought only of ſaving themſelves by flight, without making any farther reſiſtance. It is ſaid, the Queen was found in a Chariot, half dead with grief at the ſight of her forlorn affairs, without knowing what was become of the Prince her Son, and was brought in that condition to King Edward. A Hiſtorian however affirms, it was not till a day or two after the Battle, that ſhe was taken out of a Nunnery where ſhe had fled for refuge, and conducted to the King then at Worceſter. In this Battle, by which the Crown was entirely ſecured to Edward, there fell on the Queen's ſide but three thouſand, becauſe the two laſt lines ran away without fighting. Among the ſlain were found the Earl of Devonſhire and Sir John Beaufort Brother of the Duke of Somerſet (4). The Prince of Wales, the Duke of Somerſet (5), and the grand Prior of St. John's (6) were made Priſoners. But it would have been more happy for them to have died in the Battle, ſince they ſaved their lives only to loſe them in a leſs honorable manner. The young Prince being brought into the King's preſence, appeared before him with an undaunted countenance, without debaſing himſelf by ſubmiſſions unbecoming his birth. Edward was ſurprized, and ſtill more, when, asking him how he came to be ſo raſh thus to enter his Kingdom in arms; the Prince replied, That he was come to recover his own inheritance, which had been unjuſtly uſurped. Edward, full of indignation at this boldneſs, ſtruck him on the mouth with his gantlet, and turned from him. This was, as it were, the ſignal to take away the life of that unfortunate Prince. It is ſaid, immediately upon the King's withdrawing, the Dukes of Clarence and Gloceſter his Brothers, the Earl of Dorſet (7), and the Lord Haſtings, fell like wild beaſts upon the young Prince, and ſtabbed him with their daggers. It is certain, he was murdered that inſtant, and probably, the King had given orders beforehand for that barbarous execution. But I do not know, whether the Hiſtorians are to be credited, who affirm, theſe four Lords killed him with their own hands. This might be an effect of the prejudice of thoſe that wrote the hiſtory, after the reſtoration of the houſe of Lancaſter, ſince it is certain they have forgot nothing to render the houſe of York odious. It is likely however, the murder was committed in the preſence of the fore-mentioned Lords. Some ſay, the Prince eſcaping out of the Battle, the King offered a penſion of five hundred pounds Sterling, to any Perſon that ſhould bring him dead or alive, promiſing, if he was alive, not to put him to death: That upon this promiſe Sir Richard Crofts, in whoſe hands he was fallen, brought him to the King, who performed not his word. This Prince loſt his life at eighteen years of age (8). Next day the Duke of Somerſet, and the grand Prior of the order of St. John were beheaded (9). Queen Margaret was confined in the Tower, where ſhe remained a Priſoner till 1475, when Lewis XI ranſomed her for fifty thouſand crowns (10). Such was the ſad cataſtrophe of this Princeſs, who, for attempting to rule England with an abſolute ſway, cauſed a great effuſion of Engliſh blood, and wrought her own as well as the ruin of the King her Spouſe, of the Prince her Son, and of all the houſe of Lancaſter, of which there remained but a ſingle branch in the Perſon of the Earl of Richmond. There was, it ſeems, a ſort of fatality with regard to the Kings of England, that married the Daughters of France. Edward II, Richard II, Henry VI and Charles I, were the only Kings that eſpouſed French Princeſſes (11), and they all four underwent the ſame fate, three of them by the fault of their Queens.

The Baſtard of Fauconbridge riſes againſt the King. Hall. Hollingſh.

Whilſt Edward was employed in purſuing the Queen, there aroſe a freſh enemy againſt him. Thomas Nevil, known by the name of the baſtard of Fauconbridge, becauſe he was natural Son to the Lord of that name, had been made Vice-Admiral of the Channel, during the Earl of Warwick's Adminiſtration, to whom he adhered. The Earl being dead, and King Edward re-inthroned, the Baſtard had loſt his place. As he was a Man of ill morals and without means, he ſaw no other way to ſubſiſt than turning Pirate. When he found the King employed in the Weſt in purſuit of the Queen, he aſſembled ſome Ships, and many Perſons of deſperate fortunes, with whom he came upon the Coaſt of Kent, not imagining the War, newly kindled, would ſo quickly end. His deſign was to ſurprize London, and inrich himſelf with the plunder of the City. Accordingly, he began his march towards London (13), giving out, that he only intended to free King Henry from captivity. On this pretence, drawing in many adherents of the houſe of Lancaſter, he formed an army of ſeventeen thouſand Men. He preſently became maſter of Southwark. At the ſame time, he ordered part of his Troops (14) to paſs the Thames, and aſſault two of the City gates (15), whilſt himſelf attempted to force the bridge. But the Citizens having had notice of his march, were upon their guard, and repulsed him on all sides. In the mean while, the Bastard hearing of the success of the Battle of Tewksbury, and knowing the King was diligently marching to London (1), retired in good order to Sandwich, where he fortified himself. Edward being come to London, passed through the City without staying, and marched to Canterbury, where the Bastard sent him word he was ready to submit, upon certain terms which were immediately granted him. The King even knighted him, and made him Vice-Admiral of the Channel as before. But he did not long enjoy these favours. Shortly after, he was beheaded, either for new, or the old, crimes.

The Bishop of Winchester is pardoned. Act. Pub. XI. p. 711.

Edward arriving at London the 21st of May, after two Victories in less than three weeks, granted an absolute pardon to William Wainfleet Bishop of Winchester (2), a zealous Lancastrian. But he had not the same generosity for King Henry, head of that house. The innocent life of that unhappy Prince, seemed to screen him from the cruelty of his victorious enemy. It was doubtless upon that account, Edward had twice before spared his Life. Nay, it is very probable, he would have suffered him to die a natural death, had he believed it consistent with his safety. But he was afraid he should never enjoy a settled repose, so long as that Prince was alive; and this consideration made him resolve to dispatch him. It was properly Queen Margaret that hastened her Husband's death by her last attempt to re-inthrone him. If she had won the Battle of Tewksbury, and taken Edward prisoner, it is scarce to be doubted, that she would have put him to death on the Scaffold. She ought not therefore to think it very strange, that the ill success of her enterprize fell upon the heads of her Husband and Son. It is even very probable, she was herself indebted to her Sex for her own life. However this be, Edward resolving to sacrifice Henry to his safety, ordered the Duke of Gloucester, to whom all the Historians unanimously give the character of a brutish and bloody Prince, to put him to death in Prison. It is pretended, this Prince would be the Father's, as he had been the Son's executioner, and that entering his room he himself stabbed him to the heart. But as I observed, it is necessary to receive with some caution what the Historians say of the Princes of the House of York (3).

Death of Henry VI. Hall. Hollingsh. Stow.

His Character.

Thus died Henry VI, in the fiftieth year of his age, after a reign of thirty eight years before he was dethroned, and of seven months only after his restoration. Never had Prince been the occasion, though innocently, of more bloody Tragedies, or caused more blood to be spilt in his quarrel. Though his natural weakness rendered him unfit to govern his Kingdom, and for that reason, he always gave himself up to the guidance of others, he had some good qualities, which after his death, were extolled for virtues of the first class, on purpose to render the more odious the person that deprived him of his Crown and Life. All that can truly be said of this Prince, is, that considering him in his private capacity, his life was innocent, or at least, free from the crimes but too common in the world. But if he is considered as a Sovereign he will appear in his whole life, to have acted neither good nor bad. He founded Eaton College near Windsor, and King's College in Cambridge, for the benefit of Eaton Scholars. These two foundations are still in being. After his death, his body was brought to St. Paul's, where it was some time exposed to publick view; after which it was interred without any pomp, in a Village near London (4).

The Remains of the House of Lancaster.

The twelve Battles, fought since the year 1455, and the consequent barbarous executions, had reduced the House of Lancester to two persons only, namely, Margaret, (Daughter of John Duke of Somerset, Wife of Edmund Tudor Earl of Richmond, half-brother of Henry VI,) and Henry Earl of Richmond her Son. Margaret had two other Husbands, Henry Earl of Stafford, and Thomas Stanley, but had Children by neither. I mention not Charles Somerset, from whom the Earls of Worcester were derived, because being only natural Son of the Beaufort-Somerset Family (5), he could have no Title to the Crown.

The Earls of Pembroke and Richmond retire into Wales. Hall.

Jasper Tudor Earl of Pembroke, Uncle of the young Earl of Richmond, not having been speedy enough to be present at the battle of Tewksbury, was not a little embarrassed. As he found himself too weak to support alone the Interests of the House of Lancaster, he dismissed his Troops, and kept with the Earl of Richmond his Nephew in Wales, where he had many friends and great credit. Edward passionately desired to have in his power these two Lords, the only persons that could give him any farther disturbance. To accomplish this design, it was by no means proper to march his Troops against them. Besides that this would warn them to leave the Kingdom, it was not easy even to seize their persons, in a Country where they had as many friends as there were Inhabitants. So believing policy to be more serviceable than force, he sent into those parts Roger Vaughan, with orders to use all ways to seize or kill them. Vaughan not having been so secret as he ought, the Earl of Pembroke, who had notice of his design, pretending to fall into the Villain's Snare, slew him, and retired to Pembroke Castle (6), from whence he departed with Henry his Nephew, and imbarked in a Vessel which was to carry them to France. Mean while, the winds driving them upon the coast of Bretagne, they were forced to put into a Port of that Country. Their design was to go to Paris, but as they could not be excused waiting on the Duke of Bretagne, when they would have taken their leave, they were told, they were not at liberty to pursue their Voyage. The Duke judging these two Lords might be of some advantage to him, assigned them the Town of Vannes for their habitation, with an honorable allowance. Mean while, though they outwardly received all the respect due to their Birth and Quality, they were, however, very narrowly watched.

Edward tries to get rid of them, but cannot. Hall. Hollingsh.

They embark for France,

and are detained in Bretagne.

Edward seeing himself perfectly restored, without any appearance of being again disturbed, in the possession of a Crown acquired with so much pains, assembled the Lords Spiritual and Temporal at Westminster (7). There, in a studied Speech, wherein he endeavoured to display the Title of the House of York to the Crown, and forgot not his Victories, he expressed his desire, that they would take the Oath to Prince Edward his Son, as to his apparent Successor, to which he found them all inclined. The two Archbishops, eight Bishops, five Dukes, with all the Earls and Lords there present took this Oath on the 3d of July. Many former examples had demonstrated the little use of such a precaution, and without going any farther, Edward might have remembred his Father's Oath to Henry VI, as well as his own at York. He was persuaded however, that people would be more scrupulous to him. But after his death, his Children unhappily experienced how little such assurances are to be depended upon.

Pardon granted to seven Bishops. p. 715, 716, 728, 729, 734, 736.

Shortly after, Edward granted a pardon to seven Bishops (8), who had declared against him in the late revolution. From the beginning of his reign to the end, he always endeavoured to carry it fair with the Clergy. The rest of the year was spent in sundry Negotiations, which I shall briefly mention.

Negotiations with the King of Scotland. p. 716, 717, 733, 748.

The first was with the King of Scotland. During the troubles in England, the Truce between the English and Scots had been frequently violated, contrary to the Intention of the two Kings. After Edward's restoration, the King of Scotland sending Ambassadors to him, it was agreed, to hold a Congress at Alnwick, the 24th of September, for a mutual reparation of the outrages committed by the two Nations upon one another. The two Kings were equally desirous to preserve the Truce, and even to conclude a final Peace. This Negotiation however, was not ended till 1473. It appears in the Collection of the

(4) His Body was brought, in an open Coffin, on May 29, through Cornhill, with a great Company of armed Men, to St. Paul's Church, where it was exposed, for one whole day, to publick view. The next day it was removed to the Black-Friers; and thence, without Priest or Clerk, Torch or Taper, Singing or Saying, conveyed to the Monastery of Chertsey in Surrey; but it was afterwards removed by Edward IV, or, according to others by Richard III, in the second year of his Reign, to Windsor, and there buried. The Truce with Bretagne ratified. p. 722,750.

On the 30th of September, the thirty years Truce with Bretagne was confirmed. This confirmation was neceſſary, as the Truce, during the Earl of Warwick's Adminiſtration, had been often violated.

Truce of eight Months with France. p. 721,722, 750.

Lewis XI was very ſenſible Edward had no reaſon to be pleaſed with him; but however he offered him a Truce, That with Henry VI being of no force, now Edward was reſtored. In the preſent ſituation of the Engliſh Affairs, it was by no means proper for Edward to renew the war with France. His Kingdom was too much exhauſted, to think ſo early of ſuch an undertaking. So, without much intreaty, he agreed to continue the Truce, from the 1ſt of September this year, to the 1ſt of May following. This was only whilſt he prepared to be revenged of Lewis, for aſſiſting Queen Margaret.

1472. The year 1472 abounded not with ſo many important and remarkable events as the laſt. It was almoſt wholly ſpent in divers Negotiations, tending to ſecure the Tranquillity of the King and Kingdom, by Truces or Alliances with foreign Princes.

p. 733. The Negotiation with Scotland ſtill continued, though ſlowly, by reaſon of the obſtacles which occurred in the reparations demanded by each King.

Differences between the Engliſh and Flemings. p. 737,738.

It appears in ſeveral papers of the Collection of the Publick Acts, that ſome diſpute aroſe concerning the Truce of Commerce for thirty years, between England and the Duke of Burgundy's Dominions. Probably, during the Earl of Warwick's Adminiſtration, the Engliſh had injured the Duke's trading Subjects. Theſe laſt demanded reparation for ſundry damages ſuſtained, affirming, the Truce was to be conſidered as made with England, and not with the perſon of the reigning King. Edward on his part did not think himſelf obliged to repair the damages done to the Flemings, during the Earl of Warwick's Miniſtry. But theſe differences properly concerned only the Merchants of the two Nations. As for the two Princes, it was for both their Intereſts to live in a good underſtanding. Wherefore in treating of the outrages committed againſt the Truce, they did not fail to negotiate a final Peace.

Negotiations with the Hanſe Towns. p. 739.

An affair of much the ſame nature with the Hanſe Towns (1), created the King likewiſe ſome trouble. Theſe Towns, whereof Lubeck, Hamburgh, and Dantzick, were the three principal, had obtained of the Kings of England ſeveral Privileges for their Merchants, becauſe their Commerce was very advantagious to the Engliſh. But under the frequent changes of the Government during the Civil War, the Engliſh had injured the Merchants of theſe Towns, and violated their Privileges ſeveral ways. Whereupon theſe laſt had obtained of their Magiſtrates Letters of Mart, which had turned theſe differences into an open War, deſtructive to both Sides. At length, the troubles in England being ended, the Hanſe Towns ſent Ambaſſadors to the King, to demand ſatisfaction for their loſſes, and to propoſe a renewal of Alliance, to confirm their Privileges, and ſecure the Trade and Navigation of the Engliſh in the northern Seas. Edward received the Ambaſſadors very civilly, and appointed Commiſſioners, who after ſeveral Conferences, agreed with them, that a Congreſs ſhould be held at Utrecht, to ſettle all things to the ſatisfaction of both parties. But this affair was ſo full of difficulties, that it could not be ended till 1474.

Alliance with Portugal. p. 741.

Some time after, Edward, by his Letters Patents confirmed the antient Alliance between Richard II, and John King of Portugal, for them and their Succeſſors. Alphonſo King of that Country ſent him the like Letters, dated the 30th of Auguſt.

The Earl of Oxford taken and impriſoned at Hammes, Hall. Holingſh. Bondi.

Whilſt Edward was endeavoring to ſecure his Peace, by renewing the Truces or Alliances with foreign Princes, the return of the Earl of Oxford into England, gave him freſh cauſe of uneaſineſs. The Earl, great favourer of the Houſe of Lancaſter, had retired into France, after the battle of Tewksbury. But as he was not very favourably received by Lewis XI, he was returned into England (2) with ſeventy five Men, and had taken by ſurprize St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall. Edward, ever apprehenſive that the leaſt ſpark might re-kindle the flames ſo happily extinguiſhed, ordered ſome Troops to march immediately into the Weſt, and inveſt the Earl of Oxford in the Mount. But as the Earl had not time to provide againſt a Siege, he ſurrendered (3) before he was reduced to extremity. All he could obtain, was his Life only; but he loſt his Liberty and Eſtate, which was all confiſcated, without any allowance to his Counteſs, Siſter of the Earl of Warwick, for her Subſiſtence. From St. Michael's Mount, he was conducted to the Caſtle of Hammes near Calais, where he remained Priſoner twelve years. 1472.

and the Archbiſhop of York at Guiſnes. Hall. Hollingſh. Stow.

The Archbiſhop of York had much the ſame fate. Though the King had pardoned him, and received his Oath at London the day before the battle of Barnet; he was Brother of the Earl of Warwick, and that was ſufficient to render him ſuſpected. So, notwithſtanding the Pardon, he was confined in the Caſtle of Guiſnes, where he died ſoon after (4).

Death of the Duke of Exeter. Blondi. Stow.

The King had no conſiderable enemy left in the Kingdom but Henry Holland Duke of Exeter, who had taken Sanctuary at Weſtminſter after the battle of Barnet. Growing weary of his Confinement, he employed his Wife, Edward's Siſter, to obtain his pardon. They had lived ſeparate, ever ſince the beginning of the Civil Wars, becauſe the Duke, whoſe Grandmother was Siſter of Henry IV, adhered to the Lancaſtrian Party, and his Ducheſs had continued with the King her Brother. This Princeſs, inſtead of ſuing for her Husband's Pardon, deſired, on the contrary, to be legally divorced, and though ſhe had no lawful reaſon, obtained her deſire. Probably, the King's Sollicitation was very ſerviceable to her. Thus the Duke of Exeter ſaw himſelf forced to remain in his Sanctuary, without any hopes of pardon, or any thing to ſubſiſt upon, but what was privately ſent him by his friends. At laſt, not bearing to live thus immured, he left the place, without its being known how or when. It is only known, that in 1474, he was found dead upon the Seaſhore in the County of Kent.

Edward perſecuted the Lancaſtrians.

Edward having nothing more to fear, after the death, impriſonment, or exile, of all the principal friends of the Houſe of Lancaſter, gave too great a looſe to his revenge, upon perſons of an inferior rank, whom he ought not to have dreaded. Some were put to death, and others fined immoderately, as a puniſhment for taking Arms againſt him. But what troubled him moſt, was the eſcape of the Earls of Pembroke and Richmond. He ſeemed to foreſee the evil that was to befall his family from that quarter. The Earl of Richmond was, as I ſaid, the only remaining branch of the Houſe of Lancaſter, or rather, the only perſon that could pretend to diſpute the Crown with Edward, as being Son of a Princeſs of that Houſe. He had with him the Earl of Pembroke his Uncle, who was a Lord of great Merit, and very capable to direct him. Though they were both abſent, and as Priſoners in Bretagne, they made the King very uneaſy, who wiſhed to ſee the quarrel between the two Houſes entirely ended, by the death of the young Earl, to whom all the Rights of the Houſe of Lancaſter, were fallen. For that purpoſe, he ſent Ambaſſadors to the Duke of Bretagne, intreating him to deliver the two Engliſh Lords he had in his power; but the Duke very civily deſired to be excuſed. He promiſed however to guard them ſo carefully, that they ſhould never be able to hurt him. Upon this conſideration Edward paid him yearly a large Penſion, under colour of a maintenance for the two Priſoners.

He demands the Earl of Richmond of the Duke of Bretagne, who denies him. Hall.

Truce with Scotland. Act Pub. XI. p. 758.

All this while the Negotiation with Scotland was continued, and as great difficulties occurred, it was agreed between the Plenipotentiaries of the two Kings, that the Truce ſhould ſubſiſt till July 1473.

Gruthuyſe made Earl of Winchester. p. 765. Stow.

After Edward had ſettled his affairs to his mind, he remembred the honorable and hearty reception he had met with in Holland, from Lewis de Bruges Lord of Gruthuyſe, and reſolved to make him an acknowledgment. To that end, having ſo managed it, that the Parliament petitioned him to create that foreign Lord a Peer of England, he made him Earl of Winchester, and afterwards by Letters Patents, allowed him to bear the Arms of England in his Scutcheon.

State of Affairs between Lewis and the Duke of Burgundy. Commin. P. Daniel.

Before I finiſh what relates to the events of this year, it will be neceſſary briefly to mention how matters ſtood between Lewis XI, and the Duke of Burgundy. The knowledge of their diſputes is very requiſite for the underſtanding of the Hiſtory of England. Lewis, as I ſaid, at the Inſtance

(1) Theſe are certain Towns in Germany confederate for the Benefit of Trade. They are ſo called from the word Hanſe, ſignifying Alliance. Bremen in Lower-Saxony, is ſaid to have been the Founder of this Confederacy, about the year 1164. How many Towns were aſſociated at firſt is not known: But the deſign ſo viſibly proſpered, that moſt of the chief trading places in Europe, to the number of ſeventy two, entered into the Confederacy. In the flouriſhing times of their Alliance, theſe Hanſe Towns had four general Staples, viz. London, Bruges in Flanders, Bergen in Norway, and Novogrod in Ruſſia. At preſent, the Hanſe Towns are in a manner reduced to theſe ſix, Lubeck, Hamburgh, Bremen, Roſtock, Dantzick, and Cologne.

(3) February 15, 1472. Stow ſays, he had ſo great plenty of Proviſions, that he could have held out a good while longer, p. 426.

(4) One day as he was hunting with the King at Windſor, the King told him, he would come and hunt with him at his Seat called the More in Hertfordſhire. Accordingly the Archbiſhop made great preparations, and borrowed a good deal of Plate from his Friends: But the day before Edward was to come, the Archbiſhop was apprehended, and all his Goods and Effects, valued at twenty thouſand Pounds, ſeized to the King's uſe. Stow, p. 426.

1472. of the Duke of Bretagne, and the Conſtable de St. Pol, who ſought only to deceive him, had begun the war with the Duke of Burgundy, and taken from him Amiens, and St. Quentin. As he did not want good Spies, he diſcovered at length, that he was ingaged in that war, ſolely for the accompliſhment of the projected Marriage between the Duke of Guienne his Brother, and the Duke of Burgundy's Daughter. In order therefore to free himſelf at once from the troubles that were deſigned to be raiſed by means of his Brother, he cauſed a poiſon to be given him, which was to operate ſlowly, that his death might be aſcribed to a common diſtemper. Mean while, for fear the Duke of Burgundy, finding himſelf too much preſſed, ſhould take new meaſures with the Duke of Bretagne and the Conſtable, he ſent to offer him a Truce. The Duke could wiſh for nothing more advantagious in his preſent Circumſtances. But as he had reaſon to fear, the offer was deſigned only to amuſe him, Lewis gave the Duke of Bretagne full power to conclude the Truce in his name. As this laſt could not refuſe to undertake this affair, without diſcovering himſelf, he ſent the Biſhop of Leon in quality of Mediator, to Cambray, where the Treaty was to be negotiated. Both Parties were ſo willing to agree, that it was not poſſible for the Biſhop to find any way to hinder the ſigning of a Truce for thirteen Months, from the firſt of April 1472, to the firſt of May 1473. About ſix weeks after the concluſion of the Truce, the Duke of Guienne died, and Lewis took poſſeſſion of that Duchy without oppoſition.

P. Daniel.

The Duke of Burgundy perceived then, that Lewis had granted him a Truce only to have time to ſecure Guienne, and that, upon all occaſions, he ſhould be that Prince's Dupe, when their affairs were determined by way of Negotiation. So, being highly provoked to ſee himſelf thus amuſed, and finding, that with ſuch enemies, the ſureſt way is to act with open force, and make them at leaſt run an equal ſhare of the danger, he entered France, and deſtroyed whatever he met in his way with fire and ſword. The Duke of Bretagne ſeeing his projects vaniſhed by the death of the Duke of Guienne, reſolved ſeriouſly to join with the Duke of Burgundy, being perſwaded that the preſervation of Both depended upon their ſtrict Union. Mean while, Lewis perceiving the Duke of Bretagne would not fail to take that courſe, had already ſent Troops into Anjou, to keep him in awe.

Commin.

Whilſt Lewis was ſtill employed in Guienne, the Duke of Burgundy made ſome progreſs in Picardy, and took Neſle and Roye. But unfortunately, he loſt two whole months before Beauvais, without taking the place. This accident was the cauſe, that Lewis not perceiving himſelf much preſſed left his Troops in Anjou. So, the Duke of Bretagne not daring to ſtir from his Country, was prevented from joining his Ally according to agreement. At length, the Duke of Burgundy raiſing the Siege of Beauvais, came into Normandy, in expectation of the Duke of Bretagne. Mean time, Lewis was a little imbaraſſed. By leaving his Troops in Anjou, he expoſed Picardy and Normandy to the Duke of Burgundy's attacks, and if he marched to the aſſiſtance of theſe two Provinces, he left the Duke of Bretagne free to make a powerful diverſion in his neighbourhood. But he ſoon freed himſelf from this difficulty. By the help of the Duke of Bretagne's Miniſters, whom he gained to his intereſt, he found means to make a Truce with that Prince (1), and perſwade him to renounce the Duke of Burgundy's alliance. This unexpected defection obliged the Duke of Burgundy to accept of a Truce offered him by Lewis, and which was frequently prolonged.

1473. Miſtakes of the Engliſh Hiſtorians.

Before we enter upon the events of the year 1473, it muſt be obſerved, that all the Engliſh Hiſtorians are miſtaken in a whole year, placing in this what happened in the next. Biondi, the Italian author I have ſometimes quoted, owns, the French place in the year 1475, what the Engliſh fix to the year 1474, and adds, that he chuſes to follow the Engliſh, and ſo is guilty of their miſtake. The Collection of the Publick Acts ſhows it ſo plainly, that there is no reaſon to queſtion it. Indeed, the year 1473 was ſo barren of events, that it is not very ſtrange if it was confounded or joined with the following. The affairs which ought to be aſſigned to the year 1473, though they are of little moment in themſelves, they ſerve to diſtinguiſh theſe two years and rectify the Chronology.

Agreement with Portugal. Act. Pub. XI. p. 762--766, 767--769.

The King of Portugal demanding the reſtitution of certain Portugueſe Veſſels taken by the Engliſh, enquiry was made, whereby it appeared that theſe Ships were plundered by the Baſtard of Fauconbridge during his revolt againſt Edward. For which reaſon the King of Portugal deſiſted from his demand. 1473.

Confirmation of the Truce with Scotland. p. 776,788.

The affairs with Scotland employed Edward good part of this year. At length by a Treaty concluded at Alnwick the 28th of September, it was agreed, the Truce of Newcaſtle ſhould be inviolably obſerved by both the Nations.

p. 779,782, 793.

The differences Edward had with the Hanſe Towns were alſo decided, at the congreſs of Utrecht the 19th of September (2).

Negotiations with the Duke of Burgundy. p. 772,778.

There were likewiſe ſome negotiations, concerning the thirty years Truce of Commerce between England and the Duke of Burgundy's Dominions; but it does not appear that any thing was concluded in the affair, which, probably, was only a pretence for more ſecret and important Negotiations, as will be ſeen preſently.

Alliance with Denmark. p. 775,784.

The Alliance between England and Denmark being often violated during the confuſion of the Civil Wars in England, the two Sovereigns were equally deſirous to renew it. To that end they agreed, that without inquiring into the mutual damages, the Engliſh and Danes had done one another, the Alliance ſhould remain upon the ſame foot as before the violation.

This is all worth notice in the Collection of the Publick Acts for the Year 1473. Let us proceed now to the following year, which will afford us more plenty of Matter.

1474. Deſigns of the Duke of Burgundy. Commin.

The Duke of Burgundy, as I ſaid, obtained a Truce which was afterwards prolonged two or three times till 1475. During this Truce, he employed his time in conquering the Duchy of Gueldres. Arnold Duke of that name, being diſpleaſed with Adolphus his Son, who had for ſome time kept him in Priſon (3), made a grant of his Duchy to the Duke of Burgundy. Upon this pretence entering Gueldres, he defeated Adolphus, and taking him Priſoner ſeized upon the Duchy.

Mezerai. Commin.

This acquiſition exciting him to new conqueſts, he conſidered how to enlarge his Dominions on the ſide of Germany, and formed projects too vaſt, and too difficult to be performed. Mezerai ſays, he promiſed his Daughter in marriage to Maximilian Son of the Emperor Frederic, upon condition his Dominions ſhould be erected into a Kingdom. He adds, this affair miſcarried, becauſe the Duke would have the condition performed before the marriage, in order to ſign the contract as King; but the Emperor would have the marriage conſummated firſt. Be this as it will, the Duke forming the project of extending his Dominions in Germany, embraced the firſt opportunity to carry his arms into that Country. A diſpute concerning the Archbiſhop of Cologn ariſing between Robert of Bavaria, and the Brother of the Landgrave of Heſſe, furniſhed him with the wanted pretence. He immediately took the Prince of Bavaria's part, and laid Siege to Nuz, a ſtrong Town in the Archbiſhoprick of Cologne. He reckoned, the taking of that place would promote the execution of his other deſigns.

Commin.

The Truce with the King of France being to laſt till June 1475, the Duke of Burgundy hoped to be maſter of Nuz before it was expired. But Lewis put ſuch obſtacles in his way, that he could not execute his deſigns ſo ſoon as he imagined. Lewis ſo managed by his intrigues, that the Emperor Frederic drew together a ſtrong Army, to oblige the Duke to raiſe the Siege. The Duke of Lorrain, the Duke of Auſtria, the Switzers, entered into a league againſt him; ſo that finding himſelf extremely embaraſſed to reſiſt ſo many enemies, he remained ten months before Nuz, without being able to take it. Whilſt he was employed in the Siege, he ſaw no other way to free himſelf from the perſecutions of his enemy, than to ingage the King of England to make a powerful diverſion in France. For that purpoſe, he ſent Ambaſſadors to Edward, to perſwade him to make War upon their common enemy. The better to ingage him in this undertaking, he promiſed to join him with all his forces, the moment he landed in Picardy. He made him hope likewiſe, that the Conſtable de St. Pol would deliver him St. Quentin, the Duke of Bretagne league with them, and by the help of that Prince's adherents in France, he would put the Kingdom in ſuch confuſion, that the conqueſt of it would be rendered much eaſier than in the reign of Charles VI.

He engages Edward to league with him againſt France. Commin. Hall. Habingt. Stow.

This was preciſely the opportunity impatiently expected by Edward, to be revenged of Lewis XI. Every thing ſeemed to conſpire to the downfal of that reſtleſs and turbulent Prince, ſince he was going to be attacked by three formidable powers, without reckoning his danger from his own Subjects. And indeed, if all his enemies had acted 1474. with the ſame ardour as Edward, he would doubtleſs have run the hazard of ſeeing his affairs in great diſorder. But, in all appearance, the Duke of Burgundy only intended to ingage Edward to make a diverſion in France, in order to prevent Lewis from diſturbing him in Germany. However this be, acting as if he really deſigned to undertake the conqueſt of France jointly with the King of England, he gave very ample powers to his Ambaſſadors to treat with him upon that head. The Plenipotentiaries of the two Princes having ſettled all the Articles, ſigned about the end of July ſeveral Treaties concerning this important undertaking.

Several Treaties between Edward and the Duke of Burgundy. Act. Pub. XI. p. 804, 806.

The firſt was a Treaty of Amity, Alliance, and Confederacy between the King of England and Duke of Burgundy, mutually promiſing to aſſiſt one another to the utmoſt of their power.

The ſecond contained certain private conventions concerning the War they were to carry into France, compriſed in the eight following Articles:

I. That Edward ſhould paſs into France at the head of ten thouſand Men at leaſt, all well armed and well-appointed, before the 1ſt of July, 1475, to recover the Duchies of Guienne and Normandy, and the whole Kingdom of France.

II. That the Duke of Burgundy ſhould aſſiſt him in Perſon with all his forces.

III. That the King ſhould hearken to no propoſal of Peace or Truce without the Duke's conſent.

IV. The Duke of Burgundy promiſed likewiſe the ſame thing.

V. That the two Princes ſhould cauſe the War to be proclaimed, each in his Dominions, againſt Lewis as their common enemy.

VI. That immediately after the War was begun or proclaimed, the two Allies ſhould attack the common enemy, in the moſt convenient places, in ſuch manner however as to be within diſtance to aſſiſt one another.

VII. That in caſe one of the two Princes ſhould beſiege ſome Town, or be forced to give Battle, the other ſhould be obliged to join him with all his forces, and at his own charges, that both might run the ſame hazard. That their Lieutenants ſhould be bound to the ſame thing.

VIII. That when the War was once commenced, neither ſhould deſiſt ſo long as the other ſhould deſire to continue it. That if one was abſent, his Lieutenant ſhould be obliged to obey the other, in whatever concerned the common good of the two Allies.

p. 808. The third Treaty contained an explication of one of the Articles of the firſt, where it was ſaid that each of the two Allies ſhould aſſiſt the other with all his Forces. As this expreſſion was too general, they agreed upon the Number (1) and Pay of the Troops they were to ſupply (2).

p. 810. The fourth was a grant from Edward to the Duke of Burgundy of ſeveral Provinces of France, in conſideration of the future ſervices of that Prince, in aiding him to recover the whole Kingdom. This grant included the Duchy of Bar, the Earldoms of Champagne, Nevers, Retel, Eu, Guiſe, the Barony of Douſy, with all the Towns on both ſides the Somme; and laſtly, all the Lands poſſeſſed by the Earl of St. Pol and held of Guienne, Normandy, or the Crown of France. Moreover, he renounced the Homage of all theſe Provinces, as well as of Burgundy, the Earldoms of Charolois and Mâcon, of Flanders, Artois, and in general of all the Territories the Duke was actually poſſeſſed of, or acquired by this grant. Finally, he added, his intent was, that this grant or conveyance ſhould be as firm as if conſented to by the Eſtates, promiſing to procure their confirmation of the whole, as ſoon as he was in poſſeſſion of the Crown of France.

p. 812. The fifth was an agreement, whereby the Duke of Burgundy ingaged to furniſh for the War, an Army of between ten and twenty thouſand Men. The King promiſed on his part, to aſſign him yearly the pay of theſe Troops upon the Provinces included in the foregoing grant, in caſe they were conquered, and if not, upon other Demeſns of the Crown, in proportion to what ſhould be wanted: That if the aſſignment of the pay was not made before the end of every year, he agreed, the Duke ſhould not be obliged to find any Troops the Year following.

The ſixth and laſt Act was in form of Letters Patents, whereby the Duke of Burgundy agreed that Edward and his Succeſſors Kings of France, ſhould have free Liberty to enter Rheims in order to be crowned, and depart without any impediment. This Act was neceſſary, becauſe Champagne was included in the grant. 1474. p. 813.

The King's and Duke's Motive in this Treaty.

This was properly ſelling the Bear's skin before he was killed. However, it is not very difficult to diſcover the Motives of the conduct of theſe two Princes, ſince it is certain they both intended to deceive one another. They were both too wiſe, to expect to conquer France with the ſtipulated Forces. But the Duke of Burgundy meant to ingage Edward to make a powerful diverſion in that Kingdom, by perſuading him, it would be very eaſy to conquer it. Edward feigned on his part to be allured with theſe hopes, the better to ingage the Duke of Burgundy to lend him a ſufficient ſupply, to recover Guienne and Normandy. This is neither the firſt nor the laſt time that Princes have played Counterfeits in their Treaties.

Subſidy granted the King. Cotton's Abridg. Hall. Hollingſh. Stow.

Edward having ſigned all theſe Treaties, began ſeriouſly to make preparations for the intended War. His firſt care was to aſſemble a Parliament (3), which readily granted him a ſubſidy. Since the Reign of Edward III, the Parliaments ſeldom wanted much ſollicitation to grant money for a War with France. As ſoon as Edward ſaw himſelf ſupported by his Parliament, he iſſued out Commiſſions to levy a much greater number of Troops, than what he had promiſed to ſupply by his Treaty with Burgundy. Indeed as the War was upon his account, it was his part to exert himſelf anſwerably to the greatneſs of the undertaking. Whilſt he was haſtening his preparations, he ſent ambaſſadors to divers Courts, as well to make alliances with ſeveral Princes, as to endeavour to hinder their union with his Enemy. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that he ſent to the Emperor Frederick, to Ferdinand King of Sicily, to the King of Hungary, and ſome others, to ingage them to enter into the League.

He prepares for the War.

Several Embaſſies. Act. Pub. XI. p. 816, —— 836.

He concludes the Marriage of Cecily his Daughter with the Prince of Scotland. p. 814, 836.

At the ſame time, he ſecured himſelf againſt any diverſions from the Scots, by concluding a marriage between Cecily his ſecond Daughter, and the King of Scotland's eldeſt Son. The firſt overture concerning this Marriage was made in the beginning of the year, and is was afterwards negotiated in divers conferences between the plenipotentiaries of the two Kings. At length, it was concluded the 30th of July, and October the 18th the young Prince and Princeſs were affianced by Proxies. Some days after (4), the Truce of Newcaſtle, which was to laſt till 1519, was again ratified at Edinburgh. As the affianced Couple were yet too young, it was agreed the Marriage ſhould be accompliſhed as ſoon as they were both of fit age, and in the mean while, Edward ſhould pay at ſeveral times his Daughter's Dowry, conſiſting of twenty thouſand Marks Sterling.

He raiſes Money by way of Benevolence. Hall. Habington.

Edward having thus ſecured himſelf againſt the diverſions his Enemy might have cauſed, continued his Preparations, with great hopes of ſucceeding in his deſigns. The Subſidy granted by the Parliament not ſeeming ſufficient, or part of it perhaps being applied to other uſes, he borrowed Money of all his Subjects that were known to be rich. Some contributed chearfully; others were gained by the King's Flatteries; and ſome feared to incur his diſpleaſure, and perhaps ſome Violence in caſe they refuſed. In general, there were but few who dared to diſobey. This ſort of Aid levied after this manner was called by the new Name of Benevolence, intimating that private Perſons had granted it freely and of their own accord. Mean while, theſe Loans raiſed without Authority of Parliament, were of a very dangerous conſequence: But as it was to make war upon France, there was no murmurs. It is reported, the King himſelf asking a rich Widow what ſhe would lend him, ſhe replied, She could not refuſe twenty Pound Sterling to a Prince who borrowed with ſo good a Grace. The King, as much pleaſed with the Lady's Politeneſs as her preſent, very courteouſly gave her a Kiſs, which ſhe took as ſuch an honour, that ſhe doubled the ſum ſhe had promiſed. Hall.

He deſigns three thouſand Men for Bretagne. Act. Pub. XII. p. 12.

Amongſt the new-raiſed Troops there were three thouſand Men deſigned for the Duke of Bretagne, purſuant to a ſecret Treaty between him and Edward. That Prince however had lately changed into a perpetual Peace the

(1) Which was to be ſix thouſand Men.

(2) If either Party wanted Troops for his own Defence, he was to pay two thouſand four hundred Men out of thoſe ſix thouſand, and he that furniſhed them was to pay the remaining three thouſand ſix hundred. But if they were wanted for any other occaſion, he that employed them was to pay them alone. Rymer's Fœd. Tom. 11. p. 809.

(3) This was no new Parliament, but the ſame as firſt met on October 6, in the 12th year of this King's Reign, and is mentioned above. It was by ſundry Prorogations continued to the 6th of June, 1473, when it granted the King one Tenth, and one Fifteenth; and fifty one thouſand one hundred and ſeventy Pounds, four Shillings and Seven-pence three Farthings, in full payment of the Wages of the fourteen thouſand Archers granted before; towards the payment whereof every County, City, and Town, was ſeverally taxed. This Parliament was continued till March 14. 1474, when it was diſſolved. See Cotton's Abridg. p. 688——700.

Truce

1475. Truce made with Lewis. And yet, when he was informed of the League between Edward and the Duke of Burgundy, he desired to be included, but privately, for fear of being oppressed before his Allies were ready. The Lords Audley and Duras (1) were to command the Succours intended for Bretagne.

Ibid.

He passes over to Calais. p. 13. Commin. Hall. Stow.

Every thing being ready for the Army's departure, Edward embarked at Sandwich the 20th of June (2), having appointed the Prince of Wales his Son, but five years old, Guardian of the Realm in his absence. A Historian affirms, he found at Dover five hundred transports sent by the Duke of Burgundy, which is not very likely. Mezerai says, on the contrary, that the English Troops spent three weeks in passing to Calais, which is a sign, there were but few Vessels, or a very great number of Troops. Philip de Commines assures, never did King of England lead into France so strong an Army. But this is speaking hyperbolically, or not exactly according to truth. It is certain, this Army was not comparable for number, to that, led by Edward III into France a little before the Treaty of Bretigny (3). However, it is not easy to know the precise number of the Troops, since the Historians only mention the number of the Horse, without speaking of the Foot. But if we judge by the usual proportion in those days, when the Cavalry was much more relied on than the Infantry, this Army was not so numerous as it is pretended, since there were but fifteen hundred Men at arms, and fifteen thousand Archers on Horseback. Besides, by Edward's Treaty with the Duke of Burgundy, he was obliged to find but ten thousand Men. In fine, it will be seen in the sequel, that he made peace with Lewis without opening the Campain, when he found he could not depend upon the Duke of Burgundy's assistance, which doubtless he would not have done, before he had rendered himself formidable by some exploit, had he been so superior as he is represented.

Commin. Hall. Stow.

He proclaims War by a Herald. Commin. Biondi. Habington. Lewis's Answer, and Present to the Herald Hall.

Upon Edward's arrival at Calais (4), he sent a Herald to Lewis to summon him to restore the whole Kingdom of France, and in case of refusal, to proclaim War against him. Lewis hearing the Herald in private, told him, he was very well informed, Edward was not come of his own inclination to make war, but by the instigation of the Duke of Burgundy, and the Constable de St. Pol (5), who, he might assure his Master, would both deceive him. Then after asking him some questions, which gave the Herald occasion to say, that when he made any offers of Peace, he should apply to the Lords Howard and Stanley, he presented him with three hundred Crowns (6), and thirty yards of Velvet, to make him a Robe. He did not expect, doubtless, to reap great advantages from the Herald by this liberality, since the Man was a stranger to his Master's inward resolutions; but meant to show Edward's Courtiers, what they might expect from him for more important Services. The Herald failed not to magnify his Present, and relate to the Lord Howard, who held the chief place in the King's Favour, what passed between Lewis and him.

Edward hears no News of the Duke of Burgundy. Hall.

Mean while, Edward advancing into Picardy, where he expected to meet the Duke of Burgundy, found not so much as a single Man from him. Surprised at so seemingly strange a Proceeding, he sent to the Duke (7), who was still before Nuz, to know the reason. But before I proceed, it will be necessary briefly to mention the Duke of Burgundy's affairs.

State of the Duke of Burgundy's Affairs. Mezerai. Commin.

The Duke was intent upon the Siege of Nuz, in hopes of taking that Place, and Cologn too, before Edward's arrival in France. But the Emperor approaching the Siege with an army four times as strong as the Duke's, without however offering him Battle, the Besiegers were so harrassed, that the Siege, instead of advancing, was retarded. And yet, the Duke, from a motive of Vain-glory, obstinately continued it, to show that the Emperor with all his forces was not able to raise it. Nothing could be more advantagious to the King of France, or more prejudicial to the Duke's affairs, than this unseasonable obstinacy. In the first place, it hindered his joining the King of England. 2. In the mean time, Sigismund Duke of Austria took from him the Earldom of Ferette (8), and the Duke of Lorrain ravaged Luxemburgh. 3. As soon as his Truce with France was expired, Lewis made himself master of Roye, Corbie, and Montdidier. In fine, when it was too late, and he was within eight days of being master of the Place,

He is bent to pursue the Siege of Nuz. Commin. Hall.

Commin.

pressed by Edward's instances, he agreed, it should be delivered to a Legate, to be disposed of according to the Pope's pleasure. After the raising of the Siege, the Duke's Army was so little able to march, that instead of speedily joining the English, it was put into Summer quarters. Then he went himself with a very small Train, to make his excuses to Edward. It was difficult for the King to digest such a negligence, in so important an affair. He began from that time to open his eyes, and perceive, he was engaged in the War for the interest of others, whereas he had imagined, it was for his own. On the other hand, the Duke of Burgundy's precaution, not to admit but few English at a time into Peronne, confirmed the King's suspicions. At last, he was quite undeceived by the behaviour of the Constable de St. Pol, who commanded in St. Quentin. The Constable, who was one of the chief promoters of the War, because he founded his greatness solely upon the dissention between the King of France and the Duke of Burgundy, had positively promised, to deliver St. Quentin to the King of England. Upon this assurance, the Duke of Burgundy would have conducted Edward into the place, that having so good a Pledge in his hands, he might be patient. But upon their approach, they were fired upon from the Town. At the same time, a body of Horse sallying out, killed some English Soldiers, who were most eager to enter, expecting to be admitted without difficulty. Very probably, the Duke of Burgundy himself was deceived, upon this occasion, by the Constable. For it is not likely, he should designedly cause such an affront to be put upon a Prince whom he yet wanted, and who had him in his power. He did all he could however to excuse the Constable, and feed the King's hopes. But finding Edward gave no credit to his words, but on the contrary bitterly reproached him, he left him next day, under pretence of hastening his Troops. It may be, he was not without some apprehension, that Edward might pursue his resentment.

Edward seeing himself thus deserted by the Duke of Burgundy and the Constable, and not hearing that the Duke of Bretagne made any motion, or there was any appearance of the Insurrections in France, he had been made to expect, found himself extremely embarrassed. In the mean time, a French Prisoner, the only one taken since the English Army's arrival, being released by the King's order, the Lords Howard and Stanley charged him, to present their respects to the King his master. The Prisoner discharging his Commission, Lewis began to think it was not without design, that this Compliment was made him, remembring what the English Herald told him concerning these Lords. He perceived, the Court of England desired to enter into Treaty, but would not make the first Advances. For his part, who was not so scrupulous, he resolved to improve this sort of overture. Philip de Commines says, he caused a certain Person of little note, but of good Sense, to be dressed like a Herald, and fully instructing him, sent him to the English army, to demand a Safe-Conduct for Ambassadors, and address himself for that purpose to the Lords Howard and Stanley. The pretended Herald being admitted into the King's presence, told him, "That he was ordered by the King "his master to represent to him, that the war between "their two Kingdoms could not but be destructive to both, "and the mutual Trade of the two Nations was on the "contrary a manifest advantage, which ought to be che-"rished. Then, he excused the King his master's coun-"tenancing the Earl of Warwick, assuring, it was not "out of ill-will to Edward, but on the account of the "Duke of Burgundy his irreconcileable enemy. He "added, that the Duke of Burgundy's and the Constable's "insincerity was so evident, that it was needless to men-"tion it, since he was very sensible of the effects. That "he was come in arms into a Country where he had "neither Castles, nor Friends, and he left it to him to "judge, whether the Conquest of France was so easy as "he had been made to believe: That however, the "King his master, knowing so great an Armament "could not be made without vast expence, was very "willing so to make him amends, as he should have rea-"son to be satisfied: That therefore he demanded a "Safe-Conduct for Ambassadors, with a Train of one "hundred Horse, that they might treat in a proper place, "with those of England, concerning a firm and lasting "Peace, between the two Kings and their Subjects."

1475. Edward calls a Council. August 13. Act. Pub. XII. p. 14, 15.

In Edward's circumſtances, the King of France's propoſal was very acceptable. Accordingly, the Herald was diſmiſſed with a Preſent (1), and the deſired Safe-Conduct. The ſame day, or the next, Edward called a Council (2), at which were preſent all the Lords in the Army, to the number of eighteen. It was reſolved, almoſt unanimouſly, that the Lord Howard and three others (3) ſhould confer with the King of France's Ambaſſadors, and a full power was given them to conclude a Peace upon theſe terms: 1. That Lewis ſhould pay the King, within a fortnight, the Sum of ſeventy five thouſand Crowns, and from thenceforward fifty thouſand Crowns yearly, at two payments, during the Life of the two Kings. 2. That the King of France ſhould promiſe to marry the Dauphin his Son to the King's eldeſt or ſecond Daughter, and allow his Daughter-in-law ſixty thouſand Livres a year. Upon theſe two conditions, the Ambaſſadors were empowered to promiſe in the King's name, that he would return into England with his Troops, immediately after the receipt of the ſeventy five thouſand Crowns; To conclude a Treaty of Amity and Alliance between the two Kings, with promiſe of mutual aſſiſtance againſt their rebellious Subjects; And laſtly, to ſign a Truce for ſeven years.

Conditions offered to the King of France.

The Plenipotentiaries of the two Kings (4) meeting near Amiens, at almoſt an equal diſtance from the two Armies, the Treaty was concluded the 28th or 29th of Auguſt, as Edward deſired, without any conſiderable alteration. Every thing being thus ſettled, ſeparate writings were drawn, on each particular Article of the Treaty.

Treaty of Amiens or Pequigny. p. 15.

By the firſt, the two Kings promiſed to decide all their differences by arbitrators, namely, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Clarence for the King of England, and for the King of France, the Archbiſhop of Lyons, and the Earl of Dunois. Moreover, Edward ingaged to quit the French territories, upon the receipt of the ſeventy five thouſand Crowns, without doing any damage, and to leave Hoſtages for the performance of his word.

p. 17. The ſecond concerned the ſeven years Truce, in which were included all the Allies of both the Kings, and expreſly the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne, if they deſired it.

p. 19. The third contained a mutual engagement of brotherly friendſhip between the two Kings, and expreſs articles concerning the Dauphin's marriage with Elizabeth Daughter of Edward.

p. 20. The fourth was in form of Letters Patents, whereby Lewis promiſed to pay annually to Edward during their lives, the Sum of fifty thouſand Crowns. This the Engliſh Authors call a Tribute, though the Letters Patents expreſs not under what title this yearly penſion was to be paid. Some ſay, it was limited to nine years. But no other limitation appears than the lives of the two Kings.

p. 21. Laſtly, Edward promiſed to releaſe Queen Margaret, for a ranſom of fifty thouſand Crowns, which the King of France was to pay for her, within five years. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that Margaret was accordingly releaſed the beginning of November this year, and Lewis XI punctually paid the Sum promiſed.

The Duke of Burgundy falls out with Edward. Commin. Hall. Hollingſh.

The Duke of Burgundy having notice that the two Kings were beginning to treat, departed immediately from his Army, to which he was returned, and made all poſſible haſte, in expectation of preventing this blow, but found the Truce was already ſigned. He fell upon Edward with bitter reproaches; to which Edward returned a ſuitable anſwer, telling him however he had taken care to include him in the Truce. But the Duke fiercely replied, he wanted not his mediation, and valued it ſo little, that if he treated for himſelf it ſhould not be till three months after his arrival in England. Thus parting extremely angry with each other, the Duke retired into his Country. The Conſtable de St. Pol did all that lay in his power, to perſuade Edward to break the Truce, offering to deliver St. Quentin, and lend him fifty thouſand Crowns. But Edward was far from renewing the War for his ſake, and truſting to his promiſes after having been ſo manifeſtly deceived.

Commin.

Commin. Before Edward's departure for England, it was thought proper, that the two Kings ſhould confer together upon Pequigny Bridge, with a Bar [or Grate] between them. Lewis came firſt to the place, attended with the Cardinal of Bourbon, and five other Lords. Edward arrived afterwards, accompanied likewiſe with a ſmall number of Lords (5). After they had both ſwore to obſerve the late Treaty, Lewis inviting Edward to Paris, told him, he would procure him agreeable diverſions with the fair Ladies of that City, and if he chanced to treſpaſs upon his chaſtity, the Cardinal of Bourbon ſhould be his Confeſſor, who would eaſily abſolve him. After ſome other railleries, Lewis made a ſign to the Lords that were with him to retire, and the Engliſh likewiſe did the ſame. When the two Kings were alone, they talked a good while together, and it was afterwards known, that the Conſtable, and the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne were the ſubject of their converſation. As to the Conſtable, Edward would not be concerned for him. As for Burgundy, Lewis asking him, what he ſhould do if that Prince refuſed to be included in the Truce, Edward replied, he might do as he pleaſed, if, after another offer, the Duke ſhould refuſe. But as for the Duke of Bretagne he plainly told him, that he would aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of his power, if attacked. Lewis thought proper to inſiſt no farther upon that ſubject, and in fine, they parted very well ſatisfied with each other (6).

1475. Conference of the two Kings at Pequigny. Commin. Hall. Hollingſh.

The interview being ended, Lewis repaired to Amiens, where the Lord Howard followed him as Hoſtage. Whilſt Lewis was waſhing his hands before ſupper, Howard whiſpered him in the ear, that he would undertake to perſuade the King his maſter to take a journey to Paris; to which Lewis returned no anſwer. Howard frequently hinted the ſame thing at table, without the King's ſeeming to hear him. However, he cauſed him to be afterwards told, that the War he was going to wage with the Duke of Burgundy not permitting him to go to Paris, he was very ſorry he could not enjoy the honour the King intended to do him. Philip de Commines remarks upon this occaſion, that there was nothing more feared by Lewis, than to ſee Edward reliſh France, nor any thing more paſſionately deſired by him, than to ſee him return into England. He was under ſuch apprehenſion that Edward would repent of the Truce, that he privately beſtowed penſions upon his principal Counſellors, to induce them to keep him in the reſolution to obſerve it. Commines could ſpeak of theſe things with certainty, ſince he was then in Lewis's ſervice and confidence. He adds moreover, that the Duke of Gloceſter, who was againſt the Truce, waiting upon the King of France, was received with extraordinary reſpect, and that the King forgot nothing to gain to his intereſt ſuch of Edward's Courtiers as were in any credit. The Engliſh Army approaching Amiens, Lewis cauſed the gates to be kept open, and ſent orders to the publick Inns, to entertain at free coſt all the Engliſh that came there. Moreover, he ſent to the King of England a preſent of three hundred waggon-loads of wine, for the uſe of his army; ſo deſirous was he to gain the hearts of the Engliſh, for fear ſome one of them ſhould make Edward ſenſible of his error. This preſent gave occaſion to ſay, that he found means to ſend home the Engliſh with cart-loads of wine. At length, all Lewis's fears vaniſhed with the departure of the Engliſh, who went away, ſays a Hiſtorian, extremely well pleaſed with the French gold and wine; adding, the penſions aſſigned to Edward's principal courtiers, amounted to ſixteen thouſand Crowns a year (7).

This was the true reaſon of Edward's ſupporting the Duke of Bretagne, and telling Lewis, who earneſtly preſſed him ſeveral times to deſert that Prince, that on the contrary, he would defend him to the utmoſt of his power.

Act. Pub. XII. p. 22.

1476. This open demonſtration of friendſhip for the Duke of Bretagne, cauſing Edward to imagine the Duke would be glad of an opportunity to ſhew his acknowledgment, he ſent Ambaſſadors (1) to him, under colour of renewing their Truce. There were but few difficulties in this negotiation. The Duke readily agreed to confirm the Truce (2), though often violated on the part of the Engliſh. He even deſiſted from his demand of fifty thouſand Crowns, for the damages ſuſtained by his Subjects. The King on his ſide, quitted his demands upon him for the armament made in his favour. Every thing being thus upon the terms of a perfect good underſtanding between the two Princes, the Ambaſſadors acquainted the Duke with the principal buſineſs of their ambaſſy. They told him, the King their Maſter was extremely deſirous, entirely to extinguiſh the Flames of the two factions which had been ſo long kindled in England; that the Earl of Richmond, who was in Bretagne, being the only ſurviving Perſon of the Houſe of Lancaſter, he intended to marry him to one of his daughters, in order to unite the two Houſes; that therefore he deſired him to ſend him the Earl, that he might give him marks of his favour, and thereby manifeſt to his whole Kingdom his earneſt deſire of procuring them a happy tranquillity.

Edward demands the Earl of Richmond of the Duke of Bretagne. Hall. Bronti. Hollingſh. Habington. Argentré. Act. Pub. XII. p. 23, 37.

The Duke gives up the Earl, and repents of it. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

The Duke of Bretagne was a good Prince, who judging of others by himſelf, and not believing Edward concealed ill deſigns under theſe appearances of moderation, ordered the Earl of Richmond to be put into the hands of the Ambaſſadors, to be conducted to England. Some however affirm, that a large Sum of Money preſented to the Duke by the Engliſh Ambaſſadors, rendered their inſtances more effectual. However this be, they departed with their prey, to imbark at St. Malo's. But whilſt they were on the road, one of the Duke's Counſellors (3) repreſented to him, that by this proceeding, he would be eternally infamous; that beſides, he could not in conſcience deliver a Prince, who thought himſelf ſafe under his protection, to his moſt mortal enemy, who demanded him only to deſtroy him, under the falſe pretence of an honorable ſettlement; that he would be accountable to God for this Action, whatever colour he might put upon it in the eyes of Men; and conjured him to conſider, what Honour, Juſtice and Religion required of him on this occaſion. Whether this remonſtrance made the Duke ſenſible of what he had not hitherto fully known, or ſtung him with remorſe of what he had done, he immediately diſpatched Peter Landais his favorite to St. Malo's, with orders to recover the Earl of Richmond out of the hands of the Ambaſſadors, if they were not yet imbarked. Landais arrived, juſt as they were entering the veſſel that was to carry them to England. He immediately gave private orders to help the two Priſoners to eſcape, whilſt himſelf conferred with the Ambaſſadors. The conference being ended, the two Earls were found to have taken ſanctuary in a Church, from whence Landais pretended they could not be removed. The Ambaſſadors complained of this fraud; but, after ſome frivolous excuſes, he plainly told them, the Duke his maſter, upon ſecond thoughts, believed he could not deliver the Earl to the King, without an indelible ſtain on his honour; that however, he would promiſe to guard him ſo carefully that Edward ſhould never receive any damage. The Ambaſſadors finding themſelves the weakeſt, were forced to be content with this promiſe, which eaſed in ſome meaſure their vexation to be thus diſappointed. Thus, by a ſort of miracle, the Earl of Richmond eſcaped the danger to which he was expoſed, Providence having preſerved him on this occaſion, in order to place him one day on the Throne of England.

He gets him again from the Ambaſſadors. Hall.

Alliance with Denmark. Act. Pub. XII. p. 25, 27, 29, 39.

The reſt of the year 1476, affords nothing remarkable concerning the affairs of England, but a Negotiation to renew the Alliance with Denmark; the death of the Archbiſhop of York at Guiſnes, where he was Priſoner; and ſome other inconſiderable affairs. But it will be neceſſary to ſpeak of thoſe of the Duke of Burgundy, which became of great conſequence both to England and France.

1476. Affairs of the Duke of Burgundy. Commin.

The Duke had accepted of the Truce offered by Lewis, not ſo much out of fear of his Arms, as from a deſire to carry war into Germany. He wanted to be revenged of the Duke of Lorrain, the Swiſs, and the Duke of Auſtria, but this would have been impoſſible, if the War with France had continued. In October, 1475, preſently after ſigning the Truce with Lewis XI, he attacked the Duke of Lorrain, and ſubdued his whole Duchy, without meeting much reſiſtance, except at Nanci, which endured a Siege of two Months. Lorrain being conquered, he formed the Project to humble the Swiſs, who had dared to declare againſt him, whilſt he was imployed in the Siege of Nuz. He uſed for pretence the Injury they had done to James of Savoy, Earl of Romont, in ſeizing his Territories. The Swiſs, who made yet no great Figure in Europe, ſeeing the Storm approaching, humbly ſued for Peace; but the Duke was inexorable. So leaving Lorrain in March 1476, he paſſed through Burgundy, and threw himſelf into the Country of Vaux, where he took three or four Towns. Then he laid Siege to Granſon, where were ſeven or eight hundred Swiſs, bent upon making a gallant defence. The Town having at length capitulated, the Duke broke the Articles, and put the Garriſon to the ſword. Mean while, a Body of Swiſs was advancing to relieve the Beſieged, but came too late. The Duke, contrary to the opinion of his Council, reſolved to meet this body, which was ſtill in the narrow Paſſages of the Mountains. To that end, he detached a hundred Archers to ſeize a certain paſs, and preſently after he marched himſelf to ſupport them. Theſe Archers meeting the Swiſs coming out of the Mountains, haſtily retreated towards the body which was marching after them. Whereupon, the Duke's Army imagining the Horſemen were repulſed by the Enemy, were ſeized with a panick, and took to flight, without the Duke's being able to rally them. He loſt only ſeven Men at arms, but all his baggage became a Prey to the Enemy.

His defeat at Morat. Commin.

This ill ſucceſs not being capable of diſcouraging him, he aſſembled his ſcattered Troops, and ſoon rendered them fit for action. About fifteen days after he took the field, and laid ſiege to Morat, a ſmall Town not far from Bern. Mean time, the Swiſs receiving ſupplies from ſome neighbouring Princes, marched, to the number of thirty thouſand Men, to fight him. The Battle was fought three weeks after the rout of Granſon, and the Duke was entirely defeated, with the loſs of eight thouſand Men.

His Concern at it.

This terrible misfortune ſo ſtruck the Duke, that he ſickened with grief. Philip de Commines even affirms, he was ſomewhat diſordered in mind. He remained ſix weeks at a Town called la Riviere, where he kept himſelf as it were concealed, and none durſt venture to ſpeak to him to comfort him. Mean time, ſeveral of the Princes who before were his Friends (4) declared againſt him. Then the Duke of Lorrain, perceiving it to be a favorable opportunity, appeared before Nanci, and took the place upon terms without the Duke of Burgundy's ſtirring to its relief. At length, when it was too late, and the Town ſurrendered, the Duke of Burgundy approached, and his Enemy being retired, undertook the Siege, where he met with difficulties which made him loſe a great deal of time, and proved the occaſion of his ruin.

1477. His defeat and death at Nanci. Commin.

Mean while, the Duke of Lorrain drew together Forces from all quarters, Lewis XI finding him Money for their ſubſiſtence. When he thought himſelf ſufficiently ſtrong, he approached Nanci, and encamped at St. Nicholas, expecting the effect of his correſpondence in the Enemy's Army, with Campobache, a Neapolitan Captain, in whom the Duke of Burgundy entirely confided. This City being now reduced to extremity, the Duke of Lorrain advanced to join battle. Then Campobache ſuddenly deſerted his maſter with about two hundred Lances (5), and went over to his Enemy. He left in the Army fourteen Men whom he had bribed, who were to alarm the Troops during the fight, and kill the Duke of Burgundy, if they had an opportunity. The Battle being fought on the 5th of January 1477, the Duke of Burgundy's Army was routed, and himſelf ſlain in the forty ſixth year of his age. He had reigned nine years and a half, amidſt continual troubles, employed one while in defending himſelf againſt the open or ſecret Attacks of Lewis XI, another while, in executing Projects beyond his ſtrength, which argued more ambition and raſhneſs, than prudence and counſel.

Alterations cauſed by the Death of the Duke of Burgundy.

The Duke of Burgundy's Death made a great alteration, not only in the Affairs of the Low-Countries, but alſo in thoſe of the neighbouring Princes. Nay, it may be ſaid to be the firſt and principal ſource of moſt of the Wars, wherewith Europe has been troubled ever ſince. The 1477. Duke of Burgundy left but one Daughter, called Maria, who was Heireſs to his large Dominions, and whom he had in ſome meaſure promiſed to Maximilian of Auſtria, Son of the Emperor Frederic. This Princeſs, about nineteen years old, ſaw herſelf not only forſaken by all the late Duke her Father's Friends, but moreover expoſed a Prey to Lewis XI, who immediately deprived her of Burgundy, with the Towns on the Somme, and even formed the Project to diſpoſſeſs her of all the reſt of her Dominions. In this preſſing neceſſity, her only refuge was the King of England's aſſiſtance, whoſe intereſt it was to oppoſe the growth of Lewis's Power. But Edward's whole Council being bribed and corrupted by the King of France's bounties, Maria obtained from that quarter empty wiſhes only for her proſperity, and compliments, which ended in nothing. To complete her misfortune, the young Princeſs ſaw herſelf alſo expoſed to the Tyranny of the Gantois, who ſeized her Perſon, removed all her Counſellors, beheaded two, and gave her a new Council entirely compoſed of their Creatures.

Mean time, this Princeſs's marriage was thought of. Some were for her eſpouſing the Dauphin of France. But Lewis having already entered into engagements with Edward, durſt not diſoblige him at ſuch a juncture. Others would have her married to the Duke of Guelders, and ſome to a German Prince. All but herſelf were conſulted about the choice of a Husband. Mean while Lewis continued his conqueſts. In May 1477, the Emperor Frederic ſending Ambaſſadors to Gant, to renew the Treaty concerning the Marriage of his Son Maximilian with Maria, the Ducheſs Dowager of Burgundy, Mother-in-law of the Princeſs, deſired her Brother Edward to ſend Ambaſſadors into Flanders to aſſiſt her in that Affair. Edward conſented, but would not promiſe to aid Maria againſt the King of France, though the Flemings and the Duke of Bretagne ſtrongly preſſed him. On the contrary, he agreed to prolong the ſeven years Truce concluded at Amiens, till a year after the death of one of the two Kings. Thus Edward acted directly contrary to the intereſts of England, in ſuffering the advancement of France, and the ruin of the Houſe of Burgundy. Three principal reaſons hindered his quarelling with France. The firſt, that being grown corpulent and heavy, he was no longer fit to bear the hardſhips of War. The ſecond, that his chief Counſellors were Penſioners to France. The third, that having promiſed his Daughter Elizabeth to the Dauphin, he was unwilling by any proceeding to obſtruct the marriage. Mean while, Lewis was extremely careful to keep him in theſe diſpoſitions, by punctually paying him the Penſion of fifty thouſand Crowns, and ten thouſand yearly for Queen Margaret's ranſom.

Shortly after, he received Ambaſſadors from England (1), who were come to ſettle the arbitration agreed on, concerning the differences between the two Crowns. But he had then other Affairs, which hindered him from thinking of this, and obliged him to defer it to a more proper ſeaſon (2).

1478. Death of the Duke of Clarence. Hall. Biondi. Habington. Hollingſh.

The beginning of the year 1478 was very quiet, with reſpect to the general Affairs I have been ſpeaking of. But at the ſame time, there paſſed at the Court of England, things which wholly ingroſſed the attention of the publick: I mean the tragical death of the Duke of Clarence, which it will be neceſſary to inſiſt upon a moment. This Prince was haughty and ambitious, of ungovernable Paſſions, of an inconſtant Temper, taking no care to conceal his Sentiments; in a word, of a very mean Genius. Whilſt the King his Brother lived unmarried, he could not help entertaining the hopes of ſitting one day on the Throne, though it was very unlikely, Edward would always remain in a ſtate of Celibacy. The King's Marriage deſtroying theſe hopes, he was diſpleaſed with the King himſelf, and eſpecially with the Queen and her family. As he was not careful to hide his diſcontent, he drew on himſelf the averſion of the Queen and her Creatures, who did not fail to do him ill offices. So Edward began by degrees to neglect him, and took no care to procure him advantages, which may eaſily be procured by a King for his Brothers. The Duke ſo reſented this contempt, that he ſcrupled not to join with the Earl of Warwick, to dethrone his own Brother. He repented it afterwards, and his repentance, as hath been ſeen, proved Edward's preſervation. He was in hopes a reward would quickly follow ſo ſignal a Service, reflecting only upon what he had done for the King, without conſidering the danger to which he had expoſed him. But Edward, prejudiced againſt him, thought, on the contrary, the bare pardon of the injury to be a ſufficient recompence for the ſervice he had received. Theſe Sentiments were inſtilled into him by his Queen, who having loſt the Earl of Rivers her Father during the Rebellion, could not forbear looking upon the Authors of it, as the objects of her vengeance. On the other hand, the Duke of Gloceſter, to the utmoſt of his power, privately ſowed diſſenſion between his Brothers. He was a Prince of greater ambition than the Duke of Clarence, but withal of a very different Character, proceeding to his ends by deep and artful Contrivances, which rendered his ways imperceptible. He always thought before he ſpoke, whereas the Duke of Clarence ruined himſelf by too freely diſcovering his Sentiments. It was difficult for two Brothers of ſo contrary Tempers to love one another. But in their diſcord, the Duke of Clarence uſed no Ceremony with his Brother, whilſt Gloceſter ſtrove never to give him publickly any advantage. Mean while, he gave him ſecret ſtabs, the more unavoidable, as they came from an unſuſpected hand. All the Hiſtorians agree, that from this time, the Duke of Gloceſter thought of ſecuring the Crown after the King's death, and therefore the Duke of Clarence could not but very much incommode him. This was however an undertaking, the execution whereof ſeemed very difficult, ſince his two elder Brothers had Children. But his Ambition made him think it not impracticable, in proceeding by degrees. The firſt ſtep was, to diſpatch the Duke of Clarence. To that end, he endeavoured to render him odious to the King, and cauſe him to conſider him as a ſecret enemy, who was privately labouring to ſupplant his Children. The Duke of Clarence's raſh expreſſions were extremely ſubſervient to his deſign. On the other hand, the Queen, who had a great Influence over the King, failed not to confirm his ſuſpicions.

Matters ſtanding thus, the King, as he was hunting in a Park belonging to Thomas Burdet (3), Confident of the Duke of Clarence, chanced to kill a white Buck, in which that Gentleman greatly delighted. Burdet was ſo concerned for the death of his favorite Buck, that in the firſt tranſports of his paſſion, he ſwore, he wiſhed the horns in the belly of him that killed it. Whereupon he was accuſed of High-Treaſon, condemned, and executed, within the ſpace of two days. Some ſay, his Imprecation concerned only the Perſon that adviſed the King to hunt in his Park. Be this as it will, the deſign, no doubt, of thoſe who ſo hotly proſecuted that unfortunate Gentleman, was, to induce the Duke of Clarence to expoſe himſelf by ſome raſh proceeding; of which his inconſiderate, impetuous, and haughty Temper, afforded great aſſurance. Accordingly, the Duke, who was then in Ireland, being returned to Court, talked very boldly to the King of his Friend's death, and bitterly complained of his diſregard for a Brother, to whom he owed his reſtoration to the Throne. In fine, he was ſo far tranſported with anger, that he threatened to be revenged. Neither was this all. After leaving the King, he dropped ſome farther no leſs imprudent expreſſions, intimating, his Brother was a Baſtard, and conſequently had no Right to the Crown. Nothing being more agreeable to the deſires of his enemies, than to ſee him thus run into their Snare, they ſo exaſperated the King againſt him, that he reſolved to deſtroy him. For that purpoſe, he held a Council, entirely conſiſting of the Duke of Clarence's enemies, where it was reſolved to apprehend him, accuſe him of High-Treaſon, and bring the Accuſation before the Parliament, then aſſembled. All this was immediately executed, that the Duke might not have leiſure to repent, and beg the King's Pardon. For had he been allowed time to come to himſelf, and implored the King's Mercy, his raſh expreſſions muſt have been conſidered only as the effect of a ſudden Paſſion, which deſerved not the rigorous puniſhment intended him. His affair being brought before the Parliament (4), he was accuſed of ſeveral Crimes, under the eight following Articles. I. By his ſeditious diſcourſes, he had endeavoured to draw upon the King the hatred of his Subjects, by accuſing him of unjuſtly putting Burdet to death. II. He had bribed ſome of his domeſticks and others to ſpread ſuch a report.

1478. III. He had ſaid the King made uſe of Necromancy to know the future. IV. He had taxed the King with poiſoning innocent perſons, whom he thought he could not legally deſtroy. V. He had affirmed, the King was not Son of the Duke of York, but of an adulterer admitted by the Ducheſs their Mother to her bed. VI. Inferring from thence, that the Crown was fallen to him, he had diſcovered his deſign to ſeize it, by requiring many perſons to ſwear to be true to him and his Heirs, without any exception of their Allegiance to the King. VII. He had accuſed the King of uſing Magick to take away his Life, by cauſing him to conſume away like a Taper. VIII. Laſtly, He had openly ſhewn his deſign to dethrone the King, in procuring an authentick Copy of the act of Parliament paſſed during the Earl of Warwick's Uſurpation, whereby the Crown was adjudged to him, after the death of Henry VI, and his Iſſue-Male.

All the Hiſtorians agree, it would have been very difficult to prove all theſe Articles of Impeachment, if the King had not declared himſelf a Party, and the Queen and the Duke of Gloceſter acted underhand to have him found guilty. Be this as it will, he was condemned to die. But there is in this Sentence a very remarkable Circumſtance. One of the chief reaſons of his Condemnation was, his affirming, the King not to be the Duke of York's Son, and that very thing ſerved afterwards for foundation to the Duke of Gloceſter to mount the Throne, in prejudice of Edward's Children. Herein muſt be admired the blindneſs of Men, and the Juſtice of God. Edward makes uſe of a falſe Accuſation to put his Brother to death, and thereby gives occaſion to ſuſpicions, which are to ſerve hereafter to ruin his own Children. The Duke of Clarence being condemned, all the favor he could obtain of the King his Brother, was, to chuſe the manner of his death. To avoid appearing on a Scaffold, he deſired (1), to be drowned in a butt of Malmſey (2). He left one Son named Edward, who inherited from his Grandfather, by the Mother's Side (3), the Title of Earl of Warwick, and a Daughter called Margaret, who was Counteſs of Saliſbury. As the death of the Duke of Clarence raiſed among the People a general Indignation, and murmurs againſt the King, it was deſigned to put a ſtop thereunto, by expoſing his body in St. Paul's Church, and giving out he died of immoderate Grief. But this Artifice was not capable of amuſing the People, who too plainly ſaw, in the Condemnation of that Prince, the terrible effects of his enemy's malice (4).

Edward creates his eldeſt Son Prince of Wales, and his youngeſt Duke of York. Sandford.

About three Months before, the King had created Edward his eldeſt Son Prince of Wales (5), and his ſecond Son Richard, Duke of York. The rejoicings at Court upon this occaſion, expreſſed not ſo much Joy of the Favorites, for the two Princes Promotion, as their ſatisfaction to ſee the Project of the Duke of Clarence's Ruin ſo near accompliſhed. Edward did not foreſee that his unjuſt Plot againſt his Brother, was the firſt ſtep towards the ruin of his own Sons. Had the Duke of Clarence lived, the Duke of Gloceſter would never have thought of ſacrificing them, as he did, to his ambition.

Act. Pub. XII. p. 52, ——61.

Shortly after the death of the Duke of Clarence, the Term taken by Lewis XI, and Edward, to decide their differences by arbitration, was further prolonged, and the Duke of Gloceſter appointed by Edward one of the Arbitrators (6), in the room of the Duke of Clarence.

Embaſſy from Lewis XI to Edward. p. 67—86.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in England, the Truce between Lewis and Maximilian being expired, Maximilian entered Burgundy, and took ſeveral places with great eaſe, by reaſon of the People's affection to the Houſe of Burgundy. Probably, he would then have taken poſſeſſion of the two Burgundies, if he had received from the Emperor his Father, a ſupply anſwerable to his occaſions. This Lewis very much feared, and as he knew it to be Edward's Intereſt to join forces with Maximilian, he forgot nothing to divert him therefrom. In July this year, he ſent a full power to prolong the Truce, till a hundred years after the death of the two Kings, and oblige him to the payment of the annual Penſion of fifty thouſand Crowns, ſo long as the Truce ſhould laſt. Moreover the Ambaſſador was empowered, to prolong for three years the Term agreed upon, to decide the differences by Arbitrators, and to promiſe for Lewis and his Succeſſors, to prolong it every third year, till all things were ſettled. The Ambaſſador being arrived at London, Edward appointed Commiſſioners to treat with him, and at length the Treaty was concluded as propoſed by Lewis, though not till February the 15th, 1479 (7). 1478.

p. 86.

Lewis ſhifts off the Dauphin's Marriage with Elizabeth. p. 89, 91. Hall.

What retarded a little this Negotiation was, Edward's deſire to ſecure, firſt, his Daughter Elizabeth's Marriage with the Dauphin. To that end, he ſent two Ambaſſadors (8) into France, with power to perform the Ceremony of betrothing. But Lewis, it is likely, found ſome excuſe to defer it. Mean while, he made the ſecond Payment of ten thouſand Crowns for Queen Margaret's Ranſom.

Thus Edward, contrary to his own, and the Kingdom's Intereſts, ſuffered himſelf to be managed by the King of France, or rather by his own Miniſters, bribed by that Prince. Lewis not content with diverting him by his Intrigues from aſſiſting the Ducheſs of Burgundy, ſent him alſo a Propoſal to divide betwixt them that Princeſs's Dominions, offering him for his part Flanders and Brabant (9). Edward cloſed with the Propoſal, but upon this condition, that in exchange for the Towns conquered in Flanders, Lewis ſhould give him others in Picardy, and particularly Boulogne (10). But Lewis was too apprehenſive of the neighbourhood of the Engliſh, to accept that condition. If he propoſed to him the Conqueſt of Flanders, it was only to engage him in a war with Maximilian and Maria, for fear he ſhould one time or other repent his deſerting them.

1479. Edward gives himſelf up to pleaſures.

But Edward was far from ſuch a thought. Inſtead of meditating War, he entirely abandoned himſelf to his pleaſures, with intention to paſs the reſidue of his days in effeminate Sloth. Mean while, theſe pleaſures which he ſo eagerly purſued, coſt him more than the moſt burdenſome War. And therefore, his Coffers being empty, he uſed divers illegal means to extort Money from his Subjects. The moſt terrible was, that of cauſing the rich to be accuſed of High-Treaſon, in order to confiſcate their Eſtates, or exact large Sums for their pardon. In the mean time, he continued, with ſeveral Princes, negotiations, tending to ſecure him the continuance of that repoſe he ſo paſſionately loved.

He raiſes Money by ill means. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

Negotiation with Denmark. Act. Pub. XII. p. 100.

The firſt of theſe negotiations was with the King of Denmark, their Alliance not having been well obſerved on either ſide. At laſt, that Prince ſending Ambaſſadors to London, the Alliance was confirmed and renewed, and a congreſs appointed at Hamburgh, to decide all their differences. One of the conditions of the Treaty was, that the Engliſh ſhould not ſet foot in Iſeland, without a Paſſport from the King of Denmark.

Treaty between Lewis and Edward. p. 97, 101, 103.

Two days after the concluſion of this Treaty, the French Ambaſſador and the King's Commiſſioners ſigned that before-mentioned, whereby Lewis XI promiſed, for himſelf and Succeſſors, to pay to the King of England fifty thouſand Crowns every year, as well during the life of the two Kings, as a hundred years after, to commence at the death of the ſurvivor. Next day was alſo ſigned another Treaty, prolonging the Truce, Friendſhip and good underſtanding between the two Kings during their life, and between their Succeſſors, for the ſpace of a hundred years, with promiſe of mutual aſſiſtance againſt their rebellious Subjects. The other Articles were, that if one of the two Princes was driven out of his Kingdom, the other ſhould be obliged to receive him, and aſſiſt him with all his Forces: That they ſhould make no Alliance without a mutual conſent: That the King of France ſhould ratify this Treaty, and cauſe it to be confirmed and ratified by the States: And that Edward ſhould likewiſe procure the Parliament's approbation. Laſtly, that the Dauphin's Marriage with the Princeſs Elizabeth ſhould be accompliſhed, according to the agreement at Amiens, and this new Treaty not be derogatory to the former. It does not appear that Lewis XI ever ratified this Treaty, which, probably, was made only to amuſe Edward. Lewis knew, he was bound to nothing without a formal ratification, which doubtleſs he was reſolved not to grant, tho' the Treaty contained only ſuch Articles as were propoſed by Project of a Marriage between Philip of Austria, and Anne, Edward's Daughter, p. 110.

As Lewis amused Edward with the Marriage of Elizabeth to the Dauphin, Maximilian used the same means to gain him to his interests. Though Philip his Son was but a year old, he offered Edward to marry him to Anne his third Daughter. Edward accepted the offer, and whilst the Marriage-Articles were settling, the two Princes sent one another Letters Patents, promising not to marry their Children without a mutual consent, during the space of three years.

and of his Daughter Catherine, with the Infante of Spain. p. 110.

About the same time, Edward had thoughts of marrying Catherine his fourth Daughter to John, Infante of Castile and Arragon, Son of King Ferdinand, and Isabella of Castile. Nay, it appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that Ambassadors were sent into Spain to hasten the Treaty, which however came to nothing.

Lewis duly pays the Pension. p. 45, 65, 111, &c. p. 112.

Mean while, Lewis duly paid the Pension of fifty thousand Crowns, as appears by several acquittances in the Collection of the Publick Acts. We find there likewise, that in March 1480, he compleated the Payment of Margaret's ransom.

He amuses Edward, Hall. Stow. Hollingsh. who sends him Ambassadors. Act. Pub. XII. p. 113.

Lewis readily performed all the Articles of the Treaty of Amiens, except the Dauphin's Marriage, for which he still found some fresh excuse, though he still persisted in his promise to fulfil that engagement. Edward, surprized at all these delays, called an extraordinary Council, where it was resolved to send Ambassadors to Lewis, peremptorily to demand the performance of his promise and the ratification of the late Treaty at London. The Lord Howard and Thomas Langton Treasurer of the Church of Exeter, were chosen for this Embassy. Howard, who was one of Edward's Confidents, was, very likely, the chief of those that suffered themselves to be corrupted by the King of France's favours.

Lewis continues to amuse him. Hall.

Mean time, Lewis was not a little embarrassed. He had given his word for the Marriage, and even bound himself by a Treaty, though he had never any thoughts of accomplishing it. On the other hand, his Ambassadors at London had signed another Treaty upon the foot proposed by himself, and yet he was resolved not to ratify it. His sole Aim had been to amuse Edward, for fear of his joining with the Arch-Duke. To free himself from these difficulties, he resolved to dissemble and continue to promise the compleating of the marriage, whilst, by Ambassadors sent into Scotland, he tried to perswade James III to break the Truce with England. This Negotiation succeeded to his wish. King James suffered himself to be governed by three Favorites, raised from the Dust, without advising with any Lord of his Realm. It was very easy, for the King of France to bribe those mercenary Souls, who promised to induce their Master to break the Truce with the English. And indeed, presently after, James made preparations which plainly discovered his design. Edward, surprized at the impending rupture between the King of Scotland and him, readily guessed the Author. He dissembled however his resentment, and only ordered an Army to be raised, the command whereof he resolved to give to his Brother the Duke of Gloucester. Then it was, that he began to open his eyes, and perceive the King of France's insincerity, who, ever since Burgundy's death, had amused him with false promises. Mean while, though he had lost all the favorable Opportunities, he turned his thoughts, though too late, to revenge. This appears in several pieces of the Collection of the Publick Acts, all dated the Year 1480, before the Scots had actually broke the Truce.

Embassy to Castile. p. 119.

First, he sent ambassadors (1) to Castile to make reparation for certain Outrages committed by the English, during the Earl of Warwick's administration, contrary to the Alliance between Castile and England. When a Prince offers of himself to repair the damages, his Subjects have done to another Nation, there is reason to presume it is with a view to some other design. Edward's aim was to engage the King of Castile to make war upon France, or at least, to hinder his assisting Lewis.

In the second place, he ratified the Treaty concluded by his Ambassadors at Hamburgh, with the King of Denmark.

Edward promises to aid Maximilian. p. 123, 124. p. 126, 127.

Thirdly, he confirmed his Treaty of Alliance with the late Duke of Burgundy, and promised to send Maximilian and Maria an aid of six thousand Men, pursuant to the Treaty. The Archduke promised on his part to pay him fifty thousand Crowns yearly, in case the King of France discontinued his Pension, and a War ensued upon that account.

Lastly, the Marriage of Philip Earl of Charolois Son of Maximilian and Maria, with Ann Daughter of Edward was concluded, with promise on both sides to cause it to be consummated as soon as the Parties were of age. By this Treaty Edward gave with his Daughter a hundred thousand Crowns. But by a subsequent Treaty, the Dower was set against the yearly Pension of fifty thousand Crowns, to be paid by the Archduke instead of the King of France, and they mutually forgave one another.

1480. He concludes the Marriage of his Daughter with Philip. p. 128. 134, 138.

By another Treaty, Edward promised to use his Endeavours to procure Maximilian a Truce with the King of France; to offer to be arbitrator himself between Lewis and him; to try to be received as such; and if Lewis refused, ingaged to declare against him. This Proceeding was not very fair, but probably, he did not think himself obliged to act more sincerely than Lewis had done.

Embassy to France. p. 135.

Edward having thus settled his matters with Maximilian and Maria, sent again Ambassadors to France, to press the Marriage of his Daughter Elizabeth with the Dauphin. If Lewis had complied, very likely he would not have scrupled to relinquish the Archduke. But Lewis according to custom, using some ill excuse, he equipped a Fleet, and gave the command to John Middleton, to go to the assistance of his new Allies.

1481. The King of Scotland prepares for War. Hall. Hollingsh.

Mean time, the King of Scotland continued his preparations with intention to break with England. But before I speak of the success of this War so little expected by Edward, it will be proper briefly to relate what passed then in Scotland, with the situation of the Affairs of that Kingdom.

Affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

James III. who came to the Crown at seven Years of age, being out of his Minority, had suffered himself to be so corrupted by Flatterers, that he made his will the sole rule of his actions. Without entering into a needless detail of the outrages he commited upon his Subjects, it will suffice to say in a word, he was deemed a real Tyrant. He had three Ministers or Favorites (2), Men of mean birth, who governed him entirely and whose sole view was to render him independent of the Laws, that they themselves might rule in his name with an arbitrary power. The King had two Brothers, namely, Alexander Duke of Albany, and John. The last speaking too freely of the King his Brother's conduct, was thrown into Prison, and there put to death by having his Veins opened. As the Favorites were afraid, Alexander would revenge his death, they perswaded the King to confine him in a Castle.

James oppresses his Subjects. He gives himself up to his Favorites.

Puts one Brother to death, and imprisons another.

Edward prepares for his Defence.

At this Juncture it was that James, hated by his People, and particularly by the Nobility, undertook, without the least pretence, to break the Truce with the English. Edward was vexed to see the approaches of a rupture that would divert him from the War with France, to which he was much more inclined. Mean while, not to neglect all necessary precautions, he gave orders for the defence of the borders, and at the same time committed to certain Persons of Ireland, the care of making an Alliance in his Name, with the Earl of Ross Lord of the Isles, to give his Enemy a diversion from that quarter.

Act. Pub. XII. p. 139. 142.

James enters England, and carries off some Booty.

In June 1481, the Scots made an irruption into the borders before Edward's Army was ready. They carried away some booty, and that was all these mighty preparations came to. Edward made no haste to send an Army against Scotland, as well because he still hoped to end this Affair amicably, as because he knew King James's circumstances to be such, that he could not do him much hurt. His grand design was to be revenged of Lewis XI. For though that Prince, with his usual dissimulation, still put him in hopes, he would perform his promise with respect to the Marriage, and though he punctually paid twenty five thousand Crowns every six Months, Edward plainly perceived, he intended not to call in his word with regard to the first Article, and that a rupture was unavoidable.

Edward thinks more of France than Scotland.

Project of Marriage between the Prince of Wales, and Ann of Bretagne. Act. Pub. XII. p. 142.

For this reason he renewed his Alliance with the Duke of Bretagne, and concluded the Marriage of the Prince of Wales his Son, with Ann eldest Daughter of that Duke, or in case she died before consummation, with Isabella her youngest Sister, upon these conditions: That if there should be several Sons, the second, or next to the Heir of the Crown of England, should be Duke of Bretagne, and reside in the Country; That if the Duke should hereafter have a Son born in wedlock, he should espouse her of Edward's Daughters that was most suitable to his age; That if Edward had no Daughter to give him, the Duke should not marry his Son without the King's content. Lastly, it was agreed betwixt them that if the King of France made war upon the Duke of Bretagne, Edward should send the Duke three thousand Men at his own

All theſe Treaties, theſe renewings of Alliances, theſe projects of marriages, ſhow, Edward intended to carry War into France (1).

The Duke of Albany eſcapes into England. Buchanan. Act. Pub. XII. p. 154.

Whilſt Edward was intent upon every thing conducive to the good ſucceſs of his undertaking, Alexander Duke of Albany, Brother of the King of Scotland, eſcaped out of priſon, and came by Sea into England, to implore the King's protection. Beſides the general reaſons which all the Scots had to complain of their Sovereign, Alexander had very particular ones. The Death of the Duke his Brother, and his own impriſonment, violently inclined him to ſeek means to be revenged, and doubtleſs, ambition greatly conduced to inflame his paſſion. The Engliſh and Scotch Hiſtorians have limited his deſire of revenge, to ſome general views of reclaiming the King his Brother, and procuring to himſelf the reſtitution of his eſtate. But the Collection of the Publick Acts furniſhes authentick proofs, that Alexander's deſign was to be poſſeſſed of the Throne.

Treaty of the Duke of Albany with Edward. June 10. p. 156.

We find there his Treaty with Edward, wherein he aſſumes the Title of King of Scotland, and promiſes to do homage for that Kingdom to the Crown of England. He ingages moreover to break the antient Alliance of France with Scotland, and make one with Edward againſt Lewis XI; to deliver Berwick to England, and marry Cecily, Edward's Daughter, affianced to Prince James his Nephew, in caſe, by the judgement of the Church, he could be divorced from his Wife. That if he could not ſucceed, he promiſes to marry his Son only to a Princeſs of England. Edward obliges himſelf on his part, to aſſiſt him with all his power to take poſſeſſion of the Throne of Scotland. This Treaty being ſigned, Edward ſent an Army againſt Scotland (2), under the command of the Duke of Gloceſter his Brother, whom the Duke of Albany would accompany, but without taking however the title of King. Probably, this Treaty was a ſecret known to few Perſons. At the ſame time, Edward gave the command of a Fleet to Robert Ratcliff, to act againſt Scotland. The Duke of Gloceſter advancing to the borders of the two Kingdoms, took the Town of Berwick, and being unwilling to loſe time in beſieging the Caſtle, left it inveſted (3) and marched directly to Edinburgh.

Troubles in Scotland. Buchanan. Biondi. Habington.

Whilſt the Duke of Gloceſter was advancing at the head of his Army, King James who had wantonly undertaken this War without concerting meaſures to proſecute it vigorouſly, was greatly embarraſſed. The only means he had to reſiſt the Engliſh was to aſſemble the Nobility; but he durſt not attempt it, knowing how much they were diſpleaſed with him and his Miniſters. He was forced however to reſolve it, or caſt himſelf upon the mercy of the Engliſh. So, the Lords being ſummoned, came with their Troops to Lauther, where they were expected by the King. But to what ſtreights ſoever that Prince was reduced, he altered not his conduct. His three favorites were his ſole Council, and ſcarce any dared to approach him but themſelves or their creatures. The Nobles, full of indignation at this conduct, reſolved to embrace ſo fair an opportunity to be rid of thoſe by whom the King was beſet. After conſulting together upon what was to be done, ſome of them well-attended came to the King's apartment, and carrying away the three favorites who had ſheltered themſelves in his room, brought them to the Army, where they cauſed them to be immediately hanged. James, extremely terrified, dreading alſo an attempt upon his life, promiſed to reform his conduct for the future; but a few days after, withdrew to the Caſtle of Edinburgh. So, the army being without a leader, disbanded themſelves, and the Lords returned to their homes.

The Duke of Gloceſter becomes maſter of Edinburgh. Buchanan. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

The Duke of Gloceſter hearing of this diſorder, haſtened his march to Edinburgh, and entered the City without oppoſition. He would have conferred with the King, but it was not even poſſible to inform him of his deſire. This obſtinacy to hearken to nothing, obliged the Duke of Gloceſter to publiſh, by ſound of Trumpet, in all the quarters of Edinburgh, that if, before September, the King of Scotland did not obſerve the Treaties made with the King of England, he would deſtroy the whole Kingdom with fire and ſword. King James's engagement were chiefly to keep the Truce, and return the Money received for the dower of the Princeſs Cecily, affianced to the Prince his Son. To this the Duke of Gloceſter added, that he ſhould recall the Duke of Albany and reſtore him to his eſtate and honours. James equally unable to reſiſt his enemies and to perform his engagements, made no anſwer. Mean while, the Nobles being aſſembled at Hadington, ſent Deputies (4) to the Duke of Gloceſter, to acquaint him, it was their earneſt deſire, the intended marriage ſhould be conſummated, and that neither they nor the States were to be blamed, that the Truce was not punctually obſerved. The Duke of Gloceſter replied, the marriage being projected only to maintain a good underſtanding between the two Nations, and King James having wantonly broke it without any provocation, he did not know whether the King his Brother deſired the marriage to be conſummated: That however he had orders to receive the ſums that were paid in part of the Princeſs's dower: That as for the Truce, it would be aſſuredly obſerved by England, provided the King his Brother was put in poſſeſſion of the Caſtle of Berwick, or at leaſt, the Scots would promiſe not to aſſiſt the Beſieged.

Matters ſtanding thus, the Duke of Albany demanded of the Scotch Lords a Safe-Conduct, and obtaining it, he went and conferred with them. In the conference it was agreed, That the Duke of Albany ſhould be made Regent of Scotland: That the Citizens of Edinburgh ſhould be obliged to pay the King of England the money received by James, in caſe the projected marriage did not take effect: Laſtly, That the Caſtle of Berwick ſhould be ſurrendered to the Duke of Gloceſter. For the Duke of Albany's private ſecurity, the Archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, the Biſhop of Dunkeld, the High-Chancellor, the Earl of Argyle, promiſed to procure him a general pardon for all crimes whatever, even for attempting to dethrone the King; and to cauſe him to be reſtored to his whole eſtate. On the other hand, the Duke promiſed to acknowledge the King his Brother for his lawful Sovereign, and to ſwear Allegiance to him. This gives occaſion to preſume, his Treaty with Edward was known in Scotland, or the Duke thought proper to diſcover it, that this clauſe might be included in the pardon. This agreement being made (5), the Duke of Albany, either out of pure generoſity, or becauſe he thought he ſhould meet with too many obſtacles, relinquiſhed his project of placing himſelf on the Throne. On the other hand, the Duke of Gloceſter ſpent ſome time at Newcaſtle, till the King his Brother ſhould acquaint him with his pleaſure, concerning his Daughter's marriage (6).

James being reſtored diſſembles his Reſentment. Buchanan. Hall.

The Duke of Albany ſeeing himſelf thus maſter of the Kingdom, reſtored the King his Brother to his former eſtate, reſerving to himſelf only his own eſtate, and the glory of his generoſity. James pleaſed, as may be imagined, that his fear was his only puniſhment, ſeemed at firſt to behave very differently from what he had done before. Preſently after, he reſolved to go to Amiens and viſit the relicks of St. John, or perhaps to take new meaſures with Lewis XI. But I do not know whether he executed this deſign, though there is in the Collection of the Publick Acts a Safe-Conduct for him and a thouſand attendants. Be this as it will, his diſſimulation laſted not long. He reſumed his formed courſe of life, as well as his enmity to his Brother, and reſolved to diſpatch him. This deſign was kept ſo private, that when the Duke was told of it, he had but juſt time to throw himſelf into a fiſhing-boat, and eſcape to the Caſtle of Dunbar with ſome friends. From thence he ſent into England the Earl of Angus and ſome others (7) to renew with Edward the Treaty made the laſt year, and which was ſet aſide by the intervening agreement. This Treaty was confirmed February 11. 1483, with additional articles. But Edward's death, which happened preſently after, prevented the execution. Mean while, the Duke of Albany having now, purſuant to the Treaty, delivered the fortreſs of Dunbar to the Engliſh, and ſeeing no appearance of being relieved, withdrew into France, where he was unfortunate-

Edward's affairs are in an ill way upon the Death of the Dutcheſs of Burgundy. Mezerai. P. Daniel.

The War with Scotland being ended, Edward turned all his thoughts to the War he deſigned to carry into France. But he was far from being in ſo favorable circumſtances to be revenged of Lewis XI, as before the rupture with Scotland. Maria Ducheſs of Burgundy, being killed by a fall from her horſe in March 1481, the Archduke her Spouſe had ſo little authority among the Flemings, that he was forced to ſuffer his Children by that Princeſs to remain in the hands of the Gantois. Then Lewis XI, uſing all his policy to inſpire the Flemings with a dread of the Houſe of Auſtria's power, managed ſo dextrouſly with the Gantois, that he obtained their conſent to give the Dauphin his Son, Margaret Daughter of their deceaſed Ducheſs, with the Earldoms of Artois, Burgundy, Maconnois, Auxerre and Charolois. This Treaty was made with that ſecrecy that Edward had no notice of it; ſo that Lewis ſtill continued to amuſe the Engliſh Ambaſſadors, even after it was ended to his wiſh. The firſt news they had of it, was the arrival of the young Dauphineſs, two years old, who was brought to Paris in April 1482. The nuptials were ſolemnized in July. This was a great vexation, and moſt outragious affront to Edward, who cauſed the Princeſs his Daughter to be ſtiled Madam the Dauphineſs. He had perhaps forgot the affront he himſelf put upon Lewis with regard to his own marriage, or thought love would excuſe it; but Lewis believed himſelf no leſs excuſed by politicks, and what Kings call reaſons of ſtate. Be this as it will, Edward full of indignation and rage, bent all his thoughts to revenge; but it was too late, the opportunities he had neglected were irrecoverably loſt. He could no longer rely upon the aſſiſtance of the Flemings, who had ſo openly ſhown their attachment to the intereſts of France. The Duke of Bretagne was ſeized with a melancholy, which rendered him incapable of any conſiderable undertaking. The King of Scotland had no reaſon to be pleaſed, and all that Edward could expect from his Alliance with the Kings of Spain and Portugal, was, that they would not give any Aſſiſtance to Lewis. So to be revenged, Edward muſt, like Henry V, attack France with the forces of England alone. But France was very far from being in the ſame circumſtances, as when Henry V began the War. Nevertheleſs, in ſpite of improbability of ſucceeding in ſuch an undertaking, Edward was bent upon it. For that purpoſe, he aſſembled all the Lords that were at Court or near London, and in a very moving ſpeech repreſented to them how great reaſon the Engliſh nation, and himſelf in particular, had, to reſent the grievous affronts put upon them by the King of France. He forgot not to diſplay the title of the Kings of England to the Crown of France. That was the chief topick to touch the hearts of the Engliſh. In ſhort, he added whatever he thought capable to perſwade them, not only of the neceſſity of a War with France, but alſo of the great probability of a happy ſucceſs. There is no need of much eloquence to induce the Engliſh to wage War with France. All the Lords unanimouſly declared, they thought the War juſt and neceſſary, and aſſured the King, they were ready to ſerve him with their lives and fortunes. The report being ſpread in the Kingdom, that a War with France was reſolved, an extraordinary joy appeared in Peoples faces, as if the news of ſome great victory had been received.

Hall.

But whilſt preparations were making for this important war, Edward was ſeized with a mortal diſtemper, which diſcovered to him the vanity of all his projects. When he found himſelf mortally ſick, he beheld with another Eye than before, whatever had ingroſſed him during his paſt Life; and it is pretended, he ſhewed marks of a ſincere repentance. But in the laſt moments, the great ſearcher of hearts alone can perfectly judge of the ſentiments expreſſed by the Tongue. Edward died the 9th of April, in the forty ſecond year of his age (1), after a Reign of two and twenty years and one month. The cauſe of his death is variouſly reported. Some accuſe the Duke of Gloceſter of poiſoning him. But this Accuſation being groundleſs, ought not to be too lightly credited. Philip de Commines pretends, Edward died with grief and vexation, to ſee himſelf baffled and deceived by Lewis XI. But what he ſays is to be conſidered only as a bare conjecture, and the rather, as Edward was convinced, two years before, of Lewis's Inſincerity. The moſt probable opinion is, that he died of a ſurfeit, being uſed to divert his cares with exceſſive eating and drinking (2).

Character of Edward IV. Moor. Habington.

I have hitherto ſpoken only of Edward the IV's moſt ſhining Actions, by reaſon of their connexion with the publick Affairs. It will be neceſſary now to ſay ſomething of his perſon, and deſcribe the good and bad qualities of his body and mind. But firſt, I cannot forbear once more to remark, that a man muſt be upon his guard, with reſpect to the Hiſtorians that ſpeak of this Prince, as well as of his Brother Richard III. The greateſt part wrote when the Throne was filled with the Princes of the Houſe of Lancaſter, who were extremely jealous of their Rights, and would not willingly have ſuffered them to be blemiſhed, or the Kings of the Houſe of York to be praiſed. The After-writers, when the Civil Wars were forgot, tranſcribed what they found in theſe firſt Hiſtorians, and frequently gave for truth, what was only the effect of the prejudice or policy of the former Hiſtorians. For my part, who have no Intereſt to blacken this Prince's reputation, I have endeavoured to avoid that exceſs, without concealing however either his failings or ill qualities. 1483.

When Edward aſcended the Throne, he was one of the handſomeſt Men in England, and perhaps in Europe. This is acknowledged by all. His noble Mien, his free and eaſy Air, his affable Carriage, prepoſſeſſed every one in his favor. Theſe qualities, joined to an undaunted Courage, gained him among the People, an eſteem and affection, extremely ſerviceable to him, in many circumſtances of his Life. Philip de Commines affirms, he owed his reſtoration, to the Inclination, the principal London Ladies had for him. But that would have been inconſiderable, had he not likewiſe acquired the affection of their Husbands, and in general, of moſt part of the Engliſh. If he had not depended upon the hearts of the people, he would never have ventured to attempt the recovery of the Throne, with the help of two thouſand Men, who were moſtly Foreigners. For ſome time, he was exceeding liberal, but at laſt became covetous, not ſo much from his natural Temper, as from a neceſſity to ſupply the immoderate expences, into which he was thrown by his pleaſures. Though he had a great extent of wit, and a ſolid judgment, he committed however ſeveral very great errors. The firſt was, when he ſuffered himſelf to be ſurprized by the Earl of Warwick. But that fault was in great meaſure repaired, by the dexterity and readineſs wherewith he freed himſelf from the Archbiſhop of York. The ſecond was, to truſt ſuch perſons as betrayed him, and were ſold to France. The third, to ſuffer himſelf to be ſo long deceived by Lewis XI, who was univerſally exclaimed againſt for his ill Faith. Moſt Hiſtorians have extremely aggravated this error, as being ignorant, that from the year 1480, he began to take meaſures to make war upon Lewis, as appears in what has been quoted from the Collection of the Publick Acts. Two other errors are alſo aſcribed to him, which may be more eaſily excuſed. The firſt is, his breaking off the war with France for an inconſiderable Sum, at a time when he might have flattered himſelf with the hopes of ſucceſs. But if the circumſtances of this affair be well examined, it will be eaſily ſeen, that being forſaken by the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne his Allies, it would have been very raſh to purſue with his own Forces alone, the execution of ſo great an enterprize, which, probably, would have proved unſucceſsful. Another error laid to his charge, is, his not joining with the Heireſs of Burgundy, to ſtop the progreſs of the King of France. I own, that was a real fault. However, it may be conſiderably leſſened, by the examples of ſeveral Princes eminent for their Abilities, who obſerved the ſame conduct on the like occaſions. Uncertain of the events, Princes often imagine they ſhall be great gainers by ſetting their neighbours at variance, in hopes of their weakening one another. But the ſucceſs ſometimes happens not to anſwer their expectations. It is certain, if Maria of Burgundy, and afterwards the Archduke her Husband had more vigorouſly reſiſted the attacks of Lewis XI, nothing was more capable to render Edward the Umpire of Europe, than the mutual weakening of theſe two powers. By this conduct it was that he made himſelf courted by the King of France, and the Duke of Burgundy, becauſe he was always in condition to make the balance incline to one ſide. He hoped, perhaps, it would be always the ſame; but he had to deal with a more artful Prince than himſelf.

Faults aſcribed to Edward.

Inſtances of his Cruelty.

Theſe are properly political faults, which are often conſidered as ſuch, only becauſe of the events which are not in Man's power. But the Crimes Edward is more juſtly charged with, are his Cruelty, Perjury, and Incontinence. The firſt appears in the great number of Princes and Lords, whom, after taking them priſoners, he put to death on the Scaffold. If ever there was room to exerciſe Mercy in caſe of Rebellion, it was at that fatal time when it was almoſt impoſſible to ſtand neuter, and ſo difficult

1483. difficult to chuſe the juſteſt ſide between the two Houſes, that were contending for the Crown. And yet, we don't find, Edward had ever any regard to that conſideration. The death of the Prince of Wales, Son of Henry VI, murdered almoſt in his preſence; and that of Henry himſelf, notwithſtanding his innocence, may perhaps be juſtified in ſome meaſure, by thoſe who think nothing unlawful when a Throne is in queſtion; but they will never be excuſed by thoſe who have any tincture of Religion. As for the death of the Duke of Clarence, I don't know whether it would be poſſible to find the leaſt ſoftning, if it be true, as it is very probable, that he was innocent.

His Breach of Faith.

Edward's breach of faith was viſible, in the unjuſt puniſhment of the Lord Wells and his Brother-in-law, after drawing them out of Sanctuary by a Safe-Conduct; in that of the Baſtard of Fauconbridge, whoſe Crime he had pardoned: And laſtly, in his Oath at York, taken even with intention to break it. All theſe actions are of the number of thoſe, that can be excuſed only by reaſons of State; weak excuſe in things where Honour and Religion are concerned.

His Incontinence. Moor.

As for Edward's Incontinency, his whole Life may be ſaid to be one continued Scene of Luſt. He had many Concubines, but eſpecially three, of whom he ſaid, One was the merrieſt (1), the other the wittieſt, and the third the holieſt in the World, for ſhe was always in a Church, but when he ſent for her. He had however but two natural Children, both by Elizabeth Lucy, (to whom he is ſaid to have been contracted before his marriage,) Arthur ſirnamed Plantagenet, created Viſcount L'Iſle by Henry VIII (2), and Elizabeth, Wife of Sir Thomas Lumley. I ſhall ſay nothing of Edward's Religion, ſince Hiſtorians mention it only in relating his Death-bed diſcourſes.

Hall. Stow.

Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

His Good-Fortune.

What is moſt ſurpriſing in the Life of this Prince, is his good fortune, which ſeems to be almoſt miraculous. He was raiſed to the Throne after the loſs of two Battles, the firſt by the Duke his Father, the other by the Earl of Warwick, then devoted to the Houſe of York. The head of the Father was ſtill upon the Walls of York, when the Son was proclaimed at London. Edward eſcaped, as it were by Miracle, out of his Confinement at Middleham. He was reſtored to the Throne, or at leaſt received into London at his return from Holland, before he had vanquiſhed, and whilſt his fortune yet depended upon the deciſion of a Battle, which the Earl of Warwick was ready to give him. In a word, he was ever victorious in all the Battles where he was preſent (3). 1483.

His Iſſue.

Elizabeth his Queen brought him a numerous Iſſue, namely, three Princes, and eight Princeſſes, of whom one Son and two Daughters died in their Infancy (4). We ſhall ſee preſently the fate of his eldeſt Son Edward his Succeſſor, and of his Brother Richard Duke of York.

Elizabeth the eldeſt of his Daughters (5) was promiſed in marriage to the Dauphin, Son of Lewis XI, afterwards King of France by the Name of Charles VIII. In proceſs of time, ſhe was married to Henry VII, King of England.

Cecily, who was affianced to the Prince of Scotland, eſpouſed the Lord Viſcount Wells, and after his death, another whoſe Name I know not, ſhe died without Iſſue (6).

Ann was contracted to Philip, Son of Maximilian of Auſtria and Maria of Burgundy. But that Marriage not taking effect, ſhe eſpouſed Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, by whom ſhe had two Sons, who died without Iſſue.

Bridget was a Nun, [at Dartford.]

Mary, who was promiſed to the King of Denmark died at Greenwich before her marriage was ſolemnized.

Catherine, whom the King her Father would have given to the Infante of Spain, was married to William Courtney Earl of Devonſhire, by whom ſhe had a Son created Marquiſs of Exeter, in the reign of Henry VIII.

KING EDWARD IV
APEL of WINDSOR.

From a Limning in a Manuscript-book now in the Library at Lambeth.

17. EDWARD V.

1483. EDWARD V. is proclaimed. April 9.

AFTER the death of Edward IV, the Prince his eldeſt Son, between twelve and thirteen years of age, was proclaimed King by the name of Edward V. The reign of this Prince was ſhort and unfortunate; if the two months and twelve days that he bore the title of King, and which were wholly ſpent in depriving him of the Crown, even before he had ſolemnly received it, is not rather to be deemed an Interregnum. However, as during that ſhort ſpace, he was generally acknowledged for Sovereign of England, Hiſtorians have made no ſcruple to rank him among the Kings. The whole ſubject of this reign conſiſts only of the means uſed by the Duke of Gloceſter to diſpoſſeſs the young King his Nephew, and place himſelf in the Throne. But before I enter upon the relation of theſe deteſtable practices, it will be neceſſary to ſhew the ſtate of the Court of England before the death of Edward IV.

State of the Court before Edward's Death.

Elizabeth Woodville, who from a ſubject was become Queen, by her marriage with Edward, held the firſt rank at Court, as well by the privileges common to all Queens, as by her great credit. From the time of her marriage, ſhe had acquired an influence over the King which ſhe preſerved to the day of his death. Her birth by her Father's ſide was not very conſiderable (1). But her Mother, who had been Wife of the famous Duke of Bedford, was of the Houſe of Luxemburgh, illuſtrious for the Princes, Kings, and Emperors it had given to Europe. So, conſidering Elizabeth as derived from thence, it is not at all ſtrange, ſhe ſhould have a great ſoul, and think herſelf as worthy to command, as the nobleſt Lords of England. Mean time, as being Queen gave her no right to interpoſe in the publick affairs, ſhe artfully aſſumed it by her aſcendant over the King. Though Edward often proved falſe to her, ſhe bore it with patience and without any ſigns of uneaſineſs. Edward charmed to find himſelf at liberty to purſue his inclinations, without danger of continual reproaches, repaid this moderation with all ſorts of condeſcenſions, which the Queen knew how to improve. The advancement of Sir Richard Woodville her Father to the honour of Earl of Rivers (2), and the marriage of her Brother with the richeſt Heireſs of the Kingdom, were the firſt proofs ſhe gave of her power. After that, Edward heaped honours and riches upon this family, even to the deſiring to marry his Brother-in-law Anthony to the King of Scotland's Siſter (3), as appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts. When the Prince of Wales was of age to have a Governor, this ſame Lord, become Earl of Rivers, was entruſted with that high Office. The Queen forgot not her own Children by her former Husband Sir John Grey [of Groby.] Thomas Grey her eldeſt Son, was made Marquiſs of Dorſet, Governor of the Tower, and keeper of the King's treaſures. Richard Grey his Brother, was created a Baron, and had a conſiderable poſt about the Prince of Wales.

Act. Pub. XII. p. 171.

Two Parties at Court, the old and the new Nobility.

If the Queen had confined her favours to her Sons, her Father, and her Brother, there would have been no reaſon to think it very ſtrange. But it cannot be denied, that ſhe made an ill uſe of her power, by cauſing to be created Peers, many perſons who would have had no pretenſion to that honour, if they had not been ſupported by her favour. This gave occaſion to the diſtinction in thoſe days, between the ancient and the new Nobility. But if this diſtinction redounded not to the honour of the laſt, that diſadvantage was amply repaired, by the places of honour and profit procured them by the Queen. By degrees ſhe had as it were baniſhed the ancient Nobility from the Court, where appeared ſcarce any but Lords of the new Creation, all attached to the Queen. It was much the ſame in all the reſt of the Kingdom, where the moſt conſiderable poſts were filled by ſuch as the Queen knew to be her creatures. Her aim was to preſerve her power during the King's life, and in caſe ſhe ſurvived him, to ſecure the Government of the Kingdom in her Son's name, when he ſhould be on the Throne. But by a fatality very common to the beſt contrived projects, this very thing proved the occaſion of her own and her family's ruin. 1483.

The King protects the new Nobility. Moor.

The Queen having thus openly declared againſt the ancient families, it is eaſy to conceive ſhe was not beloved. Accordingly ſhe took all poſſible care to hinder the Lords whom ſhe did not like, from having the King's ear. Mean while, it was not in her power to expel the Court three Lords of the ancient Nobility whom the King loved, becauſe they had done him ſignal ſervices. Theſe were Henry Stafford Duke of Buckingham, William Haſtings, and Thomas Stanley.

Heads of the Nobility.

The Duke of Buckingham

The firſt, who was of a very ancient Family (4), had moreover the advantage of being deſcended from a Daughter of Thomas of Woodſtock Duke of Gloceſter, ſeventh Son of Edward the third, and enjoyed the office of High-Conſtable.

The Lord Haſtings.

The Lord Haſtings (5) was High-Chamberlain. The King had a ſingular affection for him, becauſe of his conſtant loyalty, of which he had given proofs in the time of his adverſity; particularly when he was forced to fly into Holland. This Lord was extremely attached to the King's perſon, but loved not the Queen; if he paid her any reſpect, it was with reluctance and ſolely out of complaiſance to the King his maſter.

The Lord Stanley.

The Lord Stanley (6), of an ancient family, was in the ſame diſpoſitions. He was devoted to the King without making much court to the Queen.

Jane Shore King Edward's Miſtreſs. Moor.

The King's Concubines held likewiſe a conſiderable rank at Court, by reaſon of their influence over him. There were three eſpecially, of whom Jane Shore alone was concerned in the events of this new Reign. She was Wife to a Citizen of London, whom Edward had debauched, and taken from her Husband. She was ſurpriſingly beautiful, and withal of a generoſity very uncommon in perſons of her character. The King was as much in love with her temper as her beauty. He never heard her ſpeak ill of any perſon, nor ever perceived her to try to prejudice him againſt any man whatever. If ſhe importuned him ſometimes, it was in behalf of the unfortunate. When ſhe had done a good office, ſhe ſcorned to take a reward, being unwilling to give occaſion to think ſhe acted from a motive of intereſt. And therefore ſhe had amaſſed but few riches, in compariſon of other Concubines, whoſe greedineſs can never be ſatisfied.

Diſſimulation of the Duke of Gloceſter. Moor.

The Duke of Gloceſter the King's Brother was embarraſſed between the two parties formed at Court, and in the Kingdom. The only way to pleaſe the King, was to make court to the Queen. But on the other hand, the Duke perceiving the Queen's aim was to ingroſs the Government in caſe the King happened to die, could not be attached to her, without forfeiting the affection of the ancient Nobility, of which he might one day ſtand in need. As he was naturally a great diſſembler, he reſolved to make his court publickly to the Queen, but in private, he joined with the Duke of Buckingham, the Lord Haſtings, and the Lord Stanley.

Edward IV ſends his eldeſt Son into Wales. Moor.

It is needleſs to ſay much of the two young Princes the King's Sons, the eldeſt of whom was but twelve, and the Duke of York his brother but nine years old, when the King their Father died. It will ſuffice to ſay, that before Edward IV, was ſeized with the diſtemper that laid him in his grave, he had ſent the Prince his eldeſt Son, with the Earl of Rivers his Governor, into Wales to appeaſe ſome commotion (7). The young Duke of York remained at Court with the Queen his Mother.

Reconciliation of the two Parties before Edward's death. Moor.

Edward ſaw with ſome concern the two parties that were formed in his Court. But his affection for the Queen not ſuffering him to hold the balance even, he took no care to prevent the conſequences. So long as he enjoyed his health, he imagined, that during his life he ſhould be always maſter of both, and by ſtrengthening the

(7) The Prince was then at Ludlow in Shropſhire, that by his Preſence he might compoſe the diſorders of the Welſh; who, though not in actual Rebellion, yet were grown ſo unruly and diſobedient to their Governors and Superiors, that the Magiſtrates, with all their power, were not able to ſuppreſs the Diſſenſions and Diſorders, Robberies and Wrongs committed by them. Moor, p. 481.

1483. new Nobility hinder the old from being able to prejudice the Queen and her Children after his death. But when he came to die, he beheld this diviſion in another light. He conſidered, that he left for ſupport to his houſe only new families, which had not had time to eſtabliſh themſelves, and owed all their authority and credit entirely to his favour, of which they were going to be deprived. This thought ſenſibly troubling him, he ſought in himſelf the means to repair this error, and in his preſent condition, found no better way, than to perſuade the two parties to be reconciled for his ſake. Weak expedient! which could hardly produce the deſired effect. The regard for a dying King, never beloved by the antient Nobility, was little capable of extinguiſhing their hatred and envy of the Queen's relations, which unhappily, had been but too much fomented. However, before he expired, Edward had at leaſt the ſatisfaction to ſee this reconciliation, which he thought ſincere, becauſe of the ſeeming readineſs and chearfulneſs wherewith both Parties conſented to his requeſt. The Earl of Rivers being abſent, the Queen his Siſter paſſed her word for him, and the Marquis of Dorſet her eldeſt Son, as repreſenting the family of Grey, embraced the Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Haſtings, who were the heads of the oppoſite party. The Duke of Gloceſter being then at York, upon the King's affairs, had it not in his power to obſtruct this reconciliation, which indeed would have been very much to his prejudice had it not been inſincere.

Meaſures of both Parties to ſeize the Government.

As ſoon as Edward's eyes were cloſed, the two parties forgetting their late mutual proteſtations of friendſhip, thought only of gaining the advantage one of another. Mean while, they unanimouſly agreed to proclaim the deceaſed King's eldeſt Son by the name of Edward V. That done, each took ſuch meaſures as were thought moſt proper to attain his ends. The chief thing was to become maſter of the King's perſon, in order to govern in his name. The Queen hoped to maintain and even to increaſe her authority, during the King her Son's Minority, and the other party ſaw themſelves irrecoverably loſt, if the young Prince was once in the hands of his Mother. However, thus far the advantage was entirely on the Queen's ſide. Immediately after the death of the King her Husband, ſhe had diſpatched a courier to the Earl of Rivers her Brother with the news. She told him withal in the letter, that ſhe believed it abſolutely neceſſary for him to raiſe forces in Wales, and the adjoining Counties, to enable him to conduct the new King ſafely to London, in order to his Coronation.

Buckingham and Haſtings ſtir up Gloceſter to ſeize the King's Perſon. Moor.

On the other ſide, the Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Haſtings ſent an expreſs to the Duke of Gloceſter (1), acquainting him with the King's death, and the Queen's meaſures; and withal repreſenting to him, that being the King's Uncle by the Father's ſide, the Government of the Realm belonged to him, during the Minority; but if he did not prevent the Queen, it would be in vain to expect afterwards to obtain his due Right. In fine, that at all adventures, they offered him a thouſand Men well armed, and ready to march at the word of Command.

They deſign only to remove the Queen from the Government. Moor.

It is very difficult to judge, whether before the death of Edward IV, the Duke of Gloceſter had thought of mounting the Throne, to the prejudice of his Nephews. But it is ſcarce to be doubted, that he formed this deſign the moment he heard of his Brother's deceaſe. All his after-proceedings, too plainly appear to be conſequences of a Scheme laid to compaſs that end. As for the Lord Haſtings, his ſole Intention was certainly to take the Government out of the hands of the Queen and her Relations. His conſtant attachment to Edward IV, would never have ſuffered him to be concerned in a Plot to dethrone his Son. As for the Duke of Buckingham, his Conduct is more ambiguous. Beſides his hatred of the Queen and her Family, he had always preſerved a particular reſpect for the Duke of Gloceſter, which gives occaſion to ſuſpect, he had joined with him at firſt in the deſign to place him on the Throne. However, the Hiſtorians aſcribe to him (at leaſt in the beginning of this Reign,) the ſame Intention only with the Lord Haſtings, namely to remove the Queen from the Government of the King's Perſon, and of the Realm. Be this as it will, the Duke of Gloceſter, upon news of the King's death, ſent back the Expreſs, with orders to deſire the Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Haſtings, to come and confer with him at Northampton.

The Duke of Gloceſter's Speech to his Friends.

These two Lords, with ſome others of their Party, repairing to the place appointed, the Duke of Gloceſter, in a long Speech, demonſtrated to them, the great and impending danger, if the Queen was poſſeſſed of the Government. He told them, "They would be expoſed to "the Mercy of an imperious Woman, and of the two 1483.
"Families of Rivers and Grey, newly raiſed by the King
"his Brother, who would never think themſelves per"fectly ſafe, till thoſe whom they conſidered as their ri-

"had kept them, by his Authority, within ſome bounds,
"but when they ſhould be poſſeſſed of the ſupreme Pow"er, in the name of the young King, nothing would be "capable of curbing their Inſolence. He added, that no
"perſon had more Right, or was more concerned than
"himſelf, to take care of the affairs of the Kingdom,
"during the Minority of the King his Nephew. That "every one knew his conſtant attachment to the King
"his Brother, and therefore his tender affection for his "Children ſuffered him not to leave them to the Mercy
"of thoſe, who had never appeared to have any other
"view than their own advancement. That for theſe
"reaſons he was reſolved, zealouſly to apply himſelf to "promote, to the utmoſt of his power, the good of the "Nation, and the honor of his Nephew, principally by "giving him an Education that ſhould render him capa"ble of treading in the Steps of his illuſtrious Anceſtors.
"But that he could not hope to execute ſuch a Project,
"without the aſſiſtance of all honeſt Men, and particu"larly of thoſe to whom he was ſpeaking, who, with-
"out doubt, had, like him, no other view, than the Na"tion's welfare and glory. That he had aſſembled them
"to conſult with them upon what was to be done in the "preſent emergency, being reſolved not to proceed with-
"out their advice."

Reſult of the Conference. Moor.

This Speech meeting with applauſe, all the Lords entered into a ſerious debate, concerning the means to be uſed to become maſter of the King's perſon. To ſucceed by force was extremely difficult. The Earl of Rivers had not only aſſembled a good number of Troops, but it would have been alſo very eaſy for him to conduct the King to London, before they were in condition to prevent it. Beſides, they would have given him too great an advantage, if without any apparent neceſſity, they had begun ſo ſoon to take arms. Such a ſtep would have infallibly cauſed the people to ſide with their enemies, and been looked upon as tending to obſtruct the King's Coronation. Theſe conſiderations made the Lords reſolve to uſe policy. To that end, they agreed, that they ſhould continue to ſhew a great zeal for the King, in order to deprive the Queen of all pretence to raiſe Forces, or keep thoſe on foot that were aſſembled by the Earl of Rivers. That the Duke of Gloceſter ſhould try to perſuade her to diſmiſs theſe Troops as uſeleſs. That in caſe he ſucceeded, it ſhould be endeavoured to become maſter of the King, before his arrival at London; but if, on the contrary, the Queen was bent to keep theſe Forces, ſhe was to be amuſed with Negotiations, till her deſigns could be openly oppoſed.

Haſtings returns to London.

The Duke of Gloceſter's Letter to the Queen. Moor.

The Conference being ended, the Lord Haſtings poſted to London, where his preſence was neceſſary, by reaſon of his great Intereſt in the City. Preſently after, the Duke of Gloceſter ſent the Queen a Letter (2) of condolence upon the King's death, expreſſing an extreme affection for the young Prince, his Succeſſor, and an extraordinary reſpect for her. After this beginning, he told her, "He "beheld with great Joy, all hearts united in the ſame
"Sentiments, which made him hope, that the King his "Nephew would paſs his Minority in a perfect Tran-
"quillity. That, for his part, he would do all that lay
"in his power, to keep the People in the obedience due "to their Sovereign, by giving them himſelf an example
"of unlimited Submiſſion. That he did not queſtion,
"ſhe would likewiſe contribute to cauſe all the King's
"Subjects, to enjoy the peace and quiet they had reaſon
"to expect. That therefore, he took the freedom to
"adviſe her, to uſe her endeavours to diſpel the old Jea-
"louſies among the great Men, and confirm, by her pru-
"dence, the Reconciliation lately made before the King
"her Husband's death. That his advice was, that with"out affection or prejudice, care ſhould be taken to re-
"ward Merit wherever it was found, that no man might
"juſtly complain of being neglected for mere Party-con"cerns. That this was chiefly to be endeavoured, leſt
"by acting otherwiſe, diviſions, which ought to be buried
"in eternal oblivion, were renewed. That therefore he "could not forbear telling her, he was ſurprized to hear
"the Earl of Rivers was gathering Forces, to conduct
"the King to London, ſince they ſeemed to be entirely
"needleſs. That he was really convinced of the good-
"neſs of her Intention, but it was to be feared, this "proceeding would be ill-conſtrued. That Troops,

That the precautions several Lords would undoubtedly take, to screen themselves from the mischiefs they would have reason to dread, were the natural and infallible fruits of these suspicions. That therefore, to avoid a groundless peril, and by a needless precaution, the peace of the whole Kingdom was indangered. That when once these suspicions should take root, and two armies be on foot in the Kingdom, God alone knew what might be the Issue. That for these reasons, of which doubtless she perceived the strength, he advised her to dismiss her Troops, that all the Nobles of the Realm might come, without fear and suspicion, to pay their respects to their young Sovereign, and contribute, every one according to his power, to the preservation of peace and union in the State."

The Queen falls into the Snare. Moor.

The Queen very imprudently followed this advice, of which she perceived not the venom. She thought it was the sooner to be complied with, as it came from a Brother-in-law, who had always been firm to the Interests of the late King, and still shewed himself very zealous for her and her Children. During Edward IV's Life, the Duke of Gloucester had been very respectful to the Queen, so that she had no reason to suspect him. Besides, there was not in his Letter a single word to induce her to think he intended to dispute the Government with her. In fine, she considered, the Duke could not aspire to the Crown, without supplanting two Nephews, and five Nieces, who were not in his power. This alone would have been capable to remove her suspicions, supposing she could have entertained any. So, believing herself sufficiently supported, since the Duke of Gloucester expressed so great an attachment to her Interests, she writ to the Earl of Rivers her Brother, that she thought it proper, he should dismiss his Troops, for fear of raising Jealousies without occasion. The Earl immediately obeyed her orders, and keeping only the King's domesticks, began his Journey to conduct him to London.

Rivers carries the King to London without a Guard.

The Duke of Gloucester and his Friends go and meet the King. Moor.

The young King approaching Northampton, the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham, who had brought into the Town nine hundred armed Men (1), went to meet him, and saluted him very respectfully. In discoursing with the Earl of Rivers, they told him, the Town of Northampton was so full of strangers, and ill provided with Provisions and other Conveniences, that it would be very incommodious for theirs, and the King's Retinue to lodge in that place. Then, they advised him to carry the King to Stony Stratford (2), which is but twelve Miles further in the road to London. They added, for their part, they would return to Northampton, and wait upon the King in the morning, before he sat out. Upon parting, one of them proposed to the Earl, in a free and easy manner, as if it had been a sudden thought, to go and pass the night with them at Northampton, whilst the King rested at Stony Stratford. The Earl not suspecting their design, complied with this kind Invitation. He was even glad of an occasion to cement their mutual reconciliation, by this mark of Confidence.

They persuade Rivers to go with them to Northampton.

They caress him very much; Moor.

The three Lords being come to Northampton, spent the Evening together in perfect Harmony, with mutual protestations of friendship and offers of service. Bed-time being come, the Earl of Rivers withdrew to his Lodgings. But the other two passed the rest of the night in consulting what was to be done, since the Earl of Rivers had indiscreetly put himself into their hands. Their consultation being ended, they secured the Keys of the Inn where they lodged, under colour that they would be the first that should attend the King in the morning. For the greater precaution, they sent a good number of Men to line the way, and suffer no person whatever to enter Stony Stratford. At break of day they were ready to mount, whilst the Earl of Rivers was still in bed. Mean time, one of his People waking him, and telling him, the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham were ready to depart, and that no body was suffered to go out of the Inn, he immediately put on his Cloaths, to know the reason of this proceeding. But he found them in a very different disposition from that wherein he had left them some hours before. Upon his Approach they began to quarrel with him (3), taxing him with alienating the King's affection from his most faithful Subjects, adding, they should take care to prevent the like practices for the future. The Earl began to return a calm answer to this accusation, but refusing to hear him, they committed him to the custody of some of their Servants, and mounting their Horses rid away to the King.

and afterwards arrest him;

They found the young Prince ready to depart, and paying him their respects, re-mounted in order to attend him. Before they were out of the Town, they quarrelled with the Lord Grey (4), the King's Half-Brother, and charged him, that jointly with the Marquis of Dorset his Brother, and the Earl of Rivers his Uncle, he had formed the project to become master of the King's Person: And that the Marquis of Dorset had moreover taken out of the Tower, the Treasure committed to his custody by the late King. Whereupon the King said, that for what concerned the Marquis of Dorset he could say nothing, but would answer for the conduct of the Earl of Rivers and the Lord Grey, since they had been continually with him. To this the Duke of Buckingham replied, they had taken care to conceal their Plots from his Highness, which however were not the less certain. At the same time, he ordered his people to arrest the Lord Grey, with Sir Thomas Vaughan and Sir Richard Hawse, and instead of proceeding to London, carried the King back to Northampton (5). The same or next day the Prisoners were conducted to Pontfract Castle (6), the Governor whereof was the Duke of Gloucester's Creature. The King appeared extremely concerned for the disgrace of his Brother and Uncle, as well as for the violence to his own Person. But he had no way to free himself from his new Governors, but his tears, which were little regarded. Mean while, they paid him outwardly all the reverence usually paid to a Sovereign, in order to blind the Eyes of the People by these marks of respect and submission.

They seize upon the King.

The news being brought to the Queen, she perceived her error in relying on the Duke of Gloucester, and suspected immediately, he would not stop there, and had formed designs still more destructive to the Royal Family. So, finding herself deprived of the assistance of her Brother and Sons, as well as of their Counsels, she saw no other refuge, than, with the Duke of York her Son and the rest of her Family, to take sanctuary in Westminster (7).

The Lord Hastings, then at London, hated the Queen, as I observed, but loved the King and all Edward IV's Family. It is true, he was engaged in Gloucester's and Buckingham's plot, but it was with a belief that it tended only to hinder the Queen from assuming the Government, which he thought just and reasonable. He had intelligence in the night of what had passed at Northampton, and instantly sent the news to Dr. Rotherham the Archbishop of York and Lord Chancellor, assuring him withal, he had no reason to be alarmed: That the King's Person was in no danger, and very shortly what had happened would turn to the welfare of the Kingdom. The Archbishop rising that moment, went to the Queen, and carried the great Seal along with him. He found her in a disconsolate condition, sitting upon the ground, lamenting her own and her Children's Fate, whilst her Domesticks were busy in carrying such goods as were necessary into the Sanctuary. He endeavoured to comfort her, telling her what the Lord Hastings had declared to him. But he found her very backward to believe, that any good could come from such an Enemy. Then the Prelate, to give her hope, told her, the King's Person was safe, since the Duke of York his Brother was not in the power of those whom she considered as her Enemies. He added, if they should be so audacious as to put the King to death, or give the Crown to another, he assured her he would immediately crown the Duke of York. In fine, to give her all possible assurances of his fidelity, he left the Great Seal with her. But reflecting afterwards upon his error, in resigning so precious a pledge committed to him by the late King, he sent for it again as soon as he came home.

Mean while, the whole City of London was in commotion. Several Citizens had taken arms, not knowing what might be the end of the news they had just received, which probably was very much aggravated. The Lord Hastings being sensible, that an Insurrection at London might break the measures of his friends at Northampton, instantly came into the City, and as his credit was great among the Citizens, he assured them that the King was in no danger: That indeed the Earl of Rivers, the Lord Grey, and some others, were arrested for conspiring against the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham, but would be brought to a legal Trial: That however, it was no just reason for them to take arms, and it was to be feared they would be called to an account for the tumult, if they did not lay them down as readily as they had taken them up. The Citizens supposing the Lord Hastings to be perfectly informed, by reason he was of the Duke of Buckingham's Party, retired to their houses, being unwilling

The King is brought to London. Moor.

Shortly after, the Dukes of Gloceſter and Buckingham conducted the King to London, paying him all the reſpect due to his dignity. As they travelled along, they cauſed a report to be ſpread, that the Earl of Rivers and the reſt of the Priſoners at Pontfract had intended to kill them; and their Servants ſhewed the People Barrels of Arms, which were ſaid to be found among the baggage of the Conſpirators. The news of the extraordinary reſpect paid the King, flying to London before his Arrival, the City grew much more quiet, becauſe there was reaſon to believe, there had been no attempt upon the King's Perſon or dignity. At his approach, the People went out in crowds to receive him, and the young King entered the City (1), attended by a great number of Lords, and particularly by the Duke of Gloceſter, who followed him bare-headed (2). He was lodged in the Biſhop's Palace, to ſhew the Citizens the great confidence placed in them, and that his ſafety only was conſulted (3). This management entirely removed the ſuſpicions of the Duke of Gloceſter, raiſed by the Northampton Affair.

The Duke of Glocester calls a grand Council. Moor.

The Rejoicings for the King's ſafe Arrival being ended, it was neceſſary to think of ſettling the Government during his Minority, which was to laſt ſeven years. The moſt natural way would have been to call a Parliament, as was practiſed after the death of Henry V. But as, during a Parliament, all other Authority would have ceaſed, till the Government was regulated, the Duke of Gloceſter did not think fit to part with the power he had acquired by ſeizing the King's perſon. Indeed he might have expected, that the Parliament would confer on him the dignity of Protector of the Realm, ſince he was the only Prince of the blood capable of holding the Reins of the Government. But withal the care of the young King's Perſon and Education would have been certainly committed to others. It is a conſtant and very juſt rule not to truſt a minor King to thoſe that may be Gainers by his ruin. But this was what the Duke of Gloceſter feared above all things. He reſolved to continue Maſter of the King's Perſon, otherwiſe it would have been very difficult to accompliſh his deſigns. Theſe conſiderations made him think it more agreeable to his Intereſts to call a great Council, and not ſummon a Parliament till he had ſecured the Crown. This Council, moſtly conſiſting of the antient Nobility and the Duke of Gloceſter's friends, declared him Protector of the King and Kingdom, uſurping a Privilege belonging only to the Parliament. But as I have often obſerved, it is eaſier to cauſe the Parliament to confirm what is done, than induce it to do what is deſired.

Doubtful Behaviour of the Protector.

The ſeizing of the King's Perſon, and the getting himſelf declared Protector, were the two firſt ſteps by which the Duke of Gloceſter intended to mount the Throne. Each had its fair and foul ſide. In the firſt place, after the death of Edward IV, the Queen and her Relations having no right to ſeize the Government of the Realm, it could not be thought ſtrange, that the Duke of Gloceſter ſhould aſſume near the King, the rank to which he was intitled by his Birth. But his fraud and violence to the Queen's Relations, gave occaſion to ſuſpect, he had formed deeper deſigns. In the next place, nothing was more natural than to ſee the King's Uncle Protector of the Realm. But at the ſame time, his affecting to obtain that dignity, without vouchſafing to call a Parliament, and his cauſing to be annexed to the office of Protector of the Realm, that of Protector of the King, which ſhould have been ſeparated from it, was an extraordinary Proceeding, which might have raiſed juſt ſuſpicions. And yet the conſequence was not perceived till it was too late to prevent it. But for fear theſe irregular things might open People's eyes, the Duke took care to conceal himſelf under the vail of an extraordinary zeal for the King his Nephew's intereſts, and a great reſpect for his Perſon.

Alterations at Court. Moor.

As ſoon as the Duke was declared Protector, he took the Great Seal from Archbiſhop Rotherham, who had given him a very plauſible pretence, and delivered it to the Biſhop of Lincoln (4). The Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Haſtings were confirmed in their places; but there were great alterations made in all the reſt of the Poſts, the new Protector putting in his own creatures in the room of the Queen's, who filled them before. Tho' the Lord Haſtings was not truſted with the ſecret of his principal deſign, he did not deſpair of gaining him, when his affairs were more advanced. Beſides, Haſtings was a mortal enemy to the Queen and her Family, and had a great intereſt in London. This was ſufficient then, for, without knowing it, he could be ſerviceable to the Protector in executing his projects, which it was not yet proper to diſcover. 1483.

The Protector moves in Council to take the Duke of York from the Queen. Moor.

To proceeed with any appearance of ſucceſs in his deſign, it was neceſſary for the Duke of Gloceſter to have the young Duke of York in his power, as well as the King his Brother. To dethrone or murder the King, would have been to no purpoſe, ſo long as the Duke of York was out of reach. For he would ſtill have had the ſame thing to act over again. In order to accompliſh this Deſign, he moved in the Council whether it would not be requiſite to get the Duke of York out of the Queen's hands, and place him with the King his Brother. He made, upon this occaſion, a very long ſpeech, wherein, after teſtifying an extraordinary zeal for the Royal Family, and confirming what he ſaid with a great oath, he diſplayed the reaſons which required the young Prince's removal from the Queen. The firſt was, "That the "Queen's flying to ſanctuary without any apparent dan- "ger to herſelf or family, could not but be conſtrued as "an affront to the Government. In the ſecond place, "her ſole aim muſt have been to raiſe diſturbances by "making the people believe the King was in danger, "ſince no other conſequence could be inferred from her "conduct. That therefore it was neceſſary to undeceive "the people by procuring the Duke of York, and cauſing "him to be educated according to his quality. That "the more viſible the Queen's malice was, the more it "ſhould be endeavoured to prevent its effects. That it "was manifeſt, ſhe was ſtriving to form in the Kingdom "a party capable of ſetting her at the head of affairs, as "ſhe was in the late Reign. That it was with diffi- "culty and by great chance, that they were freed from "the imperious rule of that Princeſs and her Family; "but if the King ſhould happen to die, the Realm would "be again plunged into the ſame calamities, ſince ſhe had "the lawful Heir in her power. On the other hand, "it was neceſſary to conſider what Foreigners would ſay "when they heard, that whilſt one of Edward the fourth's "Sons was crowned, the other was forced to keep in "ſanctuary. That it would be diſhonorable to the Go- "vernment, to ſuffer themſelves to be thus braved by a "Woman, who had attempted to cauſe the King's "Council to be conſidered as enemies of the Royal Fa- "mily. That beſides, the King being young and want- "ing ſome diverſion, he could not have a more agreeable "companion than his own Brother, and there was no "reaſon to keep them aſunder. In fine, it would be in- "decent to proceed to the Coronation, in the abſence of "the Duke of York, the ſecond perſon in the State, who "having an evident right to be preſent, could not be de- "barred of it without Injuſtice. Upon all theſe accounts, "he concluded that Deputies ſhould be ſent to the Queen, "to deſire her to deliver the Duke of York to the King "his Brother. He added, that, in his opinion, the Car- "dinal Archbiſhop of Canterbury (5), was the propereſt "perſon for this deputation. That if, notwithſtanding "all the Archbiſhop's arguments, ſhe ſhould obſtinately "keep the young Prince with her, and perſiſt in her "groundleſs ſuſpicions, he ſaw no reaſon why the Council "ſhould not take him away by force. This was his "opinion, and he deſired every member of the Council "to ſpeak his own with freedom."

The Archbiſhop of Canterbury is ſent to the Queen. He is againſt violating the Sanctuary. Moor.

The Cardinal readily took upon him to go and acquaint the Queen with the Council's pleaſure, but by no means approved the motion of violating the privilege of ſanctuary. He ſaid, the Church of Weſtminſter was conſecrated, five hundred years ſince, by St. Peter himſelf, who deſcended from Heaven (6), attended by multitudes of Angels. That no King of England had ever dared to violate that Sanctuary, and that ſuch an attempt would certainly draw down the juſt vengeance of God upon the whole Kingdom.

Buckingham's Reaſons for it.

The Duke of Buckingham replied with great warmth to this part of the Cardinal's Speech. He ſhewed that ſanctuaries were intended only to protect ſuch as had reaſon to fear oppreſſion and violence, and not to countenance frivolous and malicious ſuſpicions, detrimental to the King and Kingdom. After many ſharp reflections againſt the Queen, he inlarged upon the abuſes of Sanctuaries, particularly as they afforded thoſe who fled thither means to eſcape. He added, tho' the Duke of York was neither guilty nor oppreſſed, there was room to fear the Queen his Mother would carry him out of the Kingdom, which might one day give the Queen opportunity to invade England, by the help of ſome foreign Prince, upon frivolous pretences, which would never be wanting. In fine, after alledging Conference between the Queen and the Archbiſhop. Moor.

The Cardinal being come to the Queen (1), uſed all poſſible arguments to induce her to comply, and to perſuade her that neither the King, nor herſelf, nor the Duke of York were in danger. He ſpoke with the greater aſſurance, as he was ſatisfied of the truth of what he ſaid, never ſuſpecting the Duke of Gloceſter of having ill deſigns. For, as to the violence uſed to the Queen's relations, he conſidered it as no great hurt. Beſides, as he was ignorant whether they were innocent, he did not think it any great injuſtice to detain them ſome time in Priſon, in order to prevent their diſturbing the Kingdom by their immoderate ambition. But all his eloquence was not capable to perſuade the Queen, who plainly ſaw in the Duke of Gloceſter's conduct too much reaſon to ſtrengthen her fears. At laſt, the Cardinal perceiving his arguments were fruitleſs, told her, that the Council, apprehenſive of her carrying the Prince her Son out of the Kingdom, had reſolved to take him by force out of his Sanctuary, if ſhe obſtinately inſiſted upon keeping him there. The Queen hearing theſe menaces, dwelt upon the privileges of Sanctuaries, which was entirely needleſs, ſince ſhe ſpoke to a Prelate who was thoroughly convinced of the ſame. At length, ſeeing herſelf preſſed to obey the Council's order, ſhe freely declared to the Cardinal the real cauſe of her fears. She told him, ſhe could not help ſuſpecting the Duke of Gloceſter of having deſigns deſtructive to the Royal Family, which he could not accompliſh without having both the Brothers in his power; and that the only means to preſerve the King, was to keep the Duke of York out of their Uncle's reach. The Cardinal growing warm at this diſcourſe, replied, ſince ſhe obſtinately terrified herſelf with vain and groundleſs ſuſpicions, he would ſay no more upon that head. That being only the Council's deputy, and the buſineſs not concerning him in particular, he would preſs her no farther, leſt he ſhould give her occaſion to think him in the plot ſhe apprehended. That however, he ſaw with grief her ill opinion of the members of the Council. That ſhe muſt believe them to be either void of underſtanding, not to perceive what ſhe fancied ſhe ſaw ſo plainly, or elſe ſo wicked as to lend their aſſiſtance to the Duke of Gloceſter. That for his part, he believed he might confidently affirm, the Duke had never entertained ſuch a thought; and that the Council would be very ſorry to ſee themſelves taxed with treachery or extreme imprudence. The good Cardinal, to remove the Queen's fears, ſaid nothing but what he really thought, becauſe he was not in the Protector's confidence. Accordingly the Queen felt herſelf very much ſhaken by the aſſurances of a perſon of his character. It was apparent, that if the Council intended to deceive her, they would not have made him their inſtrument; and yet ſhe could not lay aſide her fears. Mean while, ſhe ſaw the Cardinal ready to return, and herſelf going to be expoſed to the violence of her enemies, and obliged to do by force, what was civilly deſired. So, ſuddenly reſolving to give up the young Prince, ſhe caught him in her arms, tenderly took her leave of him, and with a ſhower of tears delivered him to the Cardinal, who brought him to the Protector. As ſoon as he ſaw his young Nephew, he ran to him with open arms (2), to embrace him and give him marks of a feigned affection, telling him, he would always be to him inſtead of a Father. Then, he carried him to the King, who, without knowing how he came there, was overjoyed at his company. A few days after, the Protector found ſome excuſe to convey them both to the Tower (3), whereas before they lodged in the heart of the City at the Biſhop's Palace (4).

The Queen delivers up the Duke of York. Moor.

He imparts his deſigns to the Duke of Buckingham, Moor.

It is generally believed, that hitherto the Duke of Gloceſter had not communicated his moſt ſecret thoughts to the Duke of Buckingham, nor imparted them to him till after he had the two Princes in his power. Buckingham mortally hated the Queen and her Family, becauſe it was through their means that the late King refuſed to give him poſſeſſion of certain lands in Herefordſhire, to which he laid claim (5). His Hatred had even paſſed to the King's Perſon, though he had not dared to ſhew it. He had joined with the Duke of Gloceſter, to deprive the Queen and her relations of the Government of the Realm, during the King's Minority; but it is not believed, his thoughts had gone any farther. For as he wanted only to preſerve or increaſe his credit, a Minority ſeems to have been more for his purpoſe than the Government of a grown King, ſuch as the Duke of Gloceſter. However, as he was a Man of ill principles, it was not difficult for the Protector to ingage him in his plot, by the hopes of a reward. It is ſaid, he promiſed not only to procure him the Lands he deſired, but alſo to give him part of the late King's Wardrobe, to furniſh his houſe in a ſtately manner, and ſecure to his Heirs the Office of High-Conſtable, of which he was in poſſeſſion (6). Be this as it will, the Duke of Buckingham ſo ingaged in the project, to ſet the Protector on the Throne, that from thenceforward he appeared no leſs eager than the Protector himſelf to accompliſh it. The thing being reſolved, the queſtion was only how to put it in execution.

1483. who comes in to them. Moor.

From that time the conferences between the Duke of Gloceſter and his truſty friends became more frequent than before. They debated the principal difficulties that might occur in the execution of the deſign, and the means to ſurmount or prevent them. In ſhort, they came to the following reſolutions, which were conſidered as the Plan whereon they were gradually to proceed. Firſt, As the ſtrongeſt Oppoſition was probably to be expected from the Queen, it was reſolved to diſpatch the Priſoners at Pontfract, in order to deprive the Royal Family of their chiefeſt ſupport. The Lord Haſtings, to whom this deſign was imparted, readily gave his conſent, though he knew not the Protector's real motive to put theſe Lords to death. 2. It was agreed to endeavour to ingage in the plot the propereſt perſons to accompliſh it, that is in other words, Villains capable of any undertaking, without regard to honour, juſtice, or conſcience. 3. It was judged neceſſary to find ſome foundation to ſupport the Duke of Gloceſter's pretenſions, that the people might be amuſed with ſome appearance of reaſon. 4. As it was no leſs requiſite to keep the Plot ſecret till matters were ripe for execution, it was reſolved ſtill to ſhew publickly a ſettled deſign to cauſe the King to be crowned, till it was no longer neceſſary to diſſemble. 5. Laſtly, It was agreed, that the Lord Haſtings ſhould either be gained or diſpatched out of the way. One of the two ſeemed abſolutely neceſſary, conſidering his great Intereſt with the People of London.

Reſult of their Projects.

This Plan being laid the Protector writ to Sir Richard Ratcliff Governor of Pontfract and his Creature, to behead, on a day appointed, the four Lords that were under his cuſtody.

Orders to behead the Priſoners at Pontfract.

After that he applied himſelf particularly to gain Sir Edmund Shaw, then Mayor of London, and ſucceeded to his wiſh. The Mayor ingaged in the plot his Brother John Shaw a famous Preacher, and one Pinker, Monk and Provincial of the Auguſtine Fryers, who were much eſteemed by the people. To theſe the Protector joined one Catesby, a particular friend and confident of the Lord Haſtings.

The Protector gains Shaw and Catesby. Moor.

By means of theſe men the Protector's ſecret Council reſolved to ſpread among the people the reaſons which might ſtrengthen his pretenſions. This ſeemed very difficult, ſince there were three Princes and ſix Princeſſes before him, namely, the King, the Duke of York his Brother, Edward the Fourth's five Daughters, the Earl of Warwick Son to the late Duke of Clarence, and Margaret his Siſter. One ſingle expedient ſeemed proper and ſufficient to deſtroy the rights of theſe Princes and Princeſſes; which was, to intimate that Edward IV's Children were all Baſtards, and Edward himſelf and the Duke of Clarence his Brother not Sons of the late Duke of York. To exclude Edward's Children, it was reſolved to urge the validity of his pretended Marriage-contract with Elizabeth Lucy before he eſpouſed Elizabeth Woodvile, from whence it followed, that the Children by the laſt Marriage were illegitimate. This pretenſion was to be proved by the Ducheſs of York's teſtimony, who had uſed that Argument to hinder the King her Son from marrying Sir Richard Woodvile's Daughter. Philip de Commines ſays, the Bi-1483 ſhop of Bath and Wells then affirmed that he married Edward IV to a Lady called Eleanor Talbot, before he eſpouſed the Queen; that it was done without witneſs, and the King had ſtrictly charged him never to mention it to any perſon whatever. But we do not find in the Engliſh Hiſtorians, that the Duke of Gloceſter, at the time we are ſpeaking of, made uſe of this reaſon, which however would have been more plauſible than that taken from Edward's Marriage with Elizabeth Lucy. For, Edward had taken precautions with regard to this laſt, as obſerved in the Hiſtory of his Reign, whereas the firſt had been unanſwerable, being ſupported by the evidence of the very Biſhop that pretended to officiate. It is therefore unlikely the Duke of Gloceſter ſhould neglect ſo great an advantage. But it may very well be that Philip de Commines was wrong informed, or at leaſt miſtaken in the name of the King's Miſtreſs.

The Protector's Emiſſaries ſpread Reports againſt Edward IV. Moor.

Mean while, as it was not eaſy to prove Edward's pretended Marriage with Elizabeth Lucy; and as, on the contrary, the Biſhops had declared there was no mutual Contract, the Protector's Council judged that the other point ſhould be chiefly inſiſted upon, namely, that Edward IV and the Duke of Clarence were not Sons of the late Duke of York. Thereby were excluded, at once, the poſterity of theſe two Princes, and then the Duke of Gloceſter was next Heir. To ſupport this aſſertion, it was reſolved to plead the Duke of Clarence's own teſtimony, who, as was pretended, maintained that Edward IV was illegitimate. Moreover, ſome of the late Duke of York's Servants were already ſuborned, who took care to ſpread divers reports which confirmed what was intended to be intimated to the people. They gave out, that the Ducheſs of York had taken to her bed certain perſons perfectly reſembling Edward IV and the Duke of Clarence, and that the Duke of Gloceſter alone was Son to the Duke of York.

Pretence to exclude the Duke of Clarence's Heirs. Moor.

As for the Earl of Warwick and his Siſter, another way was uſed to exclude them, namely, the Attainder of the Duke of Clarence their Father, which, as they pretended, rendered them incapable of inheriting at all. Thus, the Duke of Gloceſter did not ſcruple to accuſe his own Mother of Adultery. But this was one of the leaſt crimes which cleared his way to the Throne, ſo blinded was he by his ambition.

Two Councils erected. Moor.

Every thing being thus prepared, the Protector feigned to haſten the King's Coronation. For that purpoſe he appointed a particular Council, which was to meet every day (1), and regulate the preparations. He took care to compoſe this Council of ſuch Lords as were moſt attached to Edward IV's family, among whom the two Archbiſhops, the Biſhop of Ely (2), the Lord Haſtings, and the Lord Stanley were the principal. At the ſame time, he had another Council conſiſting of his Creatures, which alſo met regularly (3), but whoſe conſultations were only how to defer the Coronation, and place the Protector on the Throne.

Moor.

The Lords appointed to haſten the preparations for the Coronation, quickly perceived all their orders were retarded by obſtacles from another quarter. On the other hand, they were ſomething ſurprized, that the Protector ſeldom ſuffered the King to be ſeen; that the young Prince had but very few Attendants, whilſt the Protector's houſe was full of unneceſſary people, and a crowd of Courtiers, who were always well received and careſſed. Theſe things joined to the affected delays of the Coronation, began to breed ſuſpicion in thoſe who were really friends to the King's Perſon. The Lord Stanley, a Man of deep penetration, was the firſt to diſcover his fears of the Protector's ill deſigns. He freely ſpoke his mind to his Fellow-Counſellors, and declared, he did not like the Duke of Gloceſter's proceedings: That the other Council which ſo frequently met, and whoſe reſolves could not be known, was to him very ſuſpicious. That therefore it was his opinion, they ſhould think betimes of means to prevent the miſchiefs which might happen. This advice was prudent; but the Lord Haſtings, ſtill prepoſſeſſed that the Protector thought only of humbling the Queen's Party, removed all theſe ſuſpicions. He affirmed there was no danger from the other Council, and he would pawn his Life, that if any thing were tranſacted there detrimental to the King and the State, he ſhould be inſtantly informed of it by one of the members who was entirely devoted to him. He meant Catesby his friend and confident (4). But he did not know that Catesby betrayed him, and was therefore truſted by the Duke of Gloceſter. So, Stanley and the other Lords of the ſame party preferring the Lord Haſtings's aſſurances to their own judgment, took no meaſures to ſtop the Protector's progreſs, which they might eaſily have done, had they endeavoured it in time.

Mean while, the Duke of Gloceſter, knowing what a firm friend the Lord Haſtings was to the King, thought it time to execute the project he had formed concerning him, that is, to engage him in the plot, or deſtroy him. To that end, he ordered Catesby to ſound him, but with all the caution imaginable, for fear of diſcovering the deſign before he was ſure to be gained. Catesby having put the Lord Haſtings upon diſcourſing of State affairs, told him, People talked very much of the Duke of Gloceſter's title to the Crown preferably to Edward IV's Children, and many were perſuaded this title was not groundleſs. That it was openly ſaid, it were to be wiſhed, the reaſons alledged in his favour were good, ſince it would be more advantagious to the Nation to be governed by a Man, than by a Child. That, for his part, he had not yet examined the matter, and ſhould be glad firſt to know his opinion. Haſtings not ſuſpecting his friend, diſcloſed all his thoughts, and imparted to him the Lord Stanley's ſuſpicions of the Duke of Gloceſter. He added, for his part, he had rather ſee the ruin and deſtruction of the Protector, and the Duke of Buckingham, than the late King's Children deprived of their Right. That if he perceived any plot in favor of the Duke of Gloceſter, he would employ his Credit, his Eſtate, and his very Life, to prevent its ſucceeding. This reply was immediately carried to the Protector, by the treacherous Catesby, with many aggravations, to haſten the Lord Haſtings's deſtruction, for fear he ſhould one day diſcover his treachery.

The Protector ſounds Haſtings, and ſends him to the King. Moor.

The Duke having thus ſounded the Lord Haſtings, was greatly embaraſſed. He paſſionately deſired to gain that Lord, knowing how ſerviceable he could be to him. But for that very reaſon he could not help fearing him, if he perſiſted in his attachment to the King. To free himſelf from this uneaſineſs, he ordered Catesby to ſound him once more. Catesby ſpeaking a little too plainly in his ſecond Converſation with Haſtings, and not doubting that his treachery was known, told the Protector, that not only he had nothing to hope from that quarter, but moreover was to expect to find in Haſtings a profeſſed enemy. Whereupon the Protector reſolved to diſpatch him, looking upon him now as his real adverſary.

Haſtings's death reſolved. Moor.

Means to bring it about. Moor.

This reſolution being taken, he called a Council at the Tower (5), under colour of finiſhing the affairs of the King's Coronation. He came himſelf at nine a clock in the Morning, with a chearful Countenance, courteouſly ſaluting all the Lords, as if he had nothing in his mind that gave him the leaſt uneaſineſs. After that, he went out, and deſired the Lords of the Council to continue their deliberations in his abſence.

About an hour after, he returned with an angry Countenance, knitting his Brows, biting his Lips, and ſhewing all poſible ſigns of the perturbation of his mind. Remaining ſome time without ſpeaking, he broke ſilence with theſe words: My Lords, what puniſhment do they deſerve who have plotted againſt my Life? The Lords not immediately anſwering, the Lord Haſtings replied, Whoever was guilty of ſuch a Crime ought to be puniſhed as a Traitor. It is, anſwered the Duke, that Sorcereſs my Siſter-in-law, with her Accomplices. Theſe words aſtoniſhed many of the Council who favoured the Queen, being afraid this Accuſation concerned them. But the Lord Haſtings was far from any ſuch fear. All knew he was ſworn Enemy to the Queen, and conſequently there was no likelihood of his joining with her in ſuch a deſign. Beſides, he had lately approved of the order ſent to Pontfract, to behead the Lords Priſoners, who were to be executed that very day. After a ſhort pauſe, the Protector, unbuttoning his left ſleeve, ſhewed the Council his arm, dried and withered, ſaying, with extreme emotion, See what that Sorcereſs, and Shore's Wife have done by their Witchcrafts. They have reduced my arm as you ſee, and my whole body would ſoon have been the ſame, if by God's Mercy their infamous plot had not been diſcovered. Theſe words cauſed a greater ſurprize than the former, the whole Council knowing the Duke's arm had long been in that condition. Beſides, if the Queen had framed ſuch a project, Jane Shore would have been the laſt perſon ſhe would have imparted it to, ſince of all Women ſhe moſt hated her. The Lord Haſtings, who ſince Edward's death had kept Jane Shore, perceiving ſhe was involved in the Accuſation, could not forbear to ſhew how much he doubted her being guilty, by ſaying, If they had committed ſuch a Crime, they deſerved to be puniſhed. Then the Protector raiſing his voice, What, ſays he, doſt thou 1483. anſwer me with Ifs and Ands, as if I forged this Accuſation? I tell thee they have conſpired my death, and thou thy ſelf art acceſſary to the Crime. As he ended theſe words, he ſtruck the Table twice with his Fiſt, and immediately the room was filled with armed Men. As ſoon as they were in, the Protector turning to the Lord Haſtings, ſaid to him, I arreſt thee for High-Treaſon. Who, Me, my Lord, anſwered Haſtings? Yes, Thee, Traitor, replied the Protector. At the ſame time he delivered him to the Cuſtody of the Soldiers. During the buſtle, one of the Soldiers would have cleft the Lord Stanley's ſkull with a Battle-ax. But he avoided part of the blow by ſinking under the Table; however, he was dangerouſly wounded. Probably, the Soldier had orders to kill him as it were by chance, under pretence he would have defended the Lord Haſtings. It is not hard to gueſs, why the Protector deſired to be rid of him. Be this as it will, having miſſed his aim, Stanley was arreſted with the Archbiſhop of York, and the Biſhop of Ely, it being the Protector's Intereſt to put it out of their power to hurt him, whom he knew to be zealouſly affected to the young King. As for the Lord Haſtings, he would ſcarce give him time to make a ſhort Confeſſion to the next Prieſt that came, ſwearing, he would not dine till his head was ſtruck off. Accordingly, he was beheaded upon a log which was found on the Green before the Tower Chapel, the time fixed by the Protector being too ſhort to erect a Scaffold. Hiſtorians inlarge upon ſundry preſages he had of his death. But though ſuch kind of remarks may have their uſe, when the Facts are very certain, I ſhall paſs them over in ſilence (1). It ſuffices to obſerve only, that the Lord Haſtings died the ſame day and hour that the Pontfract Priſoners (2) were executed, to whoſe death he greatly contributed.

Stanley is wounded, and arreſted with the Archbiſhop of York, and the Biſhop of Ely. Moor.

The Priſoners at Pontfract are executed.

The Protector tries to juſtify what was done by the Mayor of London. Moor.

The Lord Haſtings being dead, the Protector judged it neceſſary to palliate ſo haſty and illegal an execution, for fear the Londoners ſhould take fire upon hearing it (3), and for that purpoſe, ſent for the Lord Mayor and Aldermen. In the mean while, he and the Duke of Buckingham put on two old ruſty Coats of Armour. The Mayor being come to the Tower, the Protector told him, the Lord Haſtings, and ſome others had conſpired to take away his Life, and he had no Intelligence of the plot till ten a clock that Morning. That the fact being fully proved, the King and Council had thought neceſſary to execute him immediately, by reaſon they were informed, a great number of people were all ready to riſe in his favour. That this Conſpiracy had put his perſon in extreme danger, and forced him to harneſs himſelf in old ruſty Armour, for his defence. That he had ſent for him to inform him of the truth, that he might, when he acquainted the Londoners with this ſudden execution, take care to appeaſe or prevent the Commotions, which ill-affected People might raiſe in the City. The Mayor and Aldermen eaſily perceived, the Protector did not tell them the whole truth, but not daring to expreſs their doubt, they withdrew, aſſuring him his orders ſhould be obeyed.

Proclamation upon that ſubject. Moor.

What the Protector had ſaid to the Mayor and Aldermen, was only to prepare the people to receive a Proclamation, publiſhed in the City two hours after the death of the Lord Haſtings. The King, in whoſe name it was publiſhed, was made to ſay in it, "That the "Lord Haſtings had conſpired to ſeize his perſon, in "order to govern the Kingdom as he pleaſed, and to "kill the Protector and the Duke of Buckingham. That "to prevent this deſign, he was forced, by advice of his "Council, to cauſe the criminal to be immediately pu-"niſhed, and that never man more deſerved to die. "That it was he that perſuaded the late King to do ſo "many things contrary to the rights and privileges of the "people. That he had endeavoured to debauch him by "his perſuaſions and example, and had lain the night "before with Shore's Wife, the accomplice of all his "crimes, and particularly of that for which he was exe-"cuted." There were ſeveral other things in the Proclamation, tending to leſſen the people's affection and compaſſion for the Lord Haſtings, and to ſhew that his death was a judgment upon him. It was obſerved, that the Proclamation was elegantly compoſed, and fairly writen on Parchment, though publiſhed ſo very ſoon after that Lord's death. This bred a ſuſpicion that it was ready prepared (4) in order to be publiſhed immediately after the execution. Accordingly, it produced but little effect (5). 1483.

As Jane Shore was accuſed of being an accomplice of the Lord Haſtings, the Protector was obliged to proceed againſt her. So, giving orders (6) to arreſt her, he commanded her to be brought to the Tower, where ſhe was examined before the Council. The Duke of Gloceſter accuſed her himſelf of intending, by her ſorceries, to waſte his fleſh by degrees, and conſpiring with the Lord Haſtings to aſſaſſinate him. But, beſides that he could alledge nothing in proof of theſe accuſations, ſhe made ſo good a defence, that the Council could find no reaſon to condemn her. However, as the Protector was unwilling ſhe ſhould eſcape without puniſhment, ſhe was ſued for incontinency, as being guilty of leaving her Husband, and living with other men. Theſe were facts ſhe could not deny, ſince the whole Court was witneſs, ſhe had been kept by the late King, and afterwards by the Lord Haſtings. Whereupon ſhe was delivered over to the Biſhop of London, and condemned by the Eccleſiaſtical Court to do open penance in St. Paul's Church in a white Sheet, with a Wax-Taper in her hand, before all the people (7). Moor. Jane Shore condemned to do open Penance.

The late executions at London and Pontfract without any form of proceſs, the impriſonment of the Archbiſhop of York, the Biſhop of Ely, and the Lord Stanley, left no room to queſtion the Duke of Gloceſter's deſigns. Hitherto, he had given ſome colour to his conduct; but after theſe violent proceedings there was no way to hide his intentions. Every one ſaid to himſelf, theſe unjuſt doings could not but end in the King's deſtruction. But people durſt not tell their thoughts to one another, ſuch a terror was there every where ſpread. They who could have taken meaſures to oppoſe the Protector's deſigns were dead or in priſon, and if there were any left capable to make him uneaſy, the example of thoſe who had been treated with ſo much barbarity, was ſufficient to cauſe them to act with circumſpection. They plainly ſaw the imminent danger, if they did but ſeem to perceive what was plotting. The Protector haſtens the execution of his deſign.

Fear and conſternation having thus ſeized the great men, the Protector and the Duke of Buckingham thought the advantage ſhould be taken, and that it was time to diſcover their deſigns (8). There remained but one difficulty, and that was to get the Londoners to approve of the intended change. This was no eaſy matter. Indeed, private perſons may ſuffer themſelves to be corrupted, and if any are too obſtinate, they may be diſpatched as the Lord Haſtings had been ſerved. But the thing is to perſuade a whole Nation, they ought to approve of manifeſt acts of injuſtice, wherein they themſelves are not concerned. There are but two ways to ſucceed. The firſt is to oblige them through fear, to feign to believe what they do not believe; the other, to gain thoſe in whom they put any confidence, that they may by degrees be brought to what is deſired. After ſeveral conſultations, the Protector and the Duke of Buckingham reſolved to uſe theſe two means, the firſt whereof had already begun to have a very great effect. For the ſecond, they agreed, that, by emiſſaries, it ſhould be continued more than ever to be ſpread among the people, that Edward the fourth's Children were illegitimate, and their Father himſelf and the Duke of Clarence his Brother were not the Duke of York's Sons. That theſe rumours ſhould be ſupported by a Sermon of Dr. Shaw, whoſe eloquence was applauded by the whole City. He employs Dr. Shaw a famous Preacher. Moor.

Theſe meaſures being taken, the Doctor mounted the Pulpit one Sunday morning at Paul's-Croſs, and preached upon theſe words, Baſtard Slips ſhall take no deep Root (9). He began with ſhewing the Bleſſings God uſually beſtowed on the fruits of the marriage-bed, and the calamities which on the contrary fell upon the Children born out of wedlock. He did not want examples of both, as well in ſacred as prophane Hiſtory. Then he inlarged on the noble qualities of the Duke of York, ſlain in the Battle of Wakefield, and ſhewed how happy the Engliſh would be to have a Sovereign of the race of that great Prince. Shaw's Sermon at Paul's Croſs.

1483. From thence he took occaſion to remark, that it was to be feared, the Reign of Edward V would be fatal to England, ſince he was born of an illegitimate marriage. Moreover, that neither Edward IV nor the late Duke of Clarence were Sons of the great Duke of York, as was certainly known from officers of his houſhold, witneſſes of the Ducheſs their Mother's ſcandalous life. That ſhe had taken to her bed, in the ſight of all her ſervants, Men whom the two Brothers perfectly reſembled. But that the Duke of Gloceſter alone could truly be called the Duke of York's Son. That beſides, Edward IV was not lawfully married to his Queen, ſince he had before plighted his faith to the Lady Elizabeth Lucy, as could be ſhewn by good evidences. That conſequently his Children could be no better than Baſtards. That therefore the Duke of York's real poſterity was not to be looked for in the Children either of Edward, or of the Duke of Clarence, and that their race would infallibly periſh, becauſe Baſtard Plants ſhall take no deep Root. But my Lord Protector, continued he, raiſing his voice, that noble Prince, the pattern of all virtue, carries in his countenance, in his air, in his carriage, in his ſoul, the perfect image of his illuſtrious Father. At theſe words, it was deſigned the Duke of Gloceſter ſhould appear, in hopes that the People, moved by the Preacher's eloquence, would ſalute him King. But the Duke happening to ſtay a little too long, the Doctor had begun another ſubject, when he ſaw him entering, which however he left, and repeated the ſame words before-mentioned, whilſt the Duke was preſſing through the crowd to come to his place. But inſtead of hearing the cry of Long live King Richard! as he expected, he perceived, all kept a ſullen ſilence, the People deteſting the baſeneſs of the Preacher, inſtead of applauding his eloquence. The ſermon being ended, the Doctor went and hid himſelf for ſhame, neither durſt he ever ſhow his face again in the World. It is ſaid he died preſently after with grief at his ill-ſucceſs, and for loſing the eſteem of his audience.

Iſſue of his Sermon.

The Duke of Buckingham harangues the People at Guild-Hall in favour of the Duke of Gloceſter. Moor.

Shaw's Sermon not producing the expected effect, other means were to be uſed; for the Protector had proceeded too far to recede. So the Duke of Buckingham, being a fine Speaker, took upon him to harangue the people, imagining, a polite Speech would be more ſucceſsful than Shaw's methodical Sermon. To that purpoſe, the Lord Mayor had orders to aſſemble the Aldermen, Common-Council, and principal Citizens, in the Guild-Hall (1). Which being done, the Duke of Buckingham came to the Aſſembly (2), and taking his place near the Mayor, told the People, he was come from the Council, to acquaint them with a matter of the greateſt Importance to the whole Kingdom, but eſpecially to the Inhabitants of London. His Speech ran at firſt upon the Calamities endured by the People of England in the laſt Reign. He aggravated in a very violent manner, the Cruelty, Avarice and Incontinency of Edward IV, and endeavoured, to the utmoſt of his power, to render him odious. Then, he put his Audience in mind, the Sunday before, that excellent Man, Dr. Shaw, had clearly proved to them, that Edward was not lawfully married to his Queen, and conſequently their Children were baſtards: That neither Edward himſelf, nor the Duke of Clarence his Brother, were the Duke of York's Sons, and to the proofs alledged by the Doctor, he himſelf could add many more, did not his reſpect for the Protector, hinder him from dwelling upon the Ducheſs his Mother's looſe Life: That for theſe reaſons, the Lords of the Council, and the Commons of the Realm, particularly of the northern Counties, had declared, that a Baſtard ſhould not ſit on the Throne of England, and petitioned, that the Crown ſhould be adjudged to the Duke of Gloceſter, only Son of the late Duke of York: That indeed there was reaſon to fear, the magnanimous Duke would refuſe the offer; but on the other hand, it was to be hoped, all the people, and eſpecially the Inhabitants of London, uniting with one accord, he would be prevailed with to take upon him the Burden of the Government, too weighty for a Child: That upon all theſe Conſiderations, he required them in his own, and the name of the Lords of the Council, to declare their Intention. Here he ſtopped, in expectation to hear the People cry, Long live King Richard; but every one ſtood ſpeechleſs, ſo great was their ſurprize, to hear ſo unjuſt a propoſal. The Duke, ſurprized in his turn at ſo unexpected a ſilence, asked the Mayor the reaſon; who replied, perhaps, they did not well underſtand him. If that's the caſe, anſwered the Duke, I will make my ſelf better underſtood. Then raiſing his voice, he repeated the ſenſe of what he had ſaid in other words, with a gracefulneſs and eloquence worthy a nobler ſubject. But the People ſtill kept a profound ſilence. The Duke, in confuſion that his Rhetoric ſhould produce ſo little effect, talked ſome time in a low voice with the Mayor, to conſult with him what was to be done. At length, the Mayor told him, perhaps the People were ſilent becauſe they were uſed to be harangued only by the Recorder, who was the Mouth of the City. Whereupon he commanded the Recorder (3) to ſpeak to the People, which he did with great reluctance. However, he ſo managed his Speech, that without any addition of his own, he repeated to the people the ſubſtance of what the Duke had ſaid. He concluded, with requiring the people (4) to give a poſitive anſwer, whether they would have the Duke of Gloceſter for King or not? At theſe words there was a confuſed murmur in the Aſſembly, and as it was yet uncertain whether the People anſwered Ay or No, ſome of the Duke of Buckingham's Servants, who had ſlipt in amongſt the crowd, fell to crying, Long live King Richard! Some of the Citizens who had been bribed, but would not venture to begin, ſeconded the Cry, and the Apprentices, with the Rabble, who ſtood near the door, followed their example, and throwing up their Hats in token of Joy, cryed out King Richard! King Richard! The Duke of Buckingham plainly perceived, the Cry came from the Rabble without, and not from the principal Citizens in the Hall. Nevertheleſs, improving this advantage, he commanded ſilence, and reſuming his Speech, ſaid, he was overjoyed to ſee ſo general and unanimous an approbation to his propoſal. Wherefore, continued he, my good Friends, I deſire you to meet me here to morrow about this time, that we may all go together, and preſent our humble petition to his Highneſs, and intreat him to condeſcend to our requeſt. Then, the Mayor diſmiſſing the people, the Citizens returned to their Houſes with tears in their Eyes, and grief in their Hearts, without daring to ſhew it, for fear of offending thoſe whoſe Intereſt it was to have it concealed.

He orders the Recorder to ſpeak to the People.

Some of the Mob cry, a Richard! Moor.

The Duke pretends it was a general Approbation.

Next day the Duke of Buckingham, with the Mayor, Aldermen, and many other Perſons of the Cabal came to the Protector's Palace (5) and ſent a Meſſage to him, that the Magiſtrates of London deſired an audience. The Protector ſcrupled to appear, pretending to fear, that ſuch numbers were aſſembled for no good deſign. Whereupon the Duke of Buckingham obſerved to the Mayor and thoſe about him, that his Highneſs was not conſcious of their intent, intimating thereby that he was not concerned in the tranſactions of the foregoing day. At length, upon the repeated deſire, that his Highneſs would be pleaſed to grant an audience, he came forth with ſigns of great miſtruſt, and as not daring to approach ſuch multitudes, for fear of ſome Miſchief (6). Then the Duke of Buckingham, without giving the Mayor time to ſpeak, briefly ſet forth the grievance of the Nation in the late Reign. After that, he ſaid to the Protector, the People had found no better way to free themſelves from their evils, than to pray his Highneſs to aſſume the Royal Authority, which of right belonged to him. He added, the Mayor and Aldermen of London, whom he ſaw there, were come to petition him in the Name of all the people, who were united in the ſame intention.

He waits upon the Protector with the Mayor, and offers him the Crown. Moor.

The Duke of Gloceſter ſeeming ſurpriſed at this propoſal, anſwered, "he was convinced that all he had heard "was true: But he had ſo great a veneration for the me- "mory of the late King his Brother, and ſo tender an af- "fection for his Children, as out-weighed all the Crowns "in the world, and therefore he could not comply with "their requeſt. However he willingly pardoned their "petition, and thanked them for their affection: But ad- "viſed them to be obedient to the Sovereign under whoſe "Dominion they lived: That for his part, he would "continue to the utmoſt of his power, to give the King "his Nephew ſuch Counſels, as he ſhould judge moſt "conducive to render his Kingdom flouriſhing, and his "People happy, as he believed he had hitherto done, to "the ſatisfaction of all the world."

The Protector refuſes it at firſt. Moor.

He expects in vain that the People ſhould cry, King Richard!

The Duke of Buckingham ſeeming diſſatisfied with this anſwer, murmured ſome words to himſelf expreſſing his diſcontent, and at length deſired leave to ſpeak once more; and having obtained it, he plainly told the Protector, "That all people were unanimouſly reſolved not to "acknowledge for King any of Edward IV's Children: "That they had proceeded too far to go back, and there- "fore if he would not receive the Crown, the People "would be forced to offer it to one who would not re- "fuſe it." At theſe words the Protector began to be a little 1483. RICHARD III. is proclaimed. Moor. Hall.

THE Duke of Gloceſter having attained to his ends by ſuch extraordinary ways, and in ſpite of all the obſtacles that oppoſed his ambition, was proclaimed the 22d of June (1), by the name of Richard III. He might have been crowned the next day, ſince the preparations for Edward the fifth's coronation were finiſhed: But he delayed the ceremony till the ſixth of July, expecting the arrival of five thouſand Men, which he ſent for out of the North, becauſe he did not entirely confide in the Citizens of London.

The Biſhop of Lincoln is made Chancellor, Moor. Act. Pub. XII. p. 189, 190. and John Howard Duke of Norfolk.

During this interval, he gave the Great Seal to the Biſhop of Lincoln (2), one of his favorites. On the 28th of June he conferred the office of Earl Marſhal upon the Lord John Howard (3), and the next day, the title of Duke of Norfolk. The day following, he commiſſioned him to exerciſe the office of High-Steward during the Coronation. A few days after, he created Thomas Howard his Son, Earl of Surrey, William Berkeley Earl of Nottingham, and the Lord Lovel one of his Confidents, Viſcount of the ſame name (4).

Archbiſhop of York and Stanley are releaſed. Moor.

Thomas Rotherham Archbiſhop of York, and the Lord Thomas Stanley, who were impriſoned the day the Lord Haſtings was executed, were releaſed at the ſame time, and the new King made the Lord Stanley, Lord Steward of the Houſhold. It was not from a motive of affection or confidence, but out of fear that the Lord Strange his Son (5), who was beginning to levy forces in Lincolnſhire (6), ſhould raiſe commotions, the conſequences whereof he much dreaded.

The Biſhop of Ely is committed to the Cuſtody of Buckingham. Moor.

As for Dr. Morton Biſhop of Ely, who was arreſted the ſame day, the King deſigned not to do him the ſame favour. But the Univerſity of Oxford, of which that Prelate was member, having preſented a Petition in his behalf, he did not think proper wholly to reject it, at a time when he wanted to gain the affection of his new Subjects. However, as he mortally hated that Biſhop, he could not reſolve to releaſe him entirely. He only took him out of his confinement in the Tower, and committed him to the Duke of Buckingham's Cuſtody, who ſent him to the Caſtle of Brecknock in Wales. He was a Man of mean Parentage (7), but having ſtudied at Oxford, where he had taken his Doctor's Degree, was ſo eminent for his learning and parts, that he was taken from thence, and made Privy-Counſellor by Henry VI. The Revolution which had placed Edward IV on the Throne, made no alteration in his Fortune. Edward, it is likely, pleaſed with his complaiſance, continued him in the ſame Poſt, and promoted him to the Biſhoprick of Ely. From thenceforward he was wholly attached to that Prince, which drew on him Richard's hatred, who put him under confinement the ſame day the Lord Haſtings was beheaded, for fear his affection to the late King's Family, ſhould lead him to oppoſe his deſigns.

The King and Queen crowned. Moor. Hall.

The ſixth of July, the Coronation of the King and Queen was performed with great Solemnity (8). All the Peers of the Realm were preſent for fear of being ſuſpected by the new King, whoſe jealous temper was well known. Margaret Counteſs of Richmond, Wife of the Lord Stanley, and Mother of the Earl of Richmond, detained in Bretagne, held up the Queen's Train.

Richard enjoyed but two years and two months the Crown he had ſo eagerly deſired. He ſpent his whole Reign in deviſing means to ſupport himſelf in the Throne, which having mounted by Bloodſhed and other crimes, he endeavoured to keep poſſeſſion by the ſame Methods, but all his meaſures proved ineffectual, divine Providence being pleaſed to blaſt projects, founded wholly upon Injuſtice, Violence, and the ſubverſion of the Laws. The preſent circumſtances ſeemed however to be very favorable for him. The Lancaſtrian Family was quite extinct in England. Henry Earl of Richmond, the only branch of that Houſe, was in the hands of the Duke of Bretagne, who had promiſed Edward IV to hinder him from going out of his dominions. Margaret his Mother ſhewed no inclination to proſecute her Rights. Beſides, ſhe was ſubject to a Husband whom Richard had attached to his intereſt, by one of the moſt conſiderable Poſts at Court. As to the Princes and Princeſſes of Portugal and Caſtile, deſcended from Philippa and Catharine of Lancaſter, Daughters of John of Gant, they were too remote to diſturb the new King. In fine, there was not a Lord in the Kingdom that ſeemed to have credit enough to excite inſurrections, the Civil War having ſwept away great numbers, and entirely deſtroyed many ancient families. As for thoſe that were ſtill left, Richard hoped to win them by favours, as he had already gained the Duke of Buckingham, the Duke of Norfolk, the Lord Stanley, and ſome others. As for the Yorkiſts attached to the family of Edward IV, namely, the Woodvilles, Greys, and others of the new Nobility, he had already diſpatched ſome, in the laſt reign, and the reſt were fled. The Queen-Widow was ſtill with her five Daughters in Sanctuary, from whence ſhe durſt not ſtir, and where ſhe ſeemed unable to hurt him. The Marquiſs of Dorſet her Son had likewiſe taken Sanctuary, and Sir Richard Woodville had abſconded. In a word, Edward V and the Duke of York his Brother were in the Tower, where, ſince the 27th of June, Richard had taken care to place as Governour Sir Robert Brackenbury his Creature. Thus, nothing ſeemed capable to ſhake the new Monarch's Throne. Circumſtances favorable for Richard.

Mean while, to be provided againſt whatever might happen, he formed the project to ſecure Caſtile and Portugal, the Archduke Maximilian, who governed the Low-Countries in the name of Philip his Son, France and Bretagne, from whence he feared his enemies might procure ſome aſſiſtance. In fine, to break all the meaſures which the friends of Edward the IVth's family might take againſt him, he reſolved to murder his nephews young King Edward V, and the Duke of York his Brother. Theſe were Richard's firſt projects to preſerve his Crown, which created him no leſs uneaſineſs after poſſeſſion, than whilſt he was labouring to obtain it.

He reſolves to put his Nephews to death. Moor. Hall.

Theſe meaſures being taken, nothing remained but to execute the principal article, the murder of his two Nephews. For that purpoſe, he reſolved to remove from London, that their death happening in his abſence, he might be the leſs ſuſpected. With this view, he departed from London to viſit ſeveral Counties, under colour of reforming certain abuſes introduced to the great detriment of the people. His progreſs into the North was particularly neceſſary, to curb the inſolence of the Troops he had ſent for from thence, and who, after their return, had committed great outrages. But before he proceeded to York, he made ſome ſtay at Gloceſter, not to be too far from London, whilſt his orders concerning his Nephews were executing.

He goes to Gloceſter.

The Duke of Buckingham demands the Inheritance of Hereford. Moor. Hall.

The Duke of Buckingham, his intimate friend and confident, attended him to Gloceſter. He had loaded that Lord with eſtates and honours, both whilſt he was Protector, and after he was King. But the Duke ſtill expected another favour, of which he had received a poſitive promiſe. And that was, the moiety of the Lands of the Houſe of Hereford, to which he thought he had a very juſt right. The foundation of his claim will plainly appear in the following Genealogy.

His Claim.

HUMPHREY BOHUN
Earl of Hereford and Northampton.

MARY BOHUN Wife of Henry IV	ANN THOMAS of Woodſtock Earl of Gloceſter, Son of Edward III.
HENRY V.	ANN Edmund Earl of Stafford.
HENRY VI.	HUMPHREY Duke of Buckingham.
EDWARD Prince of Wales.	HENRY Duke of Buckingham.

To conſider only this Genealogy, it is evident, the Duke of Buckingham had a right to claim one half of the Earl of Hereford's Lands, as deſcended from one of his Daughters. But there were other reaſons which rendered his title diſputable. When Richard II put to death his Uncle the Duke of Gloceſter at Calais, he cauſed his Eſtate to be confiſcated by the Parliament, and gave what that Prince held in Right of Ann his Wife, to the Earl of Derby, who had married the eldeſt of the Siſters, and withal created him Duke of Hereford. Thus, the Earl of Derby took poſſeſſion of the whole Inheritance of the Earl of Hereford his Father-in-law, and afterwards mounting the Throne by the name of Henry IV, all his Lands were annexed to the Crown, which was thereby poſſeſſed of the whole Eſtate of the Hereford Family, till Richard the third's acceſſion to the Throne. However, when Richard, being Protector, intended to engage the Duke of Buckingham to ſerve him in his deſign to uſurp the Crown, he promiſed to reſtore him the moiety of the Inheritance confiſcated upon the Duke of Gloceſter his great Grandfather. But after he was King he altered his mind, whether he thought he had amply rewarded him otherwiſe, or was afraid of rendering him too powerful, and ſo giving him occaſion to aſpire to the Throne, as deſcending from Edward III. Be this as it will, the Duke during this Journey putting him in mind of his promiſe, received ſuch an anſwer, as left him no room to expect that Juſtice or Favour (1). The Duke, who was very high-ſpirited, was ſo offended at the King's anſwer, that he deſired leave to go and look after his own private affairs (2). Richard not imagining, this refuſal had made ſo deep an Impreſſion upon the Duke, or perhaps, not fearing the effects of his reſentment, gave him the leave he deſired, and parting from him at Gloceſter, he purſued his Journey to York.

upon which the Duke retires.

During the King's ſtay at Gloceſter, he ſent an expreſs order to Brackenbury, Governor of the Tower of London, to murder Edward V, and the Duke of York his Brother. Brackenbury more conſcientious than his maſter, returned a very ſubmiſſive anſwer, but withal, told him, he ſhould never be able to execute his Commands. Richard vexed to be deceived in his opinion of that Officer, ſent him by James Tyrrel a written order, to deliver to the bearer the Keys and Government of the Tower for one ſingle night. Brackenbury obeyed, and Tyrrel brought in his Agents (3) to execute the King's orders. That very night, whilſt all were aſleep, he went into the two Princes's room, and ſmothering them in their bed, cauſed them to be buried under a little Stair-caſe. This is what Tyrrel himſelf afterwards confeſſed, who was executed in the reign of Henry VII. In 1674, whilſt ſome Alterations were making in that part of the Tower, Bones were found, which were thought to be thoſe of Edward V, and the Duke of York, and upon that ſuppoſition, Charles II, who then reigned, ordered them to be put into a marble Urn, and removed to Weſtminſter among the Tombs of the Kings (4). As the two Princes were never more heard of ſince the day Tyrrel went into the Tower, and as their Servants were diſmiſſed, the publick doubted not that they were ſacrificed to their Uncle's ſafety.

Richard having received the news of the death of his two Nephews, continued his Journey into the North, and came to York about the end of Auguſt. As the pretence of his Journey was to cauſe Juſtice to be impartially adminiſtred to the people, he could not help executing ſome of the northern Soldiers, who in returning from London had committed great outrages. Then, he cauſed himſelf to be crowned a ſecond time at the Cathedral of York, the beginning of September, and the ſame day he created Edward his Son, ten years old, Prince of Wales, with the uſual Formalities.

He creates his Son Prince of Wales.

A few days after his Coronation, he received the agreeable news, that Ferdinand and Iſabella had prevented him, by deſiring themſelves the Confirmation of the Alliance between England and Caſtile, by an Ambaſſador ſent on purpoſe, and who was then come to York. The renewing of that Alliance, which he ratified himſelf the 31ſt of Auguſt, pleaſed him extremely. He found that Ferdinand and Iſabella acknowledging him for lawful King, were forming no project to reſtore to the Throne the Houſe of Lancaſter, from whence Queen Iſabella was deſcended, being Grand-daughter of Catherine of Lancaſter, Daughter of John of Gant. He expreſſed his ſatisfaction by conferring the honour of Knighthood (5) upon Geoffrey de Saſiola Ambaſſador of Caſtile, who brought him the good news, and by his Letters full of eſteem, affection, and acknowledgment, to the King and Queen of Spain, to the Cardinal de Mendoça, and to the Earl of Leryn their Miniſters.

Troubles at the Court of France.

Whilſt the King was flattering himſelf with having taken all neceſſary meaſures to ſupport himſelf on the Throne, a Conſpiracy was forming againſt him, which ended in his ruin, after proving the deſtruction of its Author. I left the Duke of Buckingham diſſatisfied, and parting from the King in order to retire. He was a perſon of a lively and penetrating Genius, exceeding proud, ambitious, revengeful, and not very ſtrict in his Morals. During Edward the fourth's Life, he could never bring himſelf to ſtoop to the Queen, though ſhe had a great aſcendant over the King her Husband. He was even conſidered as head of the party of the Antient Nobility againſt the New, which wholly conſiſted of the Queen's relations and creatures. It was chiefly from his averſion to the Queen, that after Edward IV's death, he devoted himſelf entirely to the Duke of Gloceſter, for whom, as has been related, he procured the Protectorſhip, and at laſt the Crown itſelf. In return for ſo ſignal a ſervice, Rich-

1483. ard had liberally beſtowed his favours upon him. Particularly he made him as it were maſter of Wales, and the adjoining Counties, by the Poſts and Governments given him in thoſe parts (1). But all theſe favours were forgotten, when he refuſed to grant him a Moiety of the Lands of Hereford. The Duke perceived the King's policy, in giving him Poſts, from which he could remove him at pleaſure, whereas in reſtoring the Lands he demanded, it would not have been in his power to reſume them without uſing force. This proceeding convinced him, that the King would always keep him in dependance, and as he perfectly knew that Prince's Character, eaſily perceived, that the leaſt occaſion would be ſufficient to make him forfeit whatever he enjoyed. Beſides, he thought it a manifeſt injuſtice, in refuſing him what he believed to be his lawful right; that moreover he broke his promiſe, and ſhowed himſelf extremely ungrateful, in making ſo ill a return for the ſervices he had received from him. All this gave him reaſon to fear, he had intended to ruin him in time.

Cauſe of his Diſguſt.

Full of theſe ſiniſter thoughts he retired to his Caſtle of Brecknock, where Dr. Morton Biſhop of Ely was Priſoner under his cuſtody. In his frequent converſations with that Prelate, he could not help diſcovering his reſentment againſt the King. The Biſhop, who was a Man of ſenſe, quickly found, the Duke was diſſatisfied, which imboldened him to talk to him freely. He obſerved the Duke took a pleaſure in hearing him, and would have perhaps ſpoken himſelf more plainly, had he dared to truſt him entirely. So, to inſpire him with more confidence, he affected to ſpeak of the King in a manner, which by ſhowing what he thought of him, gave him to underſtand, that he ſhould find in him a Perſon ready to ſecond him in all his deſigns. At length, after mutually ſounding each other for ſome time, they opened their minds to one another, and lamented together the unhappy ſtate of the Kingdom under ſuch a King. The late death of Edward V and of the Duke his Brother, afforded them freſh matter to exclaim againſt Richard. They concluded, that ſince he had not ſpared his own Nephews, no Lord in the Kingdom could be ſure of his life. Theſe converſations ended at length in the Duke's requeſt to the Biſhop, to tell him freely, whether he ſaw no way to prevent the miſchiefs they had reaſon to fear; promiſing with an Oath to keep the ſecret inviolably. Morton, who till then was under ſome apprehenſions that the Duke deſigned to inſnare him, being encouraged by this Oath, told him in plain terms, "it was his opinion, there was no other way "than to dethrone Richard, and ſet up another King. "He owned, that though he could have wiſhed the "Crown had continued in the family of Henry VI, he "had not been able to avoid following the ſtream, when "he ſaw almoſt all England declare for Edward IV. "That afterwards, Henry VI and the Prince his Son "being dead, he had faithfully adhered to Edward. "That upon Edward's death he had ſerved with the "ſame zeal his young Son, whom he believed his lawful "Succeſſor. That afterwards he perceived with grief the "Duke of Gloceſter aſpiring to the Throne, and having "the honour to be of the Council, thought it his duty to "endeavour to oppoſe his deſign. But inſtead of ſuc-"ceeding, he had only drawn upon himſelf the hatred "and diſpleaſure of that Prince, who had thrown him "into Priſon, ſolely for adhering to the family of Ed-"ward IV. That this unjuſt violence had increaſed his "averſion for the Uſurper, and the tragical death of the "two young Princes had carried it to the utmoſt height. "That being in theſe circumſtances, he had conſidered "with himſelf what Prince would be moſt proper to be "placed on the Throne in the room of the Tyrant, and "had found no other than the Duke of Buckingham, de-"ſcended from a Son of Edward III. That the whole "race of Lancaſter being extinct, at leaſt in England, "there remained of the Houſe of York only the Tyrant "and his Son, with the young Earl of Warwick Son of "the Duke of Clarence. As for the laſt, he could not "pretend to the Crown, his Father's attainder having de-"barred his Heirs of the right of inheriting. That the "preſent King had by his crimes rendered himſelf un-"worthy, and to preſerve the Son's right after deſtroying "the Father, would be acting imperfectly. That there-"fore, once more, he ſaw only the Duke of Bucking-"ham capable of lawfully claiming the Crown."

The Duke and Biſhop of Ely conſult together how to dethrone the King. Moor. Hall.

The Biſhop propoſes to the Duke to make himſelf King. Moor. Hall.

Hall. Hollingſh. The Duke liſtened very attentively to this diſcourſe, but deferred his anſwer till next day. This delay threw the Biſhop into great perplexity, ſince it left him ſtill uncertain whether the Duke was ſincere, or deſigned only to ſift him. By the way, the Biſhop it ſeems, was not very ſcrupulous, ſince knowing the Duke of Buckingham's Character, as he muſt have done, he readily offered his ſervice to ſet him on the Throne. This is a ſign that he acted more from a motive of revenge againſt Richard, than with a view to the good of the publick. The King and the Duke were too much alike to expect a great advantage by ſuch a change. 1483. Hall.

The Duke rejects the Propoſal, and names the Earl of Richmond. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

Next day the converſation being reſumed, the Duke, after a long apology for all his former actions, freely confeſſed to the Prelate, "he had once an intention to aſpire "to the Throne, but upon mature deliberation had en-"tirely dropped it. He conſidered, that in acting for "himſelf, he ſhould ſtir up againſt him all the friends of "the two Houſes of York and Lancaſter, equally concern-"ed to oppoſe his pretenſions. That there was a Prince "nearer than he, whom the Houſe of Lancaſter looked "upon as their head, and he it was on whom he had caſt his "eyes to raiſe to the Throne. Then he named Henry Earl "of Richmond, who was in Bretagne." Adding, "that "the project to reſtore the Houſe of Lancaſter to the "Throne, would draw one half of the Kingdom to that "Prince's intereſt, and he had deviſed a happy expedient "to gain him the other half: And that was his marriage "with Elizabeth, eldeſt Daughter of Edward IV, which "would make all the Yorkiſts his friends. That more-"over, the Nation would receive great advantage from "thence, in as much as all the ſeeds of the Civil Wars "would be deſtroyed, by the union of the two contending "Houſes. That by this means even thoſe who were in-"different for either party, would be forced, as one may "ſay, to promote the common good of their Country; "and then Richard's few friends would not be able to "balance ſo great a power. Whereas if he pretended to "ſet up himſelf, the whole Kingdom would be united "againſt him, ſince there was not the leaſt colour to ex-"clude from the Throne, two Houſes that had been in "poſſeſſion above fourſcore years. In fine, he added, "that in his way to Brecknock, he met the Counteſs "of Richmond, and having ſounded her upon this head, "believed he could be ſure, ſhe would be eaſily diſpoſed "to promote the advancement of her Son."

The Biſhop likes the Propoſal. Hall.

The Biſhop liked this expedient, as more conformable to juſtice and equity, and more adapted to the good of the Realm, eſpecially as it came from the only perſon, who would have had reaſon to oppoſe it, had it been propoſed by another.

Rights of the Earl of Richmond.

Henry Earl of Richmond, as I elſewhere obſerved, was of Welſh extraction. But his Mother Margaret was Daughter of John de Beaufort Duke of Somerſet, Grandſon of John of Gant Duke of Lancaſter. Margaret's Father dying without Iſſue-Male, Edmund his younger Brother inherited his title. But Edmund and all his poſterity being deſtroyed in the Civil Wars, Margaret and her Son were the only remains of that Houſe. So, it ſeemed, they ſhould have indiſputably inherited all the rights of the Houſe of Lancaſter. But however the title was liable to great objections.

Whilſt John of Gant Duke of Lancaſter lived with Conſtantia of Caſtile his ſecond Wife, he kept, as his Concubine, Catharine Roet, Widow of Sir Otho de Swinford, and by her had ſeveral Children. Conſtantia his Wife being dead, he married his Concubine, and had intereſt enough to cauſe her Children, born before marriage, to be legitimated by an Act of Parliament, and by Richard II's ſubſequent Letters-Patent. However, the King and the Parliament, willing to make a diſtinction between theſe natural Children and the others born in Wedlock, gave them not the name of Lancaſter or Plantagenet, but that of Beaufort, the name of the Caſtle where they were born. Moreover, though in the Act of Parliament, and in the King's Letters Patent, power was granted them to hold Principalities, Dukedoms, Earldoms, &c. and to tranſmit them to their Heirs, there was no mention of the Crown (2). During the Reigns of Henry IV, and Henry V, the Princes of this branch durſt not aſſume the name of Lancaſter. It was not till about the end of Henry VI's reign, that Edmund Duke of Somerſet being Prime Miniſter, and very zealous for the King, againſt the attempts of the Duke of York, began by degrees to aſſert his deſcent from John of Gant, and his kindred to the King, as being of the Houſe of Lancaſter. It was a queſtion therefore to know, whether the Princes of this Branch could ſucceed

See Dugdale's Baron. Vol. I. p. 169; and Strype's Notes in Compl. Hiſt. Vol. I. p. 530.

(2) There was mention of the Crown, but it was to exclude them abſolutely from it; as is plain from the words of the Act. They were by it intitled.---Ad quecunque honores dignitates (excepta dignitate regali) preeminentias ſtatus gradus & officia publica & privata tam perpetua quam temporalia atque feudalia & nobilia quibuſcumque nominibus nuncupentur, etiamſi Ducatus Principatus Comitatus Baronie vel alia feuda fuerint---This Act bears date Febr. 9. Anno 20. Richard II, and was afterwards exemplified by King Henry IV, on Feb. 10, in the 8th year of his Reign. to 1483. to the Crown in their Turn. And ſuppoſing they could, the point was to know when their turn was to be, and whether the Heirs of John of Gant's Daughters born in Wedlock, were not to precede the Poſterity of a Son only legitimated, and born before Marriage. If ſo, there was no leſs than ten or twelve Princes and Princeſſes in Portugal, Caſtile and Germany, who would have excluded the Earl of Richmond. On the other hand, it ſeems that by Edward IV's Endeavours to have the Earl of Richmond in his hands, he had, as it were, owned him capable of inheriting all the Rights of the Houſe of Lancaſter. This was a queſtion which might have been debated in thoſe days, but which, having been decided above two hundred Years ſince, requires no farther Examination, unleſs out of meer curioſity thoſe that are verſed in theſe matters are willing to exerciſe their Wits.

Very likely, if the Duke of Buckingham had thought it in his power to mount the Throne, he would not have failed to object againſt the Earl of Richmond's Title the forementioned Reaſons. But, as he had himſelf obſerved, in his diſcourſe with the Biſhop of Ely, he could not ſet up himſelf without oppoſing the two Houſes of York and Lancaſter, that is to ſay, the whole Kingdom, which was divided between theſe two Factions. So the pretence to reſtore the Houſe of Lancaſter, and put an end to the Civil Wars by the Union of the two contending Houſes, was by far the more natural way to be revenged of Richard. I ſay to be revenged, for it is hard to believe, a Man of his Character ſhould act on this occaſion from a nobler Motive.

The Duke and Biſhop inform the Counteſs of Richmond of their Deſign. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

Be this as it will, the Duke and the Biſhop having conſulted together how to accompliſh their Deſigns, came to this Concluſion: That all hope of Succeſs was founded on the Marriage of the Earl of Richmond with the Princeſs Elizabeth; That therefore, before all things, that Point was to be ſecured, without which it would be to labour in vain, or at leaſt with great uncertainty. To that end they agreed, that they ſhould without loſs of time acquaint the Counteſs of Richmond with their Project, that ſhe might inform her Son of it, and perſwade the Queen-Dowager, Mother of the Princeſs, to conſent to the Marriage.

But as conferring with Margaret would have been very dangerous for the Duke of Buckingham, conſidering the King's extreme jealouſy of the Houſe of Somerſet, the Biſhop told him, he had an old Friend in the Counteſſes's Service, one [Reginald] Bray, who might ſafely be truſted with the Secret. The Duke approving this Expedient, Bray was privately ſent for to Brecknock, and the Project being imparted to him, the propoſing of it to his Miſtreſs was left to his care. More eſpecially, he was charged to tell her, that the Marriage of the Earl her Son was the Baſis and Foundation on which the whole Project reſted.

The Biſhop of Ely flies into Flanders. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

As ſoon as Bray was gone to execute his Commiſſion, the Biſhop of Ely deſired the Duke's leave to retire to his Biſhoprick. He was juſtly afraid of his Life, in caſe the Plot came to be diſcovered. It may be he did not wholly depend upon the Duke's Sincerity. But the Duke gave him two invincible Reaſons why he could not comply with his Requeſt. The firſt was, that he ſhould be guilty of letting his Priſoner eſcape, which alone would be ſufficient to inſpire the King with ſuſpicions. The ſecond, that in an Undertaking of this Nature, he could not proceed without his Advice. The Biſhop ſeemed to yield to theſe reaſons, but had by him ſtill ſtronger, to free himſelf from the impending Danger, in caſe the Affair was diſcovered. And therefore as he was not ſo narrowly watched by his Keepers, ſince his frequent Converſations with the Duke, he found means to eſcape, and retire to Ely; (1) from whence he fled into Flanders. Upon his Arrival, he wrote to the Duke to excuſe his eſcape, and withal, endeavoured to convince him, it was much more in his Power to promote the Execution of their intended Deſign, than whilſt he was Priſoner. He conjured him likewiſe, to continue in his Reſolution, and ſhewed him how he might carry on a private Correſpondence with him.

He writes to the Duke.

The Counteſs of Richmond enters into the Plot

Mean while, the Counteſs of Richmond being informed of what was projected in favour of the Earl her Son, ſent back her Servant to the Duke of Buckingham with her Compliment of Thanks; and withal let him know, ſhe was endeavouring to obtain the Queen Dowager's Conſent to the Marriage, and then would take the moſt proper Meaſures to ſend to the Earl of Richmond.

Elizabeth Woodville Widow of Edward IV, was ſtill in her Sanctuary at Weſtminſter with her five Daughters, lamenting the Death of her two Sons, and blaming herſelf for having been the occaſion, by her eaſineſs to deliver the Duke of York to his Uncle. There had never been any particular Friendſhip between that Queen and the Counteſs of Richmond. One was Wife to a King of the Houſe of York, and the other was of the Family of Somerſet, ſworn Enemies of the Yorkiſts. Wherefore the Counteſs could not viſit the Queen in her Sanctuary, without cauſing great ſuſpicion. To avoid this Inconvenience, ſhe made uſe of one Lewis her Phyſician, (2) and having communicated the whole Affair to him, ordered him to go to London and ſo manage as to ſee the Queen, and inform her of what was in Agitation. Above all, ſhe charged him to tell her, that all hope of Succeſs depended upon the Union of the two Houſes of York and Lancaſter, by the Marriage of the Princeſs Elizabeth with the Earl of Richmond.

1483. She acquaints the Queen-Dowager with it. Hall. Hollingſh.

Lewis being come to London, found no great difficulty, as a Phyſician, to get admittance to the Queen. He communicated to her what he had in charge, intimating it wou'd be in her own power to be reveng'd of her mortal Enemy, the Murderer of her Children, and dethrone the Uſurper, provided ſhe would conſent to the Marriage propoſed. The Queen gladly liſtened to the Overture. She charged the Doctor to tell his Miſtreſs, ſhe approved of the project, and would ſo order it, that all the King her Husband's friends ſhould join with the Earl of Richmond. But ſhe added, ſhe wiſhed the Earl would ſwear to marry Elizabeth, or in caſe ſhe happened to die, Cecily her younger Siſter.

Who promiſes to give her Daughter to the Earl of Richmond. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

The Temper of the Nation favourable to the Conſpirators.

Matters being thus ſettled between the Queen Dowager, the Counteſs of Richmond, and the Duke of Buckingham, they endeavoured to ingage in the plot, their moſt truſty friends, who likewiſe drew in others (3). The Engliſh were as favorably diſpoſed as could be wiſhed, by three principal reaſons. Firſt, becauſe of the people's univerſal hatred of the King, who had made himſelf extremely odious, as well by what he had done during his Protectorſhip, as by his late Crime, in putting his Nephews to death, after robbing them of the Crown. He had thereby loſt moſt of the friends of the Houſe of York, who only wanted an opportunity to revenge the Family of Edward IV. In the ſecond place, all the Lancaſtrians ſaw with pleaſure, a project tending to reſtore the Houſe of Lancaſter to the Throne. Laſtly, thoſe that without regarding the Intereſts of the two Factions, had only the good of the Nation in view, could not but conſider as a great happineſs, the ſucceſs of an enterprize, which by uniting the two contending Houſes, would put an end to the Civil War, wherewith the Kingdom had been afflicted thirty years. Thus the Lancaſtrians, Yorkiſts, and even thoſe that ſtood neuter, were equally diſpoſed to concur to the downfal of the Uſurper.

The Duke begins to take meaſures to execute his deſigns. Hall. Stow. Bucking.

The Duke of Buckingham being the Author and head of the Enterprize, it was his part to conduct it to a happy iſſue. For that purpoſe, he firſt ſecured ſome friends in Wales, where his power was great, who undertook to liſt Soldiers privately, to enable him to bring, ſuddenly and ſeaſonably, an army into the field. Then, he ſettled a Correſpondence with ſome Gentlemen of Dorſetſhire, Devonſhire, and Cornwal, who promiſed to raiſe Forces, and receive the Earl of Richmond at his arrival. His deſign was to join them himſelf, with his Welſhmen, that Richard might be leſs able to oppoſe the Earl's landing. At the ſame time, ſeveral Lords and Gentlemen were to riſe in other Counties, that the King might be at a loſs where to march firſt. The Marquiſs of Dorſet, who had lately quitted his Sanctuary (4), Sir Richard Woodville his Brother (5), the Biſhop of Exeter, Sir Edward Courtney his Brother, and ſeveral other perſons of Quality engaged in the plot.

Theſe meaſures being taken, the Counteſs of Richmond ſent two Expreſſes (6) to the Earl her Son, by different ways, to let him know what was reſolved in his favour, and how far the project was advanced. The two Expreſſes arriving almoſt together, informed him of all the circumſtances of the plot, and prayed him to repair into England without loſs of time, upon the Aſſurance they gave him, that every thing was ready for his reception. They told him likewiſe that Dorſetſhire, Devonſhire, or Cornwal (7), were the moſt convenient places to land, by

He reſolves to impart the Matter to the Duke of Bretagne. Hall. Stow.

The Earl of Richmond was then at Vannes in Bretagne, where he had been ſeveral years, really a Priſoner, becauſe of the Duke of Bretagne's engagements with Edward IV; but his Confinement was not ſtrict, the Duke contenting himſelf with narrowly watching him, in order to hinder his eſcape, in caſe he attempted it. In other reſpects he enjoyed an honourable freedom. He heard with great joy, that he was thought of in England. But when he came to conſider his preſent condition, and how little it was in his power to return into his own Country, ſo as to procure a welcome reception, he found it would be almoſt impoſſible to ſucceed in his enterprize, without the Duke of Bretagne's conſent and aſſiſtance. For unleſs that Prince ſupplied him with Money, Troops, and Ships, it was not practicable to take juſt meaſures to accompliſh his deſigns. Beſides, the Duke might have made him cloſe Priſoner, by which means the whole affair would have miſcarried. So, perceiving he could not proceed without him, he reſolved to tell him the ſecret, and ingage him, if poſſible, to aſſiſt him. He found the Duke more ready to countenance him than he expected. The Duke was not engaged with Richard, as he had been with Edward his Brother. Beſides, the unjuſt and violent actions of the new King had rendered him odious to all the Princes of Europe, and eſpecially to the Duke of Bretagne. Another thing likewiſe induced him to hearken to the Earl's propoſals. He had pretenſions to the Earldom of Richmond in England, formerly enjoyed by his Anceſtors, and imagined, the Earl would readily promiſe to reſtore it, if, by his means, he arrived to the Crown. It is pretended, this was the principal Article of their agreement, for which the Duke very willingly ingaged to ſupply him with Men and Ships. When the Earl was ſure of the Duke of Bretagne's aſſiſtance, he ſent Expreſſes (1) to the Counteſs his Mother, and the Duke of Buckingham, to acquaint them that he hoped to be ready by the beginning of October, deſiring them to prepare all things by that time. This good news preſently put all the Conſpirators in motion. Every one repaired to the poſt aſſigned him, as well to raiſe Forces, as excite Inſurrections. There was no time to loſe, good part of September being now paſt.

The Duke promiſes him aſſiſtance. Hall. Hollingſh.

Richard receives conflicting Notions of the Conſpiracy. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

How careful ſoever the Conſpirators had been to conceal themſelves, all theſe things could not be done, and Richard have no Intelligence that ſome plot was contriving againſt him. But none could tell him what it was, or who were the Authors. He was then at York, thinking of very different things, ſo ſecure was he in his own opinion. But theſe advices obliged him to leave the North, and approach the Center of the Kingdom. At the ſame time he ordered his Troops, which were diſperſed in ſeveral parts, to be ready to march at a moment's warning. Mean while, he prepared very ſlowly, not imagining the danger ſo near. As the Intelligence he had received, made him uneaſy, he ran over in his mind all the Lords of the Realm, who could be diſſatisfied, or had ſufficient Credit to excite Inſurrections againſt him. He found none but the Duke of Buckingham. He had angred him by diſappointing him with regard to the Lands of Hereford, and knowing him perfectly, could not doubt that he was capable of any thing, to be revenged. Beſides, he knew him to be alone in condition by his parts, his riches, and his intereſt, to form and execute great projects. His own experience would not ſuffer him to queſtion it. The Biſhop of Ely's eſcape ſerved alſo to ſtrengthen this ſuſpicion. The Duke of Buckingham muſt have known how odious that Prelate was to him, and therefore his careleſſneſs in guarding ſuch a priſoner, could not but be deemed a colluſion and conſequence of ſome ill deſign. Upon theſe ſuſpicions, which were but too well-grounded, Richard reſolved to ſend for him to Court, but the Duke deſired to be excuſed, on pretence of ſome Indiſpoſition. This refuſal confirmed the King in his belief, that what he had ſuſpected was but too true. Nevertheleſs, to be more fully ſatisfied, he ſent him poſitive orders to come to him, without alledging any excuſe. The Duke perceiving diſſimulation was to no purpoſe, ſent him word, he would not expoſe his perſon to his mortal enemy, whom he neither loved nor would ſerve.

He ſuſpects the Duke of Buckingham.

He orders him to Court. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

The Duke refuſes, and declares againſt the King.

He takes up arms. Hall.

This was ſufficient to convince the King, that the Duke of Buckingham was the prime mover of the plot, which for ſome time had made him uneaſy. On the other hand, the Duke perceiving, that after ſuch a declaration there was no more Ceremony to be uſed, drew together the Forces which himſelf and friends had privately liſted in Wales, and began to march towards the weſtern Counties (2), where he knew the Earl of Richmond intended to land. There he was to be joined by thoſe who were gone before, to prepare all things againſt the Earl's arrival. 1483.

He deſigns to go into Cornwal,

Richard was not a little ſurprized to hear, that the Duke was ſo ready. However, as he had taken ſome precautions to aſſemble his Forces in caſe of neceſſity, he appointed the rendezvous at Leiceſter, where he repaired himſelf, with a reſolution to give his enemies Battle, before their number was increaſed. He would have found it very difficult however to prevent them, if an extraordinary and very unexpected accident had not hindered the Duke from joining his friends, who were all ready to riſe in arms in the Counties of Devon and Cornwal. The Duke was advancing by long marches (3) to Gloceſter, where he deſigned to paſs the Severn. But at the ſame time the River was ſo ſwoln, that the Country on both ſides was over-flowed, and great damage done by the waters. Never had ſo terrible an Inundation been heard of in that Country. It held ſix whole days, during which the Duke's army could neither paſs the River, nor ſubſiſt on the other ſide, where was nothing but deſolation (4). In fine, the Welſh Soldiers, tired with being expoſed to hunger, rains, and numberleſs hardſhips, returned to their homes, notwithſtanding all the Duke's Intreaties to the contrary (5). The deſertion was ſo general, that there remained with the Duke only one ſingle Servant. Reduced to this ſad condition, he ſaw no other remedy than to conceal himſelf till he ſhould take new meaſures. Unhappily for him, he choſe for his retreat, the Houſe of one Baniſter, who had been his Servant, and to whom his Father and himſelf had been very kind.

Proclamation againſt the Conſpirators. Act Pub. XII. p. 204.

The King hearing of the diſperſion of the Duke of Buckingham's Troops, iſſued out a Proclamation againſt him and the Marquis of Dorſet, with ſome other of his Adherents, or whom he ſuppoſed to be in league with him. But as the Marquis had not yet appeared in arms, and ſo could not be ſtiled a Rebel, he made uſe of another pretence to involve him in the Sentence. He ſaid, that having taken an Oath at his Coronation, to puniſh vice and wickedneſs, he was obliged to puniſh the Marquis of Dorſet, notorious for his debaucheries, who had ſeduced and raviſhed ſeveral Virgins, been guilty of ſundry Adulteries, and publickly kept Shore's Wife. Then he promiſed a reward of a thouſand Pounds Sterling, or a hundred pounds a year to any perſon that ſhould bring the Duke to Juſtice; a thouſand Marks, or one hundred Marks a year for the Marquis, and ſo in proportion for the reſt that were named in the Proclamation (6). The Villain Baniſter (7), not being able to reſiſt ſo ſtrong a temptation, betrayed his maſter to the Sheriff of Shropſhire (8), who cauſing the Houſe to be ſurrounded by a Company of armed Men, ſeized the Duke of Buckingham, diſguiſed like a Peaſant, and conducted him to Shrewsbury. The Duke was deſirous to ſpeak with the King, but could never obtain that favour. Some ſay, he intended to kill him with a dagger which was found upon him after his death. But this is only Conjecture. However it be, he was beheaded at Shrewsbury (9), without any legal proceſs, by the King's bare order. Thus, this Lord, who had helped to take away the Lives of the Lord Haſtings, the Earl of Rivers, and the other priſoners at Pontfract, by an arbitrary Sentence, periſhed himſelf in the ſame manner, contrary to all right, by the abſolute orders of him whom he had placed on the Throne. On the other hand, we ſhall ſee preſently, that this very Conſpiracy, formed by the Duke of Buckingham, accomplice of all the King's ill actions, whilſt he was but Protector, proved the occaſion of that Monarch's ruin. Is it poſſible, not to perceive the direction of Providence in ſuch ſort of Events!

The Earl of Richmond comes upon the Coaſt of Cornwal. Hall. Hollingſh.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in England, the Earl of Richmond imagining that all went there to his wiſh, ſailed from St. Malo's the 12th of October with five thouſand Men and forty Ships, furniſhed by the Duke of Bretagne. But the Fleet being diſperſed by a Storm, ſome of the Ships were driven on the Coaſt of France, others returned into Bretagne. The Ship in which was the Earl of Richmond, reſiſting the Seas better than the reſt, arrived, after the ſtorm, upon the Coaſt of Cornwal (1), where he ſaw the Shore crowded with Troops, who made him a ſignal to approach. But happily for him, he reſolved not to land till his fleet had re-joined him, expecting they would ſoon be at the Rendezvous. Mean time, he ſent to inquire whether the Troops he ſaw were friends or enemies. The Commander anſwered, he was poſted there by the Duke of Buckingham to wait for the Earl of Richmond, and favour his landing. But the Perſon ſent by the Earl eaſily perceived the contrary, and informed his maſter of it, who finding his deſign was diſcovered, put to ſea, and arrived at a Port in Normandy. The truth is, the Troops he ſaw on the Coaſt of Cornwal were the Militia of the County, poſted there by Richard, with intent to ſurpriſe his enemy by that Artifice.

He is like to be ſurprized, but eſcapes.

He retires into Normandy.

He returns to Bretagne. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

The Earl of Richmond heard in Normandy of the Duke of Buckingham's misfortune. As after that, there was no more appearance of purſuing his enterprize without taking new meaſures, he returned to Bretagne, where he found the Marquiſs of Dorſet, with the reſt that had made their eſcapes out of England. Tho' his deſign ſeemed entirely blaſted, he deſpaired not of better ſucceſs another time. The fugitives told him, Richard was extremely hated in England, which he took for a good omen. On the other hand, the Duke of Bretagne promiſed him to continue his aſſiſtance. So, reſolving to make a freſh Attempt, he ſolemnly ſwore on Chriſtmaſs-Day, in the Cathedral of Rennes, that he would marry the Princeſs Elizabeth Daughter of Edward IV, or in caſe ſhe died, Cecily her younger Siſter. Then all the Engliſh there preſent ſwore allegiance to him, conſidering him as King of England by right though he was not ſo in fact. From thenceforward, the ſtrict enquiry made in England after thoſe that were concerned in the plot, forced great numbers to retire into Bretagne, ſo that the reſort of the Engliſh was very great for ſome time.

Mean while, Richard having freed himſelf from this danger more happily than he had reaſon to expect, commanded ſeveral Perſons to be ſeized, ſome of whom were immediately ſacrificed to his vengeance (2). Of this number was Sir Thomas St. Leger his Brother-in-law, who married his Siſter Ann, Widow of the Duke of Exeter. In order to make ſhort work, and avoid the uſual formalities of the Courts of Juſtice, he commiſſioned Sir Ralph Aſhton to exerciſe the office of Vice-Conſtable, with ſo extenſive a power that he could condemn and execute upon the ſpot all Perſons whatever, guilty, or ſuſpected of the crime of High-Treaſon, without having regard to any appeal (3).

An extraordinary Commiſſion to Aſhton. Act. Pub. XII. p. 205.

By virtue of this Commiſſion, Aſhton, who was, probably, a man after the King's own heart, came into the weſtern Counties, where he ſignalized his zeal by bloody executions of ſuch as were found guilty, or only ſuſpected of having favoured the Conſpirators. Thus were ſpent the firſt ſix months of the Reign of Richard III. This ambitious Prince was no ſooner on the Throne, but he had occaſion to perceive, with what difficulties he ſhould preſerve a Crown ſo eagerly deſired, and by ſo many unlawful practices procured.

1484. The Parliament meets. Cotton's Abridg. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

In January 1484, the King ſummoned his firſt Parliament (4). This was done at a very ſeaſonable Juncture. The Duke of Buckingham's conſpiracy ſeeming entirely ſtifled by the death of that Lord and the retreat of the Earl of Richmond, there was not in the Kingdom any perſon in condition to lift up his head. So the Parliament, conſiſting no doubt of Repreſentatives devoted to the King, declared Edward the Fourth's Iſſue illegitimate (5), and confirmed Richard's irregular election, with his pretended right to the Crown. This Act was abſolutely neceſſary for the King's ſecurity. Beſides, the Parliament thereby avoided the Trouble of inquiring after the fate of Edward V, whom all England had for ſome Months acknowledged for King. 1484.

Edward IV's Iſſue declared Baſtards.

Then an Act of Attainder was paſſed againſt Henry Earl of Richmond and all his Adherents, by virtue whereof all their Eſtates were forfeited to the King (6). By this Act, which declared all thoſe Rebels and Traitors that were concerned in the Duke of Buckingham's and the Earl of Richmond's conſpiracy, all the late executions were in ſome meaſure juſtified, becauſe ſuch as had ſuffered, were conſidered as guilty of the crime condemned by this Act (7). By good fortune none of them diſcovered that the Counteſs of Richmond was concerned in the Plot, whether ſhe had truſted but few perſons, or her confidents had eſcaped into Bretagne. However, Richard thinking it hardly poſſible for the Earl of Richmond to form an enterprize without his Mother's knowledge, ordered the Lord Stanley her Husband to keep her confined, to prevent her from any future attempts. He had then a perfect confidence in the Lord Stanley, whom he had made High-Conſtable, after Aſhton, as Vice-Conſtable, had been inſtrumental in his deſigns. It is likely, he did not think the Lord Stanley a proper perſon to exerciſe the ſeverities for which he had commiſſioned Aſhton, and no doubt that was the reaſon why he did not make him High-Conſtable, till every thing relating to that Commiſſion was finiſhed.

Richard had reaſon to believe, that after all the rigours exerciſed upon the parties concerned, the conſpiracy was entirely cruſhed (8). But Thomas Hutton, who was returned from his Embaſſy to Bretagne, told him, the ſame Plot ſtill ſubſiſted, and the Duke of Bretagne had promiſed the Earl of Richmond the continuance of his aſſiſtance. He gave him the Names of thoſe conſpirators who were with the Earl, and informed him, they had frequent conferences together, and were very buſy. It was eaſy to conclude from thence, that the Earl of Richmond had not loſt all hopes, and had ſtill in England correſpondencies whereon he founded the execution of his deſigns. And yet ſince the death of the Duke of Buckingham, the flight of the Marquiſs of Dorſet, and the execution of ſeveral of the ſame party, Richard ſaw no one in the Kingdom that ſeemed to be able to withſtand him. So, concluding the danger muſt come from abroad, he reſolved to take all poſſible precautions to hinder his enemies from being aſſiſted by foreign Princes.

Laſt year, he confirmed the alliance of England with Caſtile, and in June this year did the ſame thing with regard to Portugal. Probably the whole ſtorm was to come from thoſe two quarters, ſince the King of Portugal and the Queen of Caſtile were both deſcended from Philippa and Catherine, Daughters of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaſter, and conſequently might have pretended to the Crown of England. Though Richard did not ſeem to have occaſion to fear any thing from France, under a Minority diſturbed with inteſtine diviſions, he had taken care however to ſend Ambaſſadors to Charles VIII to deſire the prolongation, or at leaſt, confirmation of the Truce.

and tries to ſeize the Duke of Bretagne.

There remained only Bretagne and Scotland that could give him any uneaſineſs. He did not queſtion that the Duke of Bretagne had already aſſiſted, and was ſtill inclined to aſſiſt the Earl of Richmond. For that reaſon, he thought nothing ſhould be ſpared to gain that Prince to his intereſt.

Affairs of Bretagne.

Francis II, Duke of Bretagne, being old and infirm, was entirely governed by Peter Landais his Treaſurer, and committed to him the ſole management of his Affairs. This Favourite, who was the Son of a Taylor, uſed his power ſo inſolently, that he drew upon himſelf the hatred of all the Bretons. This very year 1484, the great Men combining together againſt him, would have ſeized him in the Duke's Palace, but miſſing their aim, ſaw themſelves expoſed to the Favourite's vengeance, who cauſed them to be declared guilty of High-Treaſon. Mean while, as the whole Country was againſt him, he believed it proper to ſupport himſelf by ſome foreign aid. To that end he ſent in his Maſter's Name Ambaſſadors to Richard, on pretence to make a Truce with him, which was accordingly concluded in June at Pontfract, where the King then was, and which was to laſt till the 24th of April following.

Secret Negotiations between Richard and the Duke, to Landais his Favorite. p. 228, 229.

But this was not the only Commiſſion theſe Ambaſſadors were charged with. There are two Records in the Collection of the Publick Acts, whereby it appears, that Richard had promiſed to ſend the Duke of Bretagne an aid of a thouſand Archers. Now this could be only for the abovementioned occaſion, ſince the Duke of Bretagne had then no War upon his hands. As the Duke did nothing of himſelf, very likely, to obtain this aid, Landais had put the King in hopes, he would deliver up the Earl of Richmond. And indeed the ſequel plainly ſhewed, he had enter'd into ſome ſuch ingagement. Thus Richard thought himſelf ſo ſecure from Bretagne, that inſtead of fearing the Duke would aſſiſt the Earl of Richmond, he flattered himſelf with the hopes of having his enemy very ſoon in his power.

Truce with Scotland. p. 207, 218. 232—244. Hall. fol. 42, &c. Hollingſh. Stow.

As he might alſo be apprehenſive that the King of Scotland, deſcended from a Princeſs of the Houſe of Somerſet, would countenance the Male-contents, as being concerned to place the Earl of Richmond on the Throne of England, he believed he ought to ſecure himſelf too from that quarter. To that end, he negotiated with James III. a Truce, concluded in September this year, and which was to laſt from the 29th of that month to the ſame day of the year 1487. At the ſame time, he concluded the marriage of his Niece Ann de la Pole, Daughter of his Siſter Elizabeth and the Duke of Suffolk, with the Duke of Rothſay, the King of Scotland's eldeſt Son.

Death of the Prince of Wales. Hiſt. Croyl. Hall.

All theſe precautions appeared ſo juſt, that he ſeemed to be ſcreened from all danger. However, to rob the Earl of Richmond of all hopes of accompliſhing his deſigns, the Prince of Wales his Son dying in April this year (1), he declared his Nephew the Earl of Lincoln his preſumptive Heir, intending to have this declaration ratified by the Parliament. The Earl of Lincoln was Son of Elizabeth his Siſter (2), and Brother of Ann, who was to marry the Prince of Scotland.

Earl of Lincoln declared Heir to the Crown.

Embaſſy of Obedience to the Pope. Act. Pub. XII. p. 253.

Moreover, not to neglect any thing that might give his enemies an advantage, he ſent an Ambaſſador of obedience to Pope Innocent VIII, lately elected to the papal Throne. He had omitted this compliment to Sixtus IV, Innocent's Predeceſſor, as appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts. But his fear of incenſing the Pope, and affording ſome pretence to the Male-contents in the Kingdom, and particularly the Clergy, made him diſpatch his Ambaſſadors to Rome.

Embaſſy from France. p. 234.

Shortly after, he had the ſatisfaction to ſee that Charles VIII, King of France, deſired a Safe-Conduct for Ambaſſadors he intended to ſend to him. Thus every thing ſeemed to be happily diſpoſed in his favour. Mean while, the Earl of Richmond was ſtill full of life, and ſo long as that Prince was out of his power, he could not think himſelf thoroughly fixed on the Throne. This was the chief, or rather the ſole cauſe of all his trouble and care.

The Truce with Bretagne being to laſt but till the 24th of April 1485, Richard took occaſion from thence to ſend Ambaſſadors to the Duke to cauſe it to be prolonged. That was the pretence of the Ambaſſy. But the Ambaſſadors had orders to treat of another more important affair, with Landais, prime Miniſter and abſolute Maſter of the Duke, who was fallen into a kind of Lethargy, which rendered him unfit for publick affairs. And that was to perſuade this Miniſter to deliver up the Earl of Richmond. 1484.

Landais had not wanted the forementioned thouſand Archers. It was therefore neceſſary, in order to obtain what the King deſired, to make a new Treaty which might be ſo advantagious to the Duke and the Favourite, as to cauſe them to overlook all their ſcruples upon that ſubject. As for the Duke, Argentré affirms, he ſaw among the Records of Bretagne, Richard the third's Letters Patent, whereby he gave to Duke Francis the Earldom of Richmond with all its dependencies, as enjoyed by his Anceſtors, with the ſole reſervation of its return to the Crown in caſe the Duke died without Iſſue. With reſpect to Landais, as the negotiation was more ſecret, it is not well known what reward he expected for his intended ſervice. Thus much is certain, Richard made him very advantagious offers. But as he was a Man not to be ſatisfied with bare promiſes, there was often occaſion to ſend expreſſes to the King. Theſe delays, which, as Argentré poſitively affirms, were upon the Miniſter's account, proved the Earl of Richmond's ſecurity. Though he was then in Bretagne, he was entirely ignorant of what paſſed at the Duke's Court. But the Biſhop of Ely, who though abſent, had good ſpies about Richard, being informed that the Biſhop of Leon, Ambaſſador of Bretagne, was treating very privately with the King, warned the Earl of Richmond that he was not ſafe in the Duke of Bretagne's Dominions. This advice coming from ſo good a hand, put the Earl upon ſeriouſly thinking of freeing himſelf from the impending danger. As he knew Landais to be a perſon capable of committing the vileſt actions, he reſolved to retire into France, and for that purpoſe ſent privately to King Charles for a Paſſ-port (3), which was readily granted him. Mean while, informed as he was of Landais's ill deſigns, he did not queſtion that he had ordered him to be narrowly watched. So the difficulty of eſcaping was not ſmall, eſpecially as he was ſurrounded with a great number of Engliſh, in reſpect of whom it was very hard to conceal the ſecret, and very dangerous to reveal it. To remedy this inconvenience, the Duke of Bretagne being at that time recovered of his illneſs, the Earl took occaſion to ſend the principal Lords of his retinue to congratulate him upon it (4), ordering them to take with them all their ſervants, under colour of doing him the more honour. His aim was not only to be more alone at Vannes, but chiefly to remove from his keepers all ſuſpicion of his deſiring to eſcape, whilſt he had ſo many Hoſtages at the Duke's Court. Accordingly, this artifice ſucceeded to his wiſh, ſo that, two days after, he departed from Vannes in diſguiſe, attended by five perſons only. As ſoon as he was out of the Town, he left the great road, and riding croſs the Fields and through by-ways, without ſtopping any where, ſafely arrived at Angers Capital of Anjou. This diligence was abſolutely neceſſary; for otherwiſe he would have been infallibly taken. Thoſe who were charged to watch him, hearing of his eſcape, purſued him ſo cloſely, that they came upon the borders of Bretagne, but one hour after him. In a few days the Duke being informed that the Earl was retired under an apprehenſion of ill treatment, ſeemed very angry with Landais for giving him occaſion to fear, not knowing doubtleſs what his Favourite was negotiating with the King of England. Then he gave all the Engliſh in his Dominions leave, to go to the Earl with his compliments and offers of ſervice. The Earl of Richmond received theſe civilities with ſigns of the utmoſt gratitude, and deſired the Duke's meſſenger to tell him, he would have all his favours in everlaſting remembrance. Thus the Earl of Richmond eſcaped, as it were miraculouſly, out of Richard's ſnares. This was the ſecond time he had been thus happily delivered. The Engliſh belonging to his retinue, thought themſelves no leſs fortunate than he, to be freed, by the Duke's generoſity, from his unworthy Miniſter, who not long after atoned on a Gibbet for all the ill actions his avarice had prompted him to commit.

The Earl of Oxford eſcapes out of Hammes, and goes to the Earl of Richmond. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

Whilſt his Affairs were in this ſtate of uncertainty, he ſaw the Earl of Oxford (1) arrive, whom King Edward IV had confined in the Caſtle of Hammes in Picardy. This Lord, who had been one of the principal friends of the Houſe of Lancaſter, hearing in priſon that the Earl of Richmond pretended to the Crown, had wrought ſo effectually upon the Governor of Hammes (2), that he had perſuaded him to releaſe him, and declare for the Earl. He even brought him along with him to ſalute that Prince, and offer him his ſervice. The advantage of having the Earl of Oxford in his party, was very beneficial to the Earl of Richmond in England. Several other Lords privately ſent him word that he might depend upon their aſſiſtance, when they ſhould ſee a proper ſeaſon to declare againſt Richard.

Richard obliges the Lord Stanley to leave his Son in Hoſtage. Hall. Stow.

Mean while, the King had daily notice that ſomething was contriving againſt him in favor of the Earl of Richmond; but could not diſcover the authors of the plot, what ſpies ſoever he employed. Beſides, he knew no Engliſh Lord powerful enough, as he thought, to form or execute an enterprize of that nature. The Lord Stanley was the only Perſon he could miſtruſt, becauſe he was Husband to the Counteſs of Richmond. That alone rendered him ſuſpected, though otherwiſe he had no Proof againſt him. So, to ſecure himſelf from that ſide, Stanley deſiring permiſſion to retire upon his own eſtate, he required him to leave his Son (3) at Court as a ſort of Hoſtage. Indeed, his ſuſpicions were but too juſt, ſince that very Lord proved afterwards the principal inſtrument of his ruin.

He diſcovers the Project of the Marriage of the Earl of Richmond with Elizabeth. Hall. Stow.

Richard knew he was not beloved in England. On the other hand, he heard there were certain motions among the people, which, though ſecret, could not but be dangerous. However, he could not prevent the miſchief he dreaded, without knowing wherein conſiſted the plots of his enemies, and the principal authors: Upon this therefore he laid out all his pains. At length, by planting ſpies in the Country, he came to find, that the projects in favor of the Earl of Richmond were founded upon his promiſe to marry the Princeſs Elizabeth, eldeſt Daughter of Edward IV. This diſcovery made him perceive, the Yorkiſts were not far from an union with the Lancaſtrians, ſince they conſented to this marriage. It was manifeſt that ſuch an agreement could not but occaſion his ruin, ſince in that caſe he would have only a few friends of his houſe to rely on, all the reſt declaring for his Brother's family. Finding therefore, that the Plot which was contriving againſt him, reſted upon a more ſolid foundation than he had imagined, he applied himſelf wholly to break the Earl of Richmond's meaſures, by preventing this fatal marriage. He found no better way to accompliſh his ends, than to marry himſelf the Princeſs deſigned for his Enemy. But the execution of ſuch a Project was clogged with ſeveral difficulties, which to a Prince leſs ſcrupulous than himſelf, would have appeared inſuperable. The firſt was, he had a Wife already, whoſe conſtitution afforded no ſigns of her leaving this world. But he deſpaired not to ſurmount that obſtacle, either by a divorce, or ſome other leſs lawful means. The ſecond difficulty was, to draw Elizabeth out of the Sanctuary at Weſtminſter, where ſhe was with the Queen her Mother. Beſides, it was no eaſy task to perſuade the Queen Dowager to give her Daughter to the murderer of her Sons. Laſtly, the Pope's Diſpenſation to marry his Niece muſt be obtained. But this obſtacle ſeemed inconſiderable in compariſon of the others, well knowing, it was not impracticable to adjuſt that affair with the Court of Rome.

He reſolves to marry his Niece. Hall. Hollingſh.

He gets the Queen-Dowager to give up her Daughters. Hall. Hiſt. Croyl. Stow. Hollingſh.

To begin the execution of this ſtrange project, he ſent ſeveral perſons to the Queen Dowager, to inſinuate to her, that he wiſhed to live in friendſhip with her, and to ſhew her marks of his good will: That he confeſſed, he had dealt too rigorouſly with her; but to repair in ſome meaſure the injury he had done her, he intended to aſſign her an honorable penſion, and give her two Brothers ſuch poſts as they ſhould have reaſon to be ſatisfied with. Moreover, he would take care of her Daughters, and help them to marriages ſuitable to their quality. But as the Queen would hardly be induced to credit his promiſes, after having been ſo cruelly deceived, the perſons he employed hinted to her, that this alteration proceeded from the death of the Prince of Wales. That the King being now childleſs, and without hopes of having any Iſſue, his intereſts were no longer diſtinct from thoſe of his Brother's family, and therefore he could do nothing more advantagious to himſelf and his houſe, than to marry his Nieces into the moſt conſiderable families in England. In fine, ſhe was told, the King's deſign was, that after his death, the Princeſs Elizabeth ſhould aſcend the Throne; what he had done in favour of the Earl of Lincoln his Nephew being eaſily revokable, ſince it had not yet paſſed into an Act of Parliament. 1484.

Theſe laſt inſinuations made deep impreſſion in the Queen's mind. Her intereſt made her imagine, what was ſaid to be very probable. On the other hand, ſhe was heartily tired of her Sanctuary, which was properly a Priſon, from whence ſhe could not ſtir without being liable to greater miſchiefs. She had an extreme love for her Brothers, as ſhe had plainly ſhewn in the life-time of the King her Husband, and the hopes Richard gave her concerning them, agreeably flattered her. In fine ſhe conſidered, that the plot in favor of the Earl of Richmond having miſcarried by the Duke of Buckingham's death, ſhe could expect for herſelf and Daughters only a ſtill more rigorous fate, if by her denial ſhe ſhould farther incenſe the King. Theſe conſiderations cauſing her to forget the grievous outrages received from that Prince, ſhe was ſo exceſſively blind, as to put her five Daughters into his hands. Moreover, ſhe writ to the Marquis of Dorſet her Brother, to adviſe him to relinquiſh the Earl of Richmond, and throw himſelf into the King's arms. The Marquis as inconſiderate, and no leſs ambitious than the Queen his Siſter, flattering himſelf with the hopes of honors and preferments, privately withdrew from Paris, in order to paſs into England. But the Earl of Richmond cauſed him to be purſued with ſuch diligence, that he was brought back to Paris, and, by ſtrong reaſons, perſuaded to ſtay with the Earl. Hall.

Death of Richard's Queen. Hall. Hiſt. Croyl. Stow. Hollingſh.

As ſoon as Richard had his Nieces in his Power, he thought of means to execute another part of his project: And that was, to be rid of his Queen, in order to marry his Niece. Thoſe Hiſtorians that ſpeak moſt favorably of his conduct, ſay, he made the Queen die with vexation, by ſhewing an averſion for her which ſhe did not deſerve, and by grievouſly mortifying her every day. Others ſpeak plainer, and affirm, he haſtened her death by poiſon. Some add, he privately acquainted the Archbiſhop of York with certain ſecret infirmities of the Queen, which rendered her very diſagreeable to him. This was on purpoſe that the Archbiſhop might tell her again, which he thought would cauſe her to languiſh away, and ſhorten her days. It is ſaid farther, that the Archbiſhop, after hearing the King's diſcourſe, told ſome of his friends the Queen had not long to live. And indeed, ſhe died preſently after. Her fate would have been more worthy of pity, if her death had not been obſerved to be a manifeſt judgment upon her, for marrying the murderer of the Prince of Wales her firſt Husband, Son of Henry VI. Richard ſhewed an extraordinary ſorrow for his loſs, and made a pompous funeral for his deceaſed Queen. But this feigned grief was not capable of undeceiving the people, who openly accuſed him of murdering his Queen (4) as he had done his Nephews. Hall.

The Princeſs Elizabeth refuſes to marry the King her Uncle. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

Notwithſtanding the extreme ſorrow he expreſſed in publick, the Queen was no ſooner in her grave, but he had the aſſurance to make his addreſſes to the Princeſs Elizabeth, and offer her marriage. But ſhe ſo anſwered him, as ſhewed her abhorrence of ſuch an union, and deſired him never to mention it more (5). Richard being ſenſible it was no proper ſeaſon to uſe violence, was ſatisfied for the preſent with this firſt ſtep, till time ſhould furniſh him with a more favorable opportunity to preſs the execution of his project. Mean while, as he daily became more odious, many Lords and Gentlemen went over and offered their ſervice to the Earl of Richmond. Others took the ſame courſe, to avoid the perſecutions of that bloody Prince, if unhappily he came to ſuſpect them. Thoſe that remained in the Kingdom were no better affected, and waited only a favorable opportunity to declare againſt him.

Richard hearing that the Earl of Oxford and the Governor of Hammes were gone to the Earl of Richmond, ſent orders to the Governor of Calais to beſiege that Caſtle, and reduce it to his obedience. This order was ſo readily executed, that the Earl of Oxford, who was marching to relieve the place, arrived not in the neighbourhood, till after the capitulation (1). However he reaped this advantage by it, that he brought away the Garriſon for the Earl of Richmond.

After the Earl of Richmond's attempt, Richard had fitted out a Squadron of Ships to oppoſe his Paſſage in caſe he endeavoured to make another deſcent. But the beginning of the year 1485, the Truce with Bretagne being prolonged for ſeven years, and France ſhowing no great willingneſs to aſſiſt his enemy, he believed he might ſave the charge of a Fleet, which he now conſidered as uſeleſs. Accordingly the Ships were unrigged and laid up in the Spring.

The Court of France reſolves to aid the Earl of Richmond. Commin. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

This proceeding encouraging the Earl of Richmond, he earneſtly ſollicited the Court of France for aid. King Charles's Miniſters at length ſeriouſly conſidering his requeſt, believed it could not but be advantagious to France, to cheriſh the troubles in England. It was ſolely with this view that they promiſed the Earl an aid of two thouſand Men, with Ships to tranſport them, and gave him a Sum of money. Philip de Commines ſays, he never ſaw ſuch wretched Troops as thoſe deſigned for this expedition. Which is a clear evidence with what intent the Court of France granted the Earl this inconſiderable Supply. Beſides, he was required to leave Hoſtages in France, that ſatisfaction ſhould be made for what was expended by the Court. The Earl having reaſon to miſtruſt the Marquiſs of Dorſet, embraced this opportunity to leave him in Hoſtage at Paris, with Sir Thomas (2) Bourchier. Then he repaired to Roan, where the Troops that were lent him were ordered to aſſemble.

The Earl goes to Roan. Hall.

When he came to Roan, he received the diſagreeable news of the Queen's death, and of Richard's deſign to marry the Princeſs Elizabeth his Niece, and to give Cecily her younger Siſter to one of his Favorites. His meaſures being broken by this marriage, which was repreſented to him as ready to be accompliſhed, he conſulted upon this occaſion with the Lords that attended him. The reſult of their opinions was, that ſince he could have no hopes of eſpouſing one of Edward the Fourth's marriageable Daughters, he ought to think of ſome other. For that purpoſe, he was adviſed to gain to his intereſt Sir Walter Herbert, a Perſon of great power in Wales, by an offer of marrying his younger Siſter, the eldeſt being already married to the Earl of Northumberland. The reſolution being taken, he diſpatched an expreſs to Sir Walter Herbert (3) to make the propoſal. Happily for the Earl, the Meſſenger found the roads ſo narrowly watched, that he durſt not venture to purſue his Journey to Herbert. It is extremely probable, if this Affair had ſucceeded according to the Earl of Richmond's deſire, he would have been forſaken by all the friends of Edward the Fourth's family, who were very numerous. For, they had ingaged in his party, only out of hopes of his uniting the two Houſes of York and Lancaſter by his Marriage with the Princeſs Elizabeth.

He deſigns to marry Sir Walter Herbert's Daughter. Hall. Hollingſh.

His Meaſures are broken.

He is invited into England. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

Not many days after, he received Letters from England (4), acquainting him, that if he would make haſte and land in Wales, he could not have a more favorable opportunity. That all the Nobility of the Country were for him (5). That he would find the people ready to take arms in his favour, and a good ſum of money, which had been privately gathered (6) to ſupply his occaſions. That in the reſt of the Kingdom every one was diſpleaſed with the King, who daily rendered himſelf more odious. In fine, that the Juncture was the moſt favorable, as it did not appear that Richard imagined him ſo ready to depart, ſince there were no extraordinary preparations in hand.

He lands at Milford-Haven. Hall.

This good news obliged the Earl to haſten his departure, without ſtaying for Sir Walter Herbert's anſwer. So coming to Harfleur, where his Ships waited for him, he embarked his Troops (7), and ſet ſail the laſt day of July. He arrived the ſixth of Auguſt at Milford-Haven (8) in South-Wales, and next day came to Haverford (9), where he was joyfully received by the Inhabitants. 1485.

From this place he ſent an expreſs to the Counteſs his Mother, to inform her of his Arrival, and Deſign to march towards London, deſiring her withal to aſſemble all his friends, that they might join him upon his rout with as many Troops as poſſible. This rout was to be very long, ſince having no Town upon the Severn at his command, he was neceſſarily obliged to croſs almoſt all Wales, to get to Shrewsbury to the head of that river, where he was told he ſhould be received. So making but a ſhort ſtay at Haverford, he began his march to North-Wales, in order to reach Shrewsbury before the King was ready to diſpute his paſſage.

The King hears Herbert is ſent to oppoſe the Earl's March. Hall. Stow.

Richard hearing the Earl of Richmond was landed at Milford-Haven with ſo few Troops, did not imagine he would be able to make any great progreſs. However he ſent orders to Sir Walter Herbert, to raiſe the Militia of the County, thinking that Herbert might eaſily ſtop him till he was himſelf ready to march. But Herbert having been privately gained by the Earl's friends, ſuffered him to paſs unmoleſted, without offering to make the leaſt oppoſition.

The Earl joined by Sir Rice ap Thomas. Hall. Hollingſh.

Some days after, Sir Rice ap Thomas, a Man of great power in Wales, met the Earl upon his rout, and offered his ſervice, which was gladly accepted (10). He had with him a good body of Welſhmen. It is not ſurpriſing that all Wales ſhould declare for the Earl, ſince he was of Welſh extraction, and of one of the antienteſt families of the Country.

He is joined at Shrewsbury.

The Earl of Richmond's Army being greatly encreaſed by the junction of Sir Ralph ap Thomas, and ſeveral Welſh Gentlemen (11), and the whole Country ſupplying him in his march with all neceſſaries, he arrived in a few days at Shrewsbury, where he was received without oppoſition (12).

The Earl of Stanley and his Brother raiſe Forces for the King. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

The King had very juſtly ſuſpected the Lord Stanley of being a ſecret friend to his Son-in law. Stanley had indeed aſſured the Earl of Richmond, he would favour him to the utmoſt of his power. But as he was forced to leave his Son in Hoſtage with the King, he could not openly eſpouſe his cauſe without endangering his Son's life. For this reaſon he pretended to take the King's part, and having levied about five thouſand Men, poſted himſelf at Lichfield, as if he intended to oppoſe the Earl of Richmond's march. On the other hand, Sir William Stanley (13) his Brother drew together likewiſe a body of two thouſand Men, inſinuating that it was with the ſame view.

The King determined to fight Richmond. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

The King was then at Nottingham, where, at the firſt news of his enemies landing he had given orders to aſſemble his forces (14). He at firſt conſidered the Earl of Richmond's attempt as a ſort of Bravado, which he hoped to make him quickly repent. But when he heard that Sir Walter Herbert had ſuffered him to paſs without oppoſition, that Sir Rice ap Thomas had joined him, that all Wales had taken his part, and that he was marching to Shrewsbury, he perceived, the Affair was going to become more important. So, without heſitation, he reſolved to give him battle before he had made greater progreſs, and his Army was reinforced. He wiſely judged, if on this occaſion, he ſhowed the leaſt faint-heartedneſs, it would certainly cauſe the whole Kingdom to declare againſt him. On the contrary, his firmneſs was capable of keeping in awe ſuch as were inclined to ſide with his enemy. Mean while he had every day the mortification to hear his Officers and Soldiers deſerted to the Earl. He was ſtill in hopes, the Lord Stanley and his Brother would join him with their Troops, though the little correſpondence they kept with him, gave him but too much cauſe to ſuſpect them of treachery. Be this as it will, having received certain advice, that the Earl of Richmond intended to march towards London, he reſolved to expect him upon his rout between Leiceſter and Coventry, in order to put a ſpeedy end to their quarrel by a Battle.

1485. fail him in his neceſſity. With theſe hopes, he advanced to Lichfield, from whence, upon his approach, the Lord Stanley retired to Atherſton. Whilſt his Army was upon the march, he came privately to Stafford, where he had a conference with Sir William Stanley, in which were concerted the meaſures, the effects whereof will preſently be ſeen.

A dangerous Adventure happens to the Earl in his March. Hall. Hollingſh.

The Earl being come to Lichfield, heard that the King was at Leiceſter. So, perceiving he could not poſſibly proceed to London without fighting, he reſolved to march directly to his enemy (1). Whilſt he was on the road to Tamworth, he happened to be behind his Company, and attentively muſing upon his Affairs, miſtook his way, and loſt the track of his Army. He roved about till night, not daring to inquire the way to Tamworth for fear of addreſſing to ſome one of Richard's party. At laſt, not being able to find the road, he was forced to paſs the night at a Village, without knowing where he was, or daring to inquire. However, next morning he found means to get to Tamworth, where his Army was in great pain for him, not knowing what was become of him. To excuſe ſuch a blunder which, had it been known, muſt have done him great injury, he pretended he had been to confer with ſome private friends who did not care to appear openly. That very day, he went with few Attendants to Atherſton, where he had a long conference with the Lord Stanley (2). On the morrow hearing that Richard was gone from Leiceſter to meet him, he advanced to ſave him ſome part of the way. The two Armies met at Boſworth, ſo near one another, that there would be no avoiding a Battle, ſuppoſing either of the two Leaders had deſired it. But they were both very far from ſuch a thought. The 22d of Auguſt was the day famous for the Battle which decided the quarrel of the two contending Houſes.

and draw up. Hiſt. Croyl. Hall. Stow. Buck. Pol. Virg.

Richard perceiving his enemy to advance, drew up his Army, conſiſting of between twelve and thirteen thouſand Men. He gave the command of the vanguard to the Duke of Norfolk, and led the main body himſelf, with his Crown on his head, either to be better known, or to put his Troops in mind they were fighting for their King. The Earl of Richmond who had but five thouſand Men, drew up his Army likewiſe in two lines, of which the Earl of Oxford commanded the firſt, and himſelf the ſecond (3). A Hiſtorian has recited the Speeches of the two Leaders to the Soldiers before the fight. But as it is not very certain that they were really ſpoken, and as beſides they contain nothing very particular, I ſhall paſs them over in ſilence.

Conduct of Stanley and his Brother. Hall. Stow. &c.

Whilſt the two armies were preparing for battle, the Lord Stanley, who till then had continued at Atherſton, poſted himſelf with his Troops over againſt the ſpace, between the two armies, and his Brother, who was come from Stafford, took his ſtation on the other ſide, oppoſite to him. Richard had been hitherto in doubt, whether the Lord Stanley was for or againſt him, becauſe he had not yet made any publick demonſtration in favour of the Earl of Richmond. But when he ſaw him in that poſt, it was eaſy to perceive, he was not there to aſſiſt him, ſince he had not given him notice of his deſign. Mean while, willing to know for certain what he had to fear or hope, he ſent him orders to come and join his Army. Stanley anſwered, he would come when it was convenient. This anſwer not ſatisfying the King, he commanded his Son to be immediately put to death. But his Generals repreſented to him, that though the Lord Stanley's behaviour was very doubtful, and even gave cauſe to ſuſpect him, he had not yet however declared for the Earl of Richmond: That it was not improbable, he was meditating ſome great action in favour of his Sovereign, or perhaps intended to ſtand neuter during the fight, in order to join the Conqueror. That in both theſe caſes, it was better to defer examining his Conduct till after the event, than to provoke him by putting his Son to death, to give the Earl of Richmond an aſſiſtance capable of making Victory incline to his ſide: That after all, in the King's preſent Circumſtances, the death of the young Lord Strange, could procure him no advantage. Theſe arguments ſeemed to the King of ſufficient ſtrength to cauſe him to revoke his orders. But he was guilty of an unpardonable error, in remaining doubtful as to the two Brothers, who plainly enough diſcovered their deſign. As his army was ſtill ſuperior to the Forces of the Earl of Richmond and the two Brothers together, he ſhould have oppoſed to theſe laſt, two Bodies equal to theirs, with orders to attack them the moment they offered to ſtir. He would thereby have debarred them of the advantage of taking their time to declare, as they afterwards did. Such an overſight in ſo able a Prince as Richard, cannot be looked upon but as proceeding from a particular direction of the providence of God, who had determined his deſtruction.

The two armies approaching one another, the battle began with a ſhower of Arrows diſcharged from both ſides, after which the Royal Army moved forward to come to cloſe fight. The Lord Stanley, who till then had been only a Spectator, perceiving the Duke of Norfolk widened his line to the left, in order to ſurround the Earl of Richmond's Troops, gave him not time to execute his deſign. On a ſudden, he poſted himſelf on the right of the Earl's, to receive the front of the King's firſt line. This motion cauſing the Duke of Norfolk to halt, in order to re-cloſe his line which was too much extended to the left, the fight ceaſed for ſome moments. But preſently after, both ſides being more upon an equality, by the Lord Stanley's joining the Earl, fought with great ardour.

Hall.

Mean while, Richard being impatient to know what paſſed at the firſt line, ſpurred his Horſe towards the place where they were ingaged. At the ſame time, the Earl of Richmond quitting his ſecond line, where he had taken his Poſt, was advanced as far as the foremoſt ranks of the firſt, to incourage his Troops by his preſence, being ſenſible that the ſucceſs of the day, would in great meaſure be determined by the fight of the two firſt lines. Richard perceiving him, inſtantly rode to attack him. He ſlew Sir William Brandon, the Earl's Standard-bearer, who had interpoſed in his way. Sir John Cheney having taken Brandon's place, to oppoſe the King's furious efforts, was overthrown to the ground. The Earl of Richmond avoided not the Combat. But if we may judge by the manner wherein the Hiſtorians relate theſe particulars, he ſhowed no great eagerneſs to join his enemy, contented himſelf with ſtanding in a poſture of defence; and willingly ſuffered his people to come between them, and hinder them from too cloſely approaching each other.

Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

Sir William Stanley flanks the Troops, who are put to rout. Hall.

At the very time that Richard was ſingling out the Earl of Richmond, to decide at once their important quarrel, it was decided very much to his diſadvantage from another quarter. Sir William Stanley, following the example of the Lord Stanley his Brother, and ſeeing that the left of the Earl of Richmond's firſt line began to give ground, openly declared againſt the King, by falling upon his Troops in the flank, who were employed in fighting their enemy's in the front, and vigorouſly repulſing them. This ſo ſeaſonable an attack at ſo critical a moment, having cauſed an extreme diſorder in the right of the King's firſt line, they were ſeen ſuddenly to retreat towards the main Body, and the left quickly followed their example. This haſty retreat ſtruck ſuch a terror into the main Body, that they almoſt all took to flight, without expecting the enemy. The Earl of Northumberland alone, who commanded one of the wings, ſtood without motion, having firſt ordered his Troops to throw down their arms, to let the enemies ſee they had nothing to fear from him. Richard perceiving the day was loſt, and not being able to think of flying, or running the hazard of falling into the hands of the Earl of Richmond, ruſhed into the midſt of his enemies, where he ſoon met with the death he ſought. Thus fell the Uſurper, in a more glorious manner than his Crimes ſeemed to deſerve. He wore but two years and two months the Crown, he had purchaſed by ſo many ill actions.

Stanley refuſes to obey the King's Orders. The King orders his Son to be put to Death, but is diſſwaded from it. Hall.

Overſight of the King.

The Battle laſted about two hours, including the time ſpent in the purſuit of the run-aways (4). As moſt part of the King's army fled without fighting, there were not ſlain on the ſpot above two thouſand Men (5) on his ſide. The Earl of Richmond loſt but a hundred, of whom Sir William Brandon was the only perſon of note. He was Father to Charles Brandon afterwards Duke of Suffolk. On the King's part, the Duke of Norfolk loſt his Life valiantly fighting for him who had made him a Duke (6).

1485. He would have doubtleſs gained more honour and glory, had he employed his valour for a Prince who had better deſerved than Richard, that a Man ſhould hazard his Life for his ſake. The Earl of Northumberland was taken into favour by the Conqueror, having perhaps held Intelligence with him before the battle. It ſeems at leaſt, that it may be inferred, as well from what he did in the beginning of the rout, as from certain verſes found that very morning by the Duke of Norfolk, on his Tent-door, inti-

The Lord Stanley ſets the Crown on the Earl of Richmond's head. Hill. Stow. Hollingſh. Richard's Body is carried to Leiceſter. Richard's Crown being found by a Soldier, was brought to the Lord Stanley, who went immediately and placed it on the Earl of Richmond's head, congratulating him upon his Victory, and ſaluting him King. From that time Henry kept the regal title, and acted always as Sovereign, as if that bare Ceremony had given him an undoubted right. Richard's body was found among the ſlain ſtark naked, covered with blood and dirt, and in that condition thrown croſs a Horſe, with the head hanging on one ſide and the legs on the other, and ſo carried to Leiceſter (2). The body lay two whole days expoſed to publick view, after which, it was interred without any Ceremony, in one of the Churches of that City. Some time after, Henry VII his Enemy and Succeſſor, ordered a more honorable Monument to be erected for him on account of Elizabeth his Queen, who was of the Houſe of York (3).

The Character of Richard III. Richard III was ſirnamed Crook-back'd, becauſe he was ſo in reality. Moreover, one of his arms was almoſt withered, receiving but little or no nouriſhment. As to the defects of his mind, if we believe moſt Hiſtorians, they were ſo great and ſo numerous, that it would be difficult to find in Hiſtory a Prince of ſo ill a Character. It is certain, he had a boundleſs ambition, which often cauſed him to commit actions unbecoming a Chriſtian Prince. To this Paſſion alone muſt be aſcribed his treachery and cruelty, ſince he was treacherous and cruel only with reſpect to the acquiſition or preſervation of the Crown. He has not been the ſole Prince whom ambition has led into the like exceſſes. The Hiſtorians who writ in the reign of Henry VII and Henry VIII, have ſo aggravated the heinouſneſs of his actions, that one cannot help obſerving in their writings, a ſtrong deſire to pleaſe the Monarchs then on the Throne. Nay, very probably they have aſcribed to him ſome actions upon no very good foundation; for inſtance, his murdering with his own hand Henry VI, and the Prince of Wales. Their deſire to ſay a great deal of ill of this Prince, made them overlook his good qualities, which ought not to have been paſſed over in ſilence. Be this as it will, without pretending either to juſtify him upon what he did of ill, or condemn him generally upon all, as ſome have done. I ſhall content my ſelf with blaming what was blame-worthy, and acknowledging withal what deſerved condemnation. The Crimes he was guilty of in procuring or keeping the Crown, are, as I ſaid, effects and conſequences of his immoderate ambition, by which he ſuffered himſelf to be blinded. But their being produced by that Paſſion, does not in the leaſt leſſen their heinouſneſs. As to the reſt, 1485. he had a great deal of ſenſe, and a very ſolid Judgment, Qualities that might have been an honour to him, had they been uſed to better purpoſes. We may judge of his good ſenſe and penetration, by his precautions to ſecure himſelf from the aſſaults of his enemies. Theſe precautions could not be more juſt, if divine Providence had not been pleaſed to render them fruitleſs, as it ſometimes does with reſpect to ſeemingly the beſt concerted deſigns. On ſeveral occaſions he ſhewed an uncommon Valour, and particularly in the battle where he was ſlain. This cannot be denied him without injuſtice. He expreſſed great concern that Juſtice ſhould be impartially miniſtred to all his Subjects without diſtinction, provided the preſervation of his Crown was not concerned; for in that reſpect he made no ſcruple to trample upon all the rules of Right and Equity. This natural Inclination for Juſtice, but combated by his ambition, may afford ſome occaſion to preſume, he would perhaps have proved a good King, had he been able to fix himſelf ſo firmly in the Throne as to have feared no revolution (4). At leaſt, this cannot be ſaid to be improbable. The Emperor Auguſtus, who was guilty of ſo many Cruelties to arrive at the Empire, affords a memorable and well-known Inſtance of ſuch a Change, and it would not be impoſſible to find other examples. But as Richard was taken out of the World before he had given ſigns of any amendment, his ill actions abſorb'd whatever there might be commendable in him. There is one Hiſtorian however who has endeavoured to Buck. vindicate this Prince. But as he has ſet no bounds to this Vindication, and laboured to make him entirely innocent, he has not acquired much credit, eſpecially as he was often obliged, in order to attain his ends, to advance facts not ſtrictly true. He has however a place in the Collection of the Engliſh Hiſtorians; but no modern Author has thought fit to take him for guide (5).

End of the Reign of the Plantagenets. Act. Pub. XII. p. 265. Richard left but one natural Son, who was yet a Minor when the King his Father died. Some months before, he had made him Governour of Calais, Guiſnes, and of all the Marches of Picardy, belonging to the Crown of England (6). With Richard III, ended the Angevin Kings, ſirnamed Plantagenets (7); who, ſince Henry II, the firſt of this race, had poſſeſſed the Crown of England from Father to Son, during the ſpace of three hundred and thirty years. Richard was the laſt King of this Houſe; but not the laſt Male, as ſome have affirmed, ſince the Earl of Warwick his Nephew, Son of the Duke of Clarence his Brother, was ſtill alive. This young Prince was the ſole branch of the Male-iſſue of Edward III, which had been ſo numerous; but was almoſt entirely deſtroyed by the late Civil War. This and of the Civil War. War, commenced thirty years before, was at length ended by the Battle of Boſworth, after deſtroying above one hundred thouſand Engliſh-men, and a great number of Princes of the two contending Houſes. Philip de Commines mounts the number to fourſcore; but it is a miſtake or exaggeration of that author, as it is eaſy to ſee by the Genealogical Table of the poſterity of Edward III.

Brief Recapitulation of the Hiſtory of the Plantagenets. Let us cloſe the Hiſtory of the Plantagenets with a brief recapitulation of the moſt memorable accidents that befel the Kings of this race, whilſt on the Throne of England. In this ſummary of the fourteen foregoing reigns, it will be ſeen, not without aſtoniſhment perhaps, that the happineſs and glory enjoyed by this race for above three hundred years, were almoſt nothing in compariſon of their misfortunes (8).

(1) The Verſes ſaid to be written upon the Tent-Door were theſe:

Jack of Norfolk, be not too bold,
For Dickon thy Maſter is bought and ſold.

John Howard Duke of Norfolk, Son of Sir Robert Howard, as is ſaid above, p. 637. Note (3) left behind him Thomas Earl of Surrey, and five Daughters.

(2) He was brought in that manner to Leiceſter, behind a Purſuivant at Arms, called blaunche Sanglier. Hall, fol. 58. Stow, p. 470.

(3) He was buried in St. Mary's, belonging to a Monaſtery of the Grey-Friers. Henry VII put over him a Tomb of various coloured Marble adorned with his Statue in Alabaſter. This Monument ſtood till the diſſolution of the Abbies under Henry VIII, when it was pulled down and utterly defaced; ſince which his Grave being over-grown with Weeds and Nettles, is become very obſcure and not to be found; only the Stone-Coffin, wherein his Corps lay, was made a drinking Trough for Horſes, at the White-Horſe-Inn in Leiceſter. ---- Richard was not above three or four and thirty years old when he was killed. He gave five hundred Marks a year to Queen's College in Cambridge. Sandford, p. 434.

(4) His Enemies ſeem to own, that excepting his Cruelties to gain and keep the Crown, one might judge him to be a good King: Particularly in his care to check Vice, and promote Sobriety and Virtue; witneſs his Circular Letters to the Biſhops, and in his concern for the good Government and Eaſe of his Subjects, as may be ſeen in his Proclamation againſt the Rebels in Kent. See Compl. Hiſt. Vol. I. p. 576. My Lord Verulam ſays of him, that he was in military Virtue approved, jealous of the Honour of the Engliſh Nation, and likewiſe a good Law-Maker. He founded the Society of Heralds, and made them a Corporation, &c. See the Charter in Rymer's Fœd. Tom. 12. p. 215.

(5) George Buck, Eſq; has endeavoured to repreſent King Richard III as a Prince of much better Shapes (both of Body and Mind) than he had been generally eſteemed. His Work, conſiſting of five Books, is inſerted in the Collection of the Engliſh Hiſtorians.

(6) In his Patent he is called John of Gloceſter. See Rymer's Fœd. Tom. 12. p. 265.

(7) I. e. a Broom-Stalk; the reaſon of this Sirname Antiquaries are at a loſs to find out, and give no better than this: Fulk, the firſt Earl of Anjou of that name, being ſtung with remorſe for ſome wicked Actions of his, in order to attone for them, went in Pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, and before the Holy Sepulchre was ſoundly ſcourged with Broom Twigs, which grow in great plenty there. From whence he ever after took the Sirname of Plantagenet, or Broom-Stalk, which was continued by his noble Poſterity. Buck, l. 1.

(8) It were to be wiſhed, that ſo good a Hiſtorian as Rapin had been more ſparing of God's Judgments; ſuch Remarks at beſt being a ſign of, great Weakneſs. But when they are built on Falſities in Fact, as is ſometimes the Caſe, they are inexcuſable. Of this we have an Inſtance even in Rapin himſelf. See above, p. 615. Note (11). As for the long Liſt he has given of God's Judgments upon the Houſe of Plantagenet, it contains nothing extraordinary, nothing but what is very common in this World, and what might eaſily be matched out of the Hiſtories of ſeveral other Nations.

HENRY

HENRY II, the firſt King of this Houſe, was the greateſt of all the Engliſh Monarchs with reſpect to extent of Dominion. Beſides the Kingdom of England, he poſſeſſed in France, Guienne, Poictou, Saintonge, Auvergne, Limouſin, Perigord, Angoumois, Touraine, Anjou, Maine, Normandy, to which he joined alſo Bretagne by the marriage of one of his Sons with the Heireſs of that Duchy; and laſtly, crowned all with the Conqueſt of Ireland. But with all this grandeur he was ever unhappy. His conteſt with Becket, the vexatious perſecutions from Pope Alexander III, the rebellion of his Queen and Sons, and the unfortunate ſucceſs of his laſt War with France, ſuffered him not to enjoy a moment's repoſe.

RICHARD I, rendered his name famous in the Eaſt, by the conqueſt of the Iſle of Cyprus, by the taking of Acra, and by a great victory over the Saracens. But the fame he acquired in that expedition was a dear purchaſe to Chriſtendom, and particularly to England, by the prodigious quantity of Men and money, exported from thence, without the Chriſtians of Paleſtine reaping any great advantages. Richard himſelf at his return into Europe, underwent the rigours of a grievous and long impriſonment, from which he could not be freed without an exorbitant ranſom which quite drained his Kingdom. In ſhort, after a ſeveral years ſtruggle with Philip Auguſtus to very little purpoſe, he unfortunately periſhed by an Arrow at the Siege of Chaluz, undertaken from his greedy deſire of money.

JOHN Lack-land enjoyed not a moment's happineſs during his whole reign. Perſecuted by the King of France, then by Pope Innocent III, and laſtly, by his own ſubjects, his reign was nothing but a continual train of misfortunes. He loſt firſt all the Provinces poſſeſſed by his Anceſtors in France. After which, Innocent III, deprived him of his Crown, and reſtored it to him upon ſhameful and diſhonourable terms. In fine, he had the great mortification to ſee his Barons in arms againſt him, and to die at a time when all England was paying Allegiance to a foreign Prince.

HENRY III, a Prince of a very mean Spirit, lived in a continual ſtate of ſubjection, though ſeated on a Throne; one while a ſlave to his favorites and miniſters, another while to the imperious will of the Popes. At length, ſtript of all his authority by his own ſubjects, he remained ſome time captive to his greateſt enemies. And he was entirely indebted to a victory fortunately gained by the Prince his Son, for his reſtoration, and the tranquillity he enjoyed the two laſt years of his life.

EDWARD I, rendered his name famous by the conqueſt of Scotland. But after ſhedding torrents of Blood in that unjuſt quarrel, he had the mortification to loſe that acquiſition, and to die before he had recovered it. His conqueſt of Wales was the moſt real advantage procured for the Kingdom by any King of England.

The reign of EDWARD II, is remarkable only for that Prince's ill-conduct and misfortunes. He is the firſt inſtance of a King of England depoſed by authority of Parliament. Happy, if the fury of his enemies had ſtopped there! but, with an unparalleled barbarity, he was made to ſuffer the moſt cruel death that could poſſibly be deviſed, and which bore no proportion to the indiſcretions he was guilty of.

EDWARD III, was one of the moſt illuſtrious Kings of England, as well for his perſonal qualities as for his victories in France, and the famous Treaty of Bretigny, which reſtored to him with intereſt the Provinces, John Lack-land had ſuffered to be loſt. But his reign, though glorious, was not free from misfortunes. His minority was ſullied by the tragical death of Edward II his Father, and of the Earl of Kent his Uncle. To puniſh theſe horrid outrages, he was forced to keep his own Mother in Priſon as long as ſhe lived. Towards the end of his days he had the mortification to ſee himſelf ſtript of all he had re-conquered upon France, without hopes of recovery. In a word, he ruined, as I may ſay, his own reputation, and died at a time when his ſubjects began to loſe their former eſteem for him.

Thus far it is eaſy to ſee that the race of the Plantagenets had enjoyed no great ſhare of happineſs. But their misfortunes, which were blended with ſome proſperities, were very inconſiderable in compariſon of what that race afterwards underwent. When a Man takes a view of what happened to the poſterity of Edward III, he ſees nothing but Diſaſters, tragical or untimely Deaths, Hatred, Animoſity, Revenge, Civil Wars, Cruelties unheard of, among Princes ſprung from the ſame Stock. England had never ſeen ſo terrible a deſtruction of her inhabitants, nor had the Scaffold been ever dyed with ſo much noble and royal Blood as during the hundred years between the death of Edward III, and that of Richard III. Let us briefly run over the ſeveral branches of Edward the third's family, in order to ſee their calamities.

EDWARD the Black Prince, one of the moſt accompliſhed Princes that ever was born, died in the forty-ſixth year of his age, having firſt buried his eldeſt Son Edward but ſeven years old.

RICHARD II, his other Son, who mounted the Throne after his Grandfather, was depoſed, impriſoned, and barbarouſly murdered.

LIONEL Duke of Clarence, third Son of Edward III, died in a foreign Country in the flower of his age. He left but one Daughter, whoſe marriage into the Houſe of March was the occaſion of all the calamities England was afflicted with for thirty years together.

The Poſterity of John of Gaunt, Edward's fourth Son, were far from being happy. HENRY IV, Succeſſor of Richard II, paſſed his whole reign under continual apprehenſions of loſing a Crown acquired by extraordinary methods, and preſerved by the violent death of Richard II, whom he cauſed to be murdered in Priſon.

HENRY V, one of the moſt illuſtrious Kings of England, after ſo great a progreſs in France as to be declared Regent and Heir of that Kingdom, enjoyed that conſiderable advantage but two years, or rather, had only a foretaſte of what he had ſo eagerly deſired. He died in the flower of his age, leaving a Son nine months old, who afterwards proved very unfit to compleat the work, his illuſtrious Father had ſo glorioufly begun.

The Dukes of Clarence, Bedford and Gloceſter, died all three without Iſſue. Gloceſter was long expoſed to the fury of his enemies, and at laſt ſacrificed to their vengeance.

HENRY VI, Son of Henry V, loſt all that the King his Father had acquired in France. After which, he was ſtript of his Royalty, impriſoned, reſtored for a ſhort ſpace, and at laſt murdered by a Prince ſprung from the ſame ſtock with himſelf.

EDWARD his Son, Prince of Wales, died after the ſame manner, and by the ſame hand.

In ſurveying the other branch of the Houſe of Lancaſter, namely, that of Beaufort-Somerſet, hardly ſhall we find a Prince but what loſt his life in a Battle, or on the Scaffold.

The Houſe of York, of whom Edmund de Langley, fifth Son of Edward III, was head, was ſtill leſs favoured. Some unfortunate Stars ſeemed to be continually ſhedding their malignant influences upon that Family. Excepting Edmund de Langley himſelf, firſt Duke of York, all the Princes his deſcendents died a violent or untimely death.

EDWARD Duke of York, his eldeſt Son, was ſlain at the Battle of Azincourt.

RICHARD Earl of Cambridge loſt his head on a Scaffold.

RICHARD, third Duke of York, and his Son EDMUND Earl of Rutland, periſhed in the Battle of Wakefield.

GEORGE Duke of Clarence was afterwards condemned to die in a Butt of Malmſey.

EDWARD IV, after enjoying the Crown of England ſome years, to which he had a better title than the Houſe of Lancaſter, died indeed a natural death, but in the two and fortieth year of his age.

EDWARD V, and RICHARD his Brother, were ſmothered in their Bed.

EDWARD Prince of Wales, Son of Richard III, was taken out of the World in the eleventh year of his age.

RICHARD III, was killed at the Battle of Boſworth.

In fine, we ſhall ſee in the courſe of the Hiſtory, EDWARD Earl of Warwick, Son of the unfortunate Duke of Clarence, and the only ſurviving Male of the Houſe of York, end his days by the hand of the Executioner.

Nothing more remains to complete the account of the diſaſters that happened to the Poſterity of Edward III, but to take notice that THOMAS of Woodſtock, Earl of Gloceſter, ſeventh Son of that Monarch, died a violent death in Priſon at Calais.

Were not all theſe misfortunes which fell on Edward the third's Poſterity the effects of the divine vengeance extended to the fourth generation, for the barbarous murder committed on the perſon of Edward II? At leaſt, it is difficult not to ſee in theſe events the tragical death of Edward II, revenged upon Richard II: That of Richard upon Henry VI: That of Henry upon Edward V: and That of Edward upon Richard III. THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK XIV.

The Reigns of HENRY VII; with the STATE of the CHURCH, from the beginning of the Reign of HENRY IV. 1399, to the end of the Reign of HENRY VII. 1509.

19. HENRY VII.

1485. HENRY VII. proclaimed King by his Army. Bacon.

THE battle of Bosworth being ended, as was said, by the flight of the Royal Army, and death of King Richard, Henry caused Te Deum to be sung upon the place, all the Troops falling on their knees to return God thanks for his Victory. Presently after, the whole army, as it were by Inspiration, made the air resound with the Cry of, Long live King Henry! which was not disagreeable to him. For, it was a sort of military Election, which might have served him for foundation to pretend to the Crown, though he had no other title. Mean while, he was embarrassed by the uncertainty he was under, whether he should keep to this Election, or found his title upon a more solid foundation. He was however, to determine without delay, either to reject the title given him by his Army, till the Parliament should confirm it, or accept it, and assert his Right independently of the consent of the Estates.

He is in suspence about taking the Title of King. Bacon.

He had three titles, or foundations, whereon he could ground his Right. The first was, his descent from the House of Lancaster, by Margaret his Mother Daughter of a Duke of Somerset. The House of Lancaster had been possessed of the Crown above sixty years, and this possession had been confirmed by many Acts of Parliament. But on the other hand, several Parliaments had afterwards condemned this possession as a continual Usurpation, and adjudged the Crown to the House of York, as descending from Lionel, third Son of Edward III. This question, considered originally, and independently of the Circumstances which moved the Parliaments to come to such opposite determinations, could not have been decided in favour of the House of Lancaster, if the Laws and Customs of the Realm had been followed. But, if setting aside the usual practice, it should be considered with respect to the Acts of Parliament, it could not but be doubtful, since the Pro and Con were equally supported by the same authority. It might also be objected to Henry, that indeed sundry Parliaments had decided the point in favour of the same value and denomination with the Money of the fifth of Edward IV. Dr. Nicolson describes one of his Groats, as inscribed with Characters of the like Shape with those of Henry VI, and Edward IV, weighing about two penny Weights three Grains, which was the exact Standard of Richard III's Groats. Others in the possession of the late Archbishop of York and Mr. Thoresby, in which the Face side wants the outer Circle, the Letters of the Inscription which reach to the extremity of the Coin being generally imperfect, so that there was reason for the Provision made by Act of Parliament in the next Reign, that the new Money should have a Circle about the outermost Parts. That Coin which Speed gives of Richard II, is thought rather to belong to this King, by the word AGLIÆ instead of ANGLIÆ, in whose Reign that way of writing was used. The Author of Num. Brit. Hist. has two pieces of this King inscribed, RICHARDUS. REX. ANGLI. Reverse, CIVITAS EBORACI. Another, RICARDUS. REX. ANGL. Reverse, CIVITAS. LONDON. The shortness of this King's Reign makes his Coin so very rare, that Thoresby observes, he had seen a Series of ancient Monies from Edward the Confessor to the present times, Richard III excepted, which he had not chanced to light upon. Speed's case was the same, so that he was forced to leave a Blank for this King's Money.

1485. of the Houſe of Lancaſter, but it did not follow that the Houſe of Somerſet could receive any advantage from that deciſion. The Somerſets were indeed deſcended from the Houſe of Lancaſter, but by a Baſtard-branch, which could pretend to the Crown only by virtue of their legitimation. Now it was a queſtion yet undecided, whether the Act of Legitimation, and Richard the Second's ſubſequent Letters Patents, gave to that Branch, derived from a Baſtard born in Adultery, the right to ſucceed to the Crown, though mentioned neither in the Act of Parliament, nor in King Richard's Letters. Beſides, even upon ſuppoſition of this Right, another query ſtill aroſe, namely, whether the Poſterity of this legitimated Baſtard, were to have the preference of the deſcendents of the Daughters born in wedlock, of whom there were ſeveral in Caſtile, Portugal, and Germany. To leave theſe points to the examination of the Parliament, ſeemed therefore too dangerous for Henry. But on the other hand, he was not ignorant that in the deciſion of the differences between the houſes of Lancaſter and York, the Parliaments had not ſo much regarded the arguments of either Party, as the circumſtances of time and things. Now he could never have a more favorable juncture than the preſent, ſince he had juſt delivered England from a Tyrant univerſally hated. Henry IV, his Predeceſſor, had not done more for the Engliſh, when forr eward, the Crown was adjudged to him, in prejudice of the Houſe of March.

Henry's ſecond title was, his intended Marriage with Elizabeth, eldeſt Daughter of Edward IV, which he had ſworn. But here, no leſs difficulties occurred. If he relied upon this Title, he was to reſolve either to reign only in right of his Wife, or to confound together the Titles of both Houſes. In the former caſe, he would have relinquiſhed his own, to leave to the Houſe of York a Title which had all along been conteſted, and have owned that Houſe's Right, for the ſole foundation of his mounting the Throne. Beſides, he conſidered, that in caſe Elizabeth happened to die without Iſſue, all her Rights would of courſe devolve to her next Siſter, and he thereby be excluded from the Throne upon the death of his Queen (1): That ſuppoſing he could get the Parliament to adjudge him the Crown during Life, he ſhould only have a perſonal right, which would not deſcend to his Children by a ſecond Wife.

In the latter caſe, on ſuppoſition of the confuſion of the Titles of both Houſes, by means of the projected Marriage, purſuant to the Intention of thoſe who had invited him into England, this confuſion, indeed, might be advantagious to the Children born of this Marriage. But if unhappily there ſhould be none, and his death fall out before Elizabeth's, he would leave the poſſeſſion of the Crown to the Houſe of York, which his averſion for that Houſe would not ſuffer him to behold, even at a diſtance, without extreme concern. But if, on the contrary, Elizabeth ſhould die before him, he foreſaw it would prove the occaſion of renewing the troubles of the Kingdom, ſince, as ſhe reigned in her own right, her Siſter, or neareſt Relations, might pretend to ſucceed her.

Henry's third Title was, That of the Sword or Conqueſt, which his late Victory ſeemed to give him. But he conſidered this Victory was entirely owing to the aſſiſtance of the People of England, and therefore gave him at moſt but a right of Conqueſt over the vanquiſhed Party. Beſides, as he could ſupport himſelf only by the ſame aſſiſtance, he had reaſon to fear, that in reſting upon this pretended Title, he ſhould loſe his beſt friends, ſince ſuch a proceeding might be conſtrued as a ſettled deſign to rule with arbitrary power. He knew William the Conqueror had wiſely avoided that rock, by rejecting the title of the Sword, till he ſaw himſelf firmly eſtabliſhed in the Throne.

Theſe were difficulties conſiderable enough to merit Henry's mature deliberation before he reſolved. But on the other hand, there was no medium to take. He was neceſſarily either to accept the Title given him by the army, and thereby engage to proſecute his Rights independently of the Parliament's approbation, or by rejecting it, ſhew, he miſtruſted his own right, and be expoſed to a troubleſome examination. After weighing the reaſons on both ſides, as far as the time would permit, he reſolved at laſt to reſt upon the Title of the Houſe of Lancaſter. So taking for granted, that the army in ſaluting him King, had only given him his due, he determined to aſſert the Lancaſtrian claim, without any mixture of that of York, and without ſubmitting it even to the examination of the Parliament (2). To that end, he reſolved to be crowned before he ſummoned the Parliament, and to defer his Marriage till he had obtained an Act to adjudge him the Crown as his own by Inheritance. He determined therefore to aſſume the title of King, and to iſſue out orders as ſuch, ſuppoſing that the Crown was fallen to him of full Right, though Margaret his Mother was ſtill alive, and ought to precede him. Notwithſtanding all the reaſons which rendered his title dubious, he believed there were likewiſe reaſons ſufficient to give him room to ſupport it, eſpecially at a time when his Victory was capable of deciding all the queſtions in his favour. This reſolution was the fountain of all the troubles of his reign.

Mean while, though he affected to be convinced of the goodneſs of his Title, he diſtruſted it in his own Mind, knowing, if it came to be conteſted, the reaſons whereon he ſhould ground it, were of no great weight, unleſs ſupported by force of arms. In this ſtate he continued almoſt during his whole Life. Always unconcerned in appearance, and yet terrifying himſelf with the leaſt thing, and dreading that every little accident would be of dangerous conſequence. The Houſe of York was a perpetual terror to him. He knew that they who had called him into England, were not enemies to that Houſe, but only to the perſon of Richard III. So the Rights of the two Houſes remaining ſtill doubtful, as having been decided only by the Sword, he was very ſenſible that his could be maintained but by the ſame way, or by wiſe precautions, to prevent all future deciſions of that kind.

He is afraid of the Houſe of York.

Upon theſe conſiderations it was, that the next day after the Battle (3) he ſent a detachment of Horſe under the command of Sir Robert Willoughby to the Caſtle of Sheriff-Hutton (4), to take from thence the Earl of Warwick, and conduct him to the Tower of London. This young Prince was Son and Heir to George Duke of Clarence, who was ſtifled in a Butt of Malmſey. After the death of the Duke his Father, Edward IV his Uncle cauſed him to be carefully educated, and created him Earl of Warwick; a title enjoyed by his Mother's Father (5). He was unwilling to make him Duke of Clarence, leſt that title ſhould preſerve the memory of an unhappy Brother, whom he had ſacrificed to his jealouſy. When Richard was on the Throne, he ordered this young Prince his Nephew to be confined in the Caſtle above-named, knowing how likely he was one day to diſturb him in the poſſeſſion of the Crown. After the Uſurper's death, the Earl of Warwick ſeemed to have room to expect ſome favor from his ſucceſſor; but it proved juſt the contrary. So far was Henry from releaſing, that he made him cloſe Priſoner in the Tower, a rigour proceeding only from his jealouſy and inward conviction that his title was not ſo undoubted as he affected to believe. But this was not all. It will hereafter be ſeen, that he put this unhappy Prince to death by the hand of the executioner, therein ſtill more tyrant than the tyrant himſelf, from whom he boaſted to have delivered the Kingdom.

He ſends the Earl of Warwick to the Tower. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh. Bacon.

The Princeſs Elizabeth, whom Henry was to marry, was kept in the ſame Caſtle by the late King's order, who did not think fit to leave her at liberty to chooſe a Husband, intending to marry her himſelf. Henry reſolving to repair to London with all poſſible diligence, thought it not proper to leave the Princeſs at ſo great a diſtance, leſt ſhe ſhould be told that ſhe had no need to mix her rights with thoſe of others. Wherefore ſhe was deſired to come and remain with the Queen her Mother at London. His deſign was to make it believed, he intended to eſpouſe her very ſoon, tho' he was determined to defer his marriage till after the Seſſion of the Parliament.

The Princeſs Elizabeth comes to London. Hall. Bacon. Hollingſh.

A few days after, Henry ſet forward, by eaſy journies, to London, taking care to avoid all appearance of uſing the right of conqueſt. He was received in all places with loud acclamations, the people conſidering him as their deliverer, and as going by his marriage, to put an end to all the Calamities occaſioned by the Civil Wars. He made his entry into London with great ſtate (6). However, the People had not the ſatisfaction to ſee him as he paſſed through the City, becauſe he was carried all the way in a cloſe Chariot till he came to St. Paul's. His Hiſtorian aſcribes this conduct to a motive of grandeur and ſecurity, as if having been proſcribed in the reign of Richard III, he diſdained to fawn upon the people, leſt they ſhould think he expected all from them. But I do not know whether this is better grounded than what the Henry is well received at London. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh. Bacon.

He reſolves to take the Title of King, Bacon.

(1) The caſe would be the ſame, ſuppoſing the Queen left Iſſue, for the Crown would upon her death fall to her eldeſt Son or Daughter.

(2) Or, as the Lord Bacon expreſſes it, he reſolved to reſt upon the Title of Lancaſter as the main, and to uſe the other Two, that of Marriage, and that of Battle, but as Supporters, p. 579.

(3) Before his departure from Leiceſter. Hall, fol. 1. Stow, p. 470.

(5) Richard Nevill.

(6) On a Saturday the 27th of Auguſt; and as he had alſo obtained the Victory upon a Saturday, he counted out of fancy, and choſe afterwards that day as a day proſperous to him. The Mayor and Companies of London went out to meet him at Shoreditch. Bacon, p. 579.

1485. ſame Hiſtorian adds, that Henry cauſed Richard's Standards taken at Boſworth (1), to be brought into St. Paul's Church, that the people of London might not forget that he had juſt gained a Battle, and was entering the City as a Conqueror. When a Prince has acquired a reputation for politicks, ſomething myſterious, ſuitable to the notion formed of him, is diſcovered in his moſt indifferent actions.

He ratifies his Oath to marry Elizabeth. Hall. Bacon.

Next day Henry aſſembled a Council (2) of all the perſons of diſtinction in the Court and City, before whom he ſolemnly renewed his Oath to marry the Princeſs Elizabeth. This declaration was abſolutely neceſſary at the preſent juncture, becauſe of a rumour that he was contracted to Ann, eldeſt Daughter of the Duke of Bretagne, and had not acted with ſincerity when he promiſed to marry the eldeſt Daughter of Edward IV. Beſides, though his deſign was not to derive his right from this marriage, it was however proper the people ſhould think ſo, till he had obtained his deſire of the Parliament, for fear meaſures ſhould be taken beforehand to obſtruct it. Indeed, he was reſolved to perform his promiſe, but was bent not to conſummate his marriage before his Coronation, leſt his Queen ſhould be crowned with him, and her title ſupported by that junction. Nay, he had reaſon to fear, that in caſe his Nuptials were celebrated before the Parliament met, ſome Clauſe in favour of the Houſe of York might be inſerted in the Act to ſettle the Succeſſion.

The Sweating Sickneſs. Hall. Stow. Bacon.

About the middle of September, the City of London was afflicted with a diſeaſe then unknown, which threw the Patients into a prodigious ſweat, and carried them off in four and twenty hours. Thoſe that died not within that ſpace were almoſt ſure of recovering. Happily, it laſted but till the end of October; however, it ſwept away multitudes of people before proper remedies were found (3). The method of cure was to keep the Patient neither too hot nor too cold, with temperate Cordials, which, without too much increaſing the heat, helped Nature to expel the humours that cauſed theſe extraordinary ſweatings.

The Earl of Oxford is made Governor of the Tower. Act. Pub. XII. p. 276.

About this time the new King make the Earl of Oxford (4) Conſtable of the Tower, who had always been attached to the Houſe of Lancaſter, and after his eſcape out of the Caſtle of Hammes joined him at Paris, and had ſince done him ſignal ſervices, particularly at the Battle of Boſworth.

Truce with France. P. 277.

Some time after, the King iſſued out a Proclamation, notifying that he had concluded a Truce for one year with the King of France, from the laſt day of September. It was no ſmall advantage to ſhew the people that Charles VIII acknowledged him for King, even before he was declared ſo by the Parliament.

The Office of High-Steward is exerciſed by Commiſſioners. Ibid.

The Coronation-day approaching, it was neceſſary to ſettle the places and claims of thoſe who were to officiate at this Ceremony. For that purpoſe, it was requiſite to create a Lord High-Steward. But as this Office for ſome time had been enjoyed only by Princes of the Blood, and there were none then in the Kingdom; the King, not to raiſe jealouſies among the great Men, cauſed it to be executed by Commiſſioners (5).

Creations. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh. Bacon.

Mean while, he would no longer delay to ſhew his gratitude to three Lords who had faithfully and effectually ſerved him in his greateſt diſtreſſes. Theſe were Jaſper Earl of Pembroke, his Father's Brother, Thomas Lord Stanley his Father-in-law, and Sir Edward Courtney. The firſt had been a Father to him in his youth, and delivered him from the ſnares of Edward IV, when he was concealed in Wales. After that, he was his conſtant companion in Bretagne, and had helped him to overcome all the difficulties which occurred in his undertakings. In return for his ſervices Henry gave him the title of Duke of Bedford, vacant ever ſince the death of the famous Duke of Bedford, Brother of Henry V. The Lord Stanley, who had been very ſerviceable to the King at the Battle of Boſworth, was created Earl of Derby. Sir Edward Courtney, who had ventured to ingage in his party, and favour in the Weſtern Counties, the Duke of Buckingham's plot, was honoured with the title of Earl of Devonſhire (6). Henry thought not proper to diſpence his favours to others, being willing, according to the cuſtom of his predeceſſors, to reſerve his creations till the ſitting of the Parliament. 1485.

The King's Coronation. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh. Bacon.

The Coronation had been fixed to the 30th of October, and the Parliament was not to meet till the 7th of November. Hence it is evident, that Henry did not mean to bring his Title into queſtion, or leave to the Parliament's care any more than to confirm his Coronation, without ſuffering the foundations to be examined. The examples of Edward IV and Richard III had taught him, that the beſt way to gain the Parliament's approbation, was to take poſſeſſion. Indeed, there is a great difference between debating, whether a Prince who claims a crown has a right to pretend to it, or whether he is to be dethroned when in actual poſſeſſion. The former of theſe things may be done by reaſons, arguments, and ſtudied ſpeeches: The latter requires an Army ready to give weight to the reaſons. So Henry may be ſaid to ſet the Crown himſelf on his head, ſince he alone diſpoſed of his right, without the authority of the Parliament, who would have had much to ſay, if they had examined or been at liberty to examine, by what title Henry aſcended the Throne. The Ceremony of the Coronation was performed by Cardinal Bourchier Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who ſuppoſing Henry's right to be indiſputable, thought it not proper to inquire into the validity of his title (7).

He inſtitutes a Guard of fifty Archers.

The ſame day Henry inſtituted a guard of fifty Archers (8) to attend him and his Succeſſors for ever, covering with a pretence of Grandeur and Majeſty, a precaution which he believed apparently neceſſary in the preſent juncture.

The Parliament meets. Hall. Bacon.

The Parliament met eight days after the Coronation. Henry's ends in calling a Parliament were chiefly four. The firſt was to be declared King de Jure, as he was already King de Facto, and to ſecure the Crown to his poſterity, by an Act in form. The ſecond, to reverſe the Attainders of all his party (9). The third, to attaint thoſe who had expreſſed a great animoſity againſt him, and moſt zeal for the late King. The fourth and laſt, was to ſhew, that tho' he had by his ſole authority placed himſelf on the Throne, to prevent his title from being queſtioned, he intended however to govern the Kingdom like his Predeceſſors, by way of Parliaments, and not aſſume a deſpotick power. This ſtep was abſolutely neceſſary for a Prince whoſe title was ſo dubious, and who aſcended the Throne without being called to it in the uſual way.

Difficulties about ſettling the Succeſſion. Bacon.

It was requiſite, for the people's ſatisfaction and the King's ſecurity, that the Parliament ſhould ſettle the Crown upon him by an expreſs Act; otherwiſe obedience to him might not be thought indiſpenſable. Though he had been powerful enough to cauſe his authority to be owned without ſuch an Act, his Heirs were not certain to be always in ſo favorable a ſituation. Mean while, it was not eaſy to pen this Act. Henry would not hold the Crown either by the People's election, or by the Parliament, or by the Princeſs he was to marry. He did not even intend that Elizabeth ſhould ſhare in the Royalty, otherwiſe than any other foreign Queen. Nevertheleſs, in this beginning of his Reign, it was proper, the People ſhould not know too much, but have ſome cauſe to believe, the King reſted upon all theſe titles. The reaſon was, the Engliſh were extremely jealous of the authority of their Parliaments, and generally much better affected to the Houſe of York than to that of Lancaſter. Wherefore the King finding the Parliament diſpoſed to do whatever he could deſire, intimated or dictated himſelf the words of the Act, namely, That the Inheritance of the Crown ſhould reſt, remain, and abide in the King, and the Heirs of his Body, perpetually ſo to endure, and in none other. Which ambiguous words left it undecided, whether he had a prior Right, which was doubtful, or was only King in fact, which could not be denied. As for the limitation of the Entail, he was contented it ſhould go no further than to himſelf and to the Heirs of his body, leaving the reſt to be decided by the Law in caſe his Line came to fail. Thus by not mentioning the Houſe of York, the Act left it undetermined whether that Houſe was entirely excluded, or might inherit after the Heirs of the new King. In this obſcure and ambiguous manner did the Parliament draw and paſs the Act, which was afterwards confirmed by the Hall. Bacon.

Pope's

1485. Pope's Bull. But Henry took care to have all his titles inſerted in the Bull, namely, his deſcent from the Houſe of Lancaſter, his marriage with Edward the Fourth's eldeſt Daughter, his victory at Boſworth, and the Act of Parliament: To which might be added alſo the Papal Bull of Confirmation. All theſe titles joined together, are a clear evidence of his uncertainty, with reſpect to his right, and of his trouble cauſed by that uncertainty.

Queſtion in Parliament decided by the Judges. Bacon.

The Act of ſettlement and ſucceſſion being paſſed, it was moved for another to reverſe the Attainders of the King's friends, whilſt only Earl of Richmond. But ſeveral of theſe attainted perſons were actually members of the Houſe of Commons, elected by the favor they had found with the People ſince the Revolution. There were likewiſe ſome in the Houſe of Lords. It was therefore repreſented to be incongruous, that theſe perſons ſhould give their Votes in an affair which particularly concerned them, and be Judges in their own cauſe. The King was troubled that the Acts paſſed in the late Reign ſhould be deemed valid, and his friends wanted to be purged of the Crime of eſpouſing his quarrel. He concealed however his concern, and only inſinuated, that he wiſhed the Judges to be conſulted upon the affair. The Judges being met (1), gave it as their opinion, that the Members attainted by courſe of Law, ſhould abſent themſelves till their Attainders were reverſed.

Queſtion relating to the King decided alſo by the Judges. Ibid.

But whilſt they were debating upon this queſtion, another was ſtarted with reſpect to the King himſelf, who was of the number of the attainted, having been declared Traitor and Rebel by an Act of Parliament. This queſtion was much more embarraſſing than the other. The King could not be disjoined from the Parliament without a diſſolution, neither was it probable that he would ſubmit to a Parliamentary Examination. In this puzzling caſe, the Judges unanimouſly reſolved, That the Crown takes away all defects and ſtops in blood: And that from the time the King aſſumed the Crown, the Fountain was cleared, and all Attainders and Corruption of blood diſcharged. This deciſion, more conformable to Politicks than to the Laws, eſtabliſhed a principle that might be attended with terrible conſequences.

Act againſt Richard III and his Adherents. Hollingſh. Bacon.

This Affair being ended, the Parliament paſſed an Act of Attainder againſt the late King, by the name of the Duke of Gloceſter, and againſt his principal Adherents. Of this number were the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Surrey, the Lords Lovel, Ferrers, Zouch, Sir Richard Ratcliff, Sir William Catesby (2), all Miniſters or Favorites of Richard III, of whom ſome were killed at Boſworth field, others executed ſince the Battle. If the Plots which were afterwards formed againſt Henry himſelf had taken effect, he would doubtleſs have been ſerved in the ſame manner, with all his Adherents. So dangerous is it to carry ſeverity too far in caſes of this Nature. Accordingly we ſhall ſee hereafter, that Henry perceiving the conſequences, cauſed an Act to be paſſed to prevent the abuſe of ſuch a precedent. The deſign of the preſent Act was to ſatisfy the King's vengeance, and procure him the forfeited Eſtates of the attainted. Theſe confiſcations brought him in immenſe ſums, which rendered the demand of a Subſidy unneceſſary in this firſt Parliament, eſpecially as the Nation was in Peace, or Truce with all the neighbouring Princes.

A General Pardon. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh. Bacon.

After the King was revenged of his enemies, and had filled his coffers, he publiſhed the Royal Proclamation, offering pardon to all that had been concerned in any Plot againſt him before he came to the Crown, or borne arms for the late King, provided they ſubmitted themſelves by ſuch a day. His firſt deſign was to procure this general pardon to be paſſed in Parliament, but recollecting it was an Act of Grace, he choſe rather that it ſhould wholly flow from himſelf. Many who were apprehenſive of being proſecuted, readily came and took the oath of Allegiance, in order to enjoy the benefit of the pardon. But others choſe to remain in Sanctuary, till the character of the new King was more known. The Lord Lovel, one of Richard the Third's Favorites, took this laſt courſe.

Creation of Peers. Ibid.

Before the Parliament broke up, Henry was pleaſed to reward ſome of the companions of his exile, by creating them Peers of the Realm. The Lord Chandos of Bretagne was made Earl of Bath; Sir Giles D'Aubeney received the title of Baron of D'Aubeney, and Sir Robert Willoughby that of Lord Brooke. At the ſame time the King reſtored Edward Stafford to the dignity of Duke of Buckingham, forfeited by his Father's attainder, and to all the poſſeſſions belonging to his family, confiſcated in the late reign. This was a piece of juſtice he could hardly refuſe to the Son of a Lord, who had loſt his life in his ſervice, and been the firſt author of his advancement to the Throne. 1485.

The King demands the Pledges from France. Hall. Bacon. Act. Pub. XII. p. 278. and offers to prolong the Truce.

The Parliament being diſſolved about the end of November, Henry ſent into France, Oliver King, Archdeacon of Oxford, with money to repay King Charles what he had lent him, and his charges in fitting out the Fleet which brought him to England. Whereupon the Marquiſs of Dorſet, and Sir John Bourchier, left as pledges at Paris, had leave to return home. At the ſame time, Henry gave his Envoy power to prolong the Truce with France, if he found King Charles's Council inclined.

He borrows Money of the City. Stow. Bacon.

Probably his want of ready-money to pay the King of France, put him upon ſending to the City of London to borrow ſix thouſand marks. His demand met at firſt with great difficulties, becauſe he was not yet well known. However, he obtained at laſt two thouſand pounds (3), which he thankfully received, and punctually repayed afterwards. He often borrowed money in this manner in the courſe of his reign, and always paid at the day. His view was to eſtabliſh his credit in that powerful City, that he might uſe it upon any preſſing occaſion.

Morton and Fox are made Privy Counſellors. Bacon.

About the end of the year, he called to his Privy-Council John Morton Biſhop of Ely, lately returned from Flanders, and Richard Fox (4). He lay under great obligations to Morton, particularly for his intelligence of what was plotting againſt him in Bretagne, and had a great value for Fox, knowing him to be a perſon capable of doing him great ſervice, and of a temper very like his own. In time, Morton was made Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Lord Chancellor, Prime Miniſter, and at laſt Cardinal. As for Fox, the King made him firſt Lord Keeper of the Privy-Seal, then Biſhop of Exeter: After that he tranſlated him to Bath and Wells, from thence to Durham, and laſtly to Winchester, the richeſt Biſhoprick in England. Theſe two Prelates, with Urſwick the King's Chaplain, were almoſt always employed in the moſt important Commiſſions, Embaſſies, and Negotiations. Henry loved to employ Eccleſiaſticks, becauſe he had always Church-Preferments ready for their reward. But he took care to promote them by degrees from ſmaller to more conſiderable Sees. Herein he found his own profit; for by tranſlating Biſhops from one See to another, he made the more vacancies, and conſequently the Firſt-Fruits which accrued to the King, were greatly multiplied. Never did Prince more ardently ſeek occaſions to heap up riches. Avarice was his predominant paſſion, influenced even his meaner actions, and cauſed him to take many falſe ſteps, as will be manifeſt hereafter.

The events of this reign have ſuch a connexion with thoſe of ſome other States, that it is abſolutely neceſſary to ſhew in few words the ſituation of the affairs of divers Princes. Otherwiſe the motives of Henry the ſeventh's conduct would be but imperfectly known, who made in his time a very great figure in Europe, though not ſo much by his arms as policy. I ſhall begin with Bretagne.

Affairs of Bretagne. Argentré.

I have elſewhere obſerved, that Peter Landais, favorite of the Duke of Bretagne, entirely governed that Prince, who was old and infirm, and very much impaired in his underſtanding: That ſeveral Lords of Bretagne had made a league againſt that Miniſter, and intended to ſeize him; but having miſſed their aim, were expoſed to the vengeance of the favorite, who had cauſed them all to be condemned to die. In the beginning of this year 1485, Landais, in the name of the Duke his maſter, levied an Army to execute the ſentence, and the Lords on their part took arms in their defence. While Bretagne was thus divided, and the two parties ready to come to a Battle, the condemned Lords cauſed it to be repreſented to thoſe who ſerved Landais, that in the preſent affair, the intereſt not of their common maſter the Duke, but of only his unworthy favorite, was concerned: That it was unjuſt to ſhed the Blood of their Countrymen in the quarrel of a man, who had notoriouſly abuſed his maſter's confidence: That therefore, to appeaſe at once the troubles of Bretagne, there was a much more natural and ready way than that of arms; namely, to rid themſelves of the Miniſter, after which, not a man would refuſe to render 1485. due obedience to the Duke. The Lords of the Duke's party deeming this expedient very reaſonable, were of opinion that in effect it was for the intereſt of the Country and the Duke himſelf, that Landais, ſole cauſe of the troubles, ſhould be ſacrificed to the good of the publick. Landais hearing that the Lords of the two Armies were contriving ſomething againſt him, cauſed a Declaration to be drawn, wherein the Duke ordered that all Perſons of his own Army, who held intelligence with the proſcribed Lords, ſhould be deemed Traitors and Rebels. But this only ſerved to haſten his ruin. The Chancellor, who was in the Plot againſt him, refuſed to ſeal the Declaration, and informed the Lords of it, who reſolved to have no further regard for the Favorite. So, without giving him time to take other meaſures, they went in a body to the Palace, and ſeized Landais in the Duke's own apartment, who was forced to deliver him on condition they would ſpare his life. But that was not their intention. On the contrary, they brought him to a ſpeedy trial, and convicting him of a thouſand crimes, made him atone for them on the Gallows, before the Duke was informed of the ſentence. How much ſoever the Duke was troubled at the death of his Favorite, he could not help granting the Lords of the two Armies letters of pardon. Thus Bretagne would have been reſtored to her former tranquillity, had not the Duke imprudently concerned himſelf with the troubles of the Court of France, which proved the ruin of himſelf and Dukedom. This is what muſt now be ſhewn, ſince it was the occaſion of the War which broke out between Charles VIII and the Duke of Bretagne, and wherein Henry VII was concerned.

Affairs of France. Mezerai.

Lewis XI, King of France, dying in the year 1483, left the government of the perſon of Charles VIII, his Son and Succeſſor, to his Daughter Ann, Wife of Peter de Bourbon Lord of Beaujeu. Charles was fourteen years old, and conſequently of Age according to the ordinance of Charles V. But as he had been ill-educated (1), the King his Father thought him uncapable of governing. The moment Lewis XI was in his grave, Lewis Duke of Orleans, firſt Prince of the Blood, refuſed to acknowlege Ann of Beaujeu for the King's Governeſs; affirming, a Woman had no right to meddle with the affairs of the Kingdom. The States being aſſembled at Tours in January 1484, ended the Diſpute by their authority. They confirmed the late King's will, and ordered the Duke of Orleans ſhould be Preſident of the Council in the King's abſence.

Whilſt the States of France were aſſembled, the Lords of Bretagne made their firſt attempt upon Landais beforementioned, which proved unſucceſsful. The ſentence which was given againſt them, creating a dread of the Favorite's revenge, they applied to Ann Lady of Beaujeu to obtain the King her Brother's protection. On the other hand, Landais ſeeing his enemies had recourſe to the Lady Ann, thought he could not do better than rely upon the aſſiſtance of the Duke of Orleans. To that end, he intreated him to come to the Court of Bretagne, putting him in hopes, the Duke would give him in marriage Ann his eldeſt Daughter and preſumptive Heir. The Duke of Orleans had eſpouſed againſt his Will, Joanna Daughter of Lewis XI; but had made againſt this forced marriage a ſecret proteſtation, which he meant to uſe in order to annull it at a more favorable juncture. So, pleaſed with the hopes Landais had inſpired him with, he came to Bretagne, where he was extremely careſſed. But he could make no long ſtay, being obliged to aſſiſt at the King's Coronation, which was performed in June this year. Probably, whilſt he was in Bretagne, he concerted with the Duke and his Favorite meaſures to diſturb the Government of Ann of Beaujeu, who was become abſolute miſtreſs of the King her Brother's perſon and affairs.

Shortly after, the Duke of Orleans forming a league againſt the Court, and retiring to Boiſgency, demanded that the States of France might be aſſembled. He intended to annull the regulation already made, with reſpect to the Government of the King's perſon. But Ann of Beaujeu cauſed the King to march againſt him with ſuch expedition, that he was forced to accept of ſuch terms as were granted him, becauſe his friends were not yet ready to aſſiſt him. By this agreement, the Earl of Dunois and Longueville, who was conſidered as his chief adviſer, was baniſhed to Aſt in Piedmont, a Town belonging to the Duke of Orleans, with a command not to ſtir from thence without the King's expreſs licence.

The Duke of Orleans being thus compelled to diſmiſs his Troops, cauſed the greateſt part to liſt in the Duke of Bretagne's Army againſt the condemned Lords. On the other hand, Ann of Beaujeu ſent likewiſe to the Barons part of the King's Troops. Landais's death, which happened ſoon after, was not capable to make the Duke of Orleans deſiſt from his projects. He ſtood in need of the Duke of Bretagne to ſupport him againſt the Court, and even hoped one day to marry his Daughter. On the other ſide, the Duke of Bretagne having been greatly perſecuted by Lewis XI, and knowing, Ann of Beaujeu was of the ſame character, and followed the ſame maxims, believed he could not do better than reſt upon the aſſiſtance of the Duke of Orleans. So, after ſome private negotiations, theſe two Princes formed a league together, into which came John de Chalon Prince of Orange, Nephew to the Duke of Bretagne, the Duke of Bourbon, the Earl of Dunois, the Duke of Lorrain, and ſeveral other Princes and Lords. Some time after, the Earl of Dunois returned into France without leave, and withdrew to his Seat at Partenay in Poictou. The King was yet ignorant of the Duke of Orleans's deſigns. But the Earl of Dunois's return convincing him, ſome Plot was contriving in favor of that Prince who was gone to Blois, he ſent him a poſitive order to repair to Court. The Duke obeyed upon a ſecond ſummons; but next day being informed ſome ill was intended him, feigned to go a hunting, and retired into Bretagne, where he was quickly followed by the Prince of Orange and the Earl of Dunois. This was in the beginning of the year 1486. We muſt now ſee what paſſed in the Low-Countries.

Affairs of the Low-Countries.

Since the death of Maria of Burgundy, Maximilian of Auſtria her Husband had been involved in troubles, on account of the guardianſhip of Philip her Son, become Sovereign of the Low-Countries by the death of the Ducheſs his Mother. Brabant, Holland, and Zealand, had willingly received him for Guardian; but Flanders and Hainault refuſed to obey him as ſuch.

The obſtinacy of the Flemings obliged Maximilian to make peace with Lewis XI upon theſe terms: That the Dauphin Charles, Son of Lewis, ſhould marry Margaret Daughter of Maximilian, as ſoon as they were of ſuch an age: That Margaret ſhould have for Dower, Artois, Franche Comté, Macon, Auxerre, and be educated at the Court of France. Purſuant to this Treaty, Lewis kept theſe Provinces which he had already ſeized, and took Margaret home, till the marriage could be conſummated.

In 1483, Maximilian ſucceſsfully made War upon the Liegeois. This ſame year Hainault owned him for Guardian of his Son Philip.

In 1484, the Flemings ſtill perſiſting in their refuſal to acknowledge Maximilian for Guardian, appointed Governors for Philip, of whom Adolphus de Cleves Lord of Ravenſtein was the chief. Their obſtinacy occaſioned between them and Maximilian a War, in which Charles VIII concerned himſelf by aſſiſting the Flemings.

This War ended in January 1485, in a Treaty, importing, that the Flemings ſhould acknowledge Maximilian for Guardian of his Son, upon the expreſs condition that he ſhould not remove him from Flanders till of Age. The Treaty being ſigned, Maximilian made his Entry into Gaunt, where a few days after was a Sedition, but which was happily appeaſed. During the reſt of the year, the Low-Countries enjoyed a Tranquillity which afforded Maximilian time to take a Journey into Germany, to be elected King of the Romans. Let us now ſpeak of the Spaniſh Affairs.

Affairs of Spain.

Henry IV, ſirnamed the Impotent, King of Caſtile, died in 1474, leaving only a Daughter called Joanna, who was univerſally believed to be ſuppoſititious. For which reaſon, Iſabella Siſter to Henry, and Ferdinand Prince of Arragon her Husband, took poſſeſſion of the Throne of Caſtile. They had a fierce War to maintain againſt Alphonſo King of Portugal, who being affianced to Joanna, ſuppoſed Daughter of Henry IV, pretended to the Crown of that Kingdom. This War ended in 1479, to the advantage of Ferdinand and Iſabella, who compelled Alphonſo to deſiſt from his pretenſions. By the Treaty, upon this occaſion, it was agreed, that Alphonſo, the King of Portugal's Grandſon, ſhould marry Iſabella Daughter of Ferdinand, when the Parties were of Age to conſummate the Marriage.

John King of Arragon died this year, leaving to his Son Ferdinand the Kingdom of Arragon, with a War to maintain againſt France, the occaſion whereof was this. King John had mortgaged to Lewis XI, Rouſſillon and Cerdagne, for three hundred thouſand Crowns. Afterwards, the Inhabitants of Perpignan revolted from the French, whoſe Dominion did not pleaſe them. Upon this news, John came to Perpignan, to try to perſuade them to remain in ſubjection to the French, till he could redeem Rouſſillon, by payment of the mortgage. But whilſt he was labouring to appeaſe them, Lewis XI cauſed

In 1485 Charles VIII ſent an Ambaſſador to Ferdinand, who refuſed to receive him, without a poſitive power to reſign Rouſſillon and Cerdagne.

About the latter end of this year was born Catharine Daughter of Ferdinand and Iſabella, who was afterwards Queen of England, and will have a great ſhare in this Hiſtory. Ferdinand and Iſabella had ſeveral other Children, namely, Iſabella affianced to the Prince of Portugal, John born 1477, and Joanna born in 1479.

Affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

I ſhall cloſe this digreſſion with the affairs of Scotland. James III continued to govern his Kingdom with oppreſſion and violence, regardleſs of the affection of his Subjects. I have before obſerved, the Duke of Albany his Brother ſurrendered Dunbar to the Engliſh, and after the death of Edward IV retired into France, where he ended his days at a Tournament. From that time the Engliſh kept poſſeſſion of that place, though Richard III promiſed to reſtore it. This promiſe being unperformed when Henry VII aſcended the Throne of England, James reſolved to recover Dunbar by force of arms. For that purpoſe, about the end of this year, or perhaps the beginning of the next, he beſieged and took the Town. The Seaſon and the important Affairs which Henry had in the beginning of his reign, permitted him not to prepare for its relief.

Such was the poſture of the Affairs of the States with whom Henry VII had any concerns during the courſe of his reign. It is time now to return to our Hiſtory.

1486. The King's Marriage. Jan. 18. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

How great an averſion ſoever the King might have in his mind to the Houſe of York, he had too ſolemnly promiſed to marry the Princeſs Elizabeth, not to perform his word. Beſides, this Marriage was neceſſary to amuſe the Engliſh, who ſtill flattered themſelves, that the King's Intention was to confound his Rights with thoſe of the Houſe of York, notwithſtanding his precautions to hinder her being mentioned in the Act of Settlement. The Nuptials were ſolemnized, the 18th of January, with much greater demonſtrations of Joy on the people's part, than on the King's. There was much leſs ſatisfaction expreſſed on the days either of the King's Entry or Coronation: Which was a clear evidence of the people's affection for the Houſe of York, and particularly for the Family of Edward IV. But this was not to be thought very ſtrange. The Houſe of Lancaſter, of which there remained no branch, but what was deſcended from the Daughters, had been forgot during the reigns of the Kings of the Houſe of York. Though Henry reſted upon his deſcent from the Houſe of Lancaſter, he was known to be Grandſon of a Welſh Gentleman, and his Mother to be ſprung only from a Baſtard of that Houſe, whom the credit of his Father, and the circumſtances of the times had cauſed to be legitimated. As for the Princes and Princeſſes deſcended from the lawful Daughters of John of Gaunt, as they happened to be in Portugal, Caſtile, and Arragon, and were unknown in England, it was not ſurprizing there was no great Inclination for them. Henry did not like to ſee the people's Joy for his Marriage. He perceived, Elizabeth had a greater ſhare in it than himſelf, and conſequently he was thought really King only in right of his Queen. This conſideration inſpired him with ſuch a coldneſs for her, that he never ceaſed giving her marks of it ſo long as ſhe lived. He deferred her Coronation two whole years, and doubtleſs, would have done ſo for ever, if he had not thought it prejudicial to him to perſiſt in refuſing her that honour. Nay, perhaps he would have dealt with her, as Edward the Confeſſor had formerly done by his Queen, Daughter of Earl Goodwin, had not the deſire of Children cauſed him to overcome his averſion. He had conceived ſo mortal a hatred to the whole Houſe of York, that he loſt no opportunity to humble the Yorkiſts, behaving always to them not as a juſt King, but like the head of a Party. In the courſe of his Hiſtory will be ſeen divers proofs of his diſinclination to that Houſe.

The King's Coldneſs for the Queen.

His mortal hatred to the Houſe of York.

A three years Truce with France. Act. Pub. XII. p. 281.

The day before the King's Marriage was ſolemnized at London, his Envoy at Paris had concluded with the Court of France a three years Truce, which was to expire January the 17th 1488-9. Charles VIII, who began to form projects againſt Bretagne, willingly conſented to this Truce, to tie up the hands of the King of England, and hinder him from aſſiſting that Dukedom. On the other ſide, Henry who was ignorant of his deſigns, believed it could not but turn to his advantage to live in a good underſtanding with that Monarch, becauſe he thereby rendered himſelf more formidable to his domeſtick Enemies, who could no longer expect any diverſion from that quarter. 1486.

Shortly after, the King made Thomas Stanley Earl of Derby High-Conſtable, and William Stanley his Brother Lord Chamberlain. Theſe, of all the Kingdom, were the two Perſons the King was moſt indebted to, ſince they enabled him to gain the Victory of Boſworth, which procured him the Crown. The Lord D'Aubeney was made Governor of Calais for ſeven years. The Earl of Derby made High-Conſt. Ruſh. p. 299. p. 296.

Henry and Elizabeth being ſprung from the ſame ſtock, namely Edward III, had wanted a diſpenſation to marry, becauſe they were Couſins in the fourth degree. It was the Biſhop of Imola, Legate à Latere in England and Scotland, that had granted the Diſpenſation, by virtue of his Commiſſion, which empowered him to grant that favour to any twelve Perſons he ſhould pleaſe. The King thought at firſt this Diſpenſation was ſufficient, and without farther reflection, conſummated his Marriage. Afterwards he conſidered, occaſion might be taken from hence to queſtion the validity of his Marriage, and to maintain, that a Power granted for twelve Perſons in general, could not be extended to Sovereigns. To prevent therefore any ſuch objection, he deſired Innocent VIII, who then ſat in the Papal Chair, to grant him a Diſpenſation immediately from himſelf, and peculiarly adapted to his caſe. Whereupon the Pope ordered a Bull to be drawn accordingly. But as this Bull was dated March the 13th, about two months after the Marriage, and mentioned not the conſummation, or the Legate's diſpenſation, Henry deſired to have another with theſe two Articles inſerted, which was granted him the July following. This ſhews how careful he was, to prevent whatever would afford his Enemies a pretence to diſturb him. But the precaution he took at the ſame time makes this appear ſtill plainer. Diſpenſation for the King's Marr. March 16. p. 294, 295. p. 294. p. 313.

With the firſt Diſpenſation he received a Bull, confirming the Act of Succeſſion made by the Parliament. The Pope declared, " He had heard, that though the Crown " of England was fallen to Henry, not only by Conqueſt " and an unqueſtionable Hereditary Right, but moreover " by the unanimous Conſent of the Nobles and People, " and by an Act of Parliament (1), and though undoubtedly and rightfully it belonged to him and the Heirs of " his Body, yet, to put an end to the troubles which had " long diſtracted the Kingdom, he was deſirous to marry " Elizabeth of York, eldeſt Daughter and Heir of King " Edward IV of glorious memory: That therefore having conſidered, with his Brothers the Cardinals, his Intention in the Spirit of Charity, he had granted the " Diſpenſation neceſſary for the Marriage, and pronounced the Children, that ſhould be born of it, lawful, " and capable of ſucceeding to their Father and Mother: " That he had granted this favour, not at the requeſt of " Henry or Elizabeth, or any other in their Name, but " of his own Motion, certain Knowledge, and pure Generoſity, as it was more largely expreſſed in the Letters of Diſpenſation, to which he gave the ſame force " as if they were inſerted word for word in theſe preſents: That therefore he decreed, declared, and pronounced lawful, the Succeſſion of the Children iſſuing " from this Marriage, and confirmed the Act of Parliament concerning King Henry's Title, and the Succeſſion of his Children, ſupplying by his Apoſtolical Authority, all defects of Right or Fact that might therein " occur. The Bull confirming the Act of Settlement. March 27. Act. Pub. XII. p. 297.

" That of his own Motion, and by his Authority, he " admoniſhed and required all the People of England, " and all the Subjects of King Henry, of what rank ſoever, to obey that Prince, and expreſly forbid them " to raiſe diſturbances about the Succeſſion, or upon any " other account whatſoever, or to infringe in any manner the Diſpenſation, Declaration, and Act of Parliament.

" That he pronounced ipſo facto excommunicate all " Perſons that ſhould raiſe any ſuch diſturbances, or infringe the foreſaid Letters and Acts, to be abſolved only " by the Holy See, or ſuch as ſhould be impowered by " her, unleſs at the point of death.

" That if Elizabeth ſhould happen to die before Henry " without Iſſue, he decreed, agreeably to the foreſaid Act

Remarks on this Bull.

Nothing ſhews more how much Henry was himſelf convinced of the weakneſs of his Title, than his procuring the Pope's Confirmation. This precaution was not only needleſs, but even unlawful, ſince it was directly againſt the Statutes of Præmunire, of which the Engliſh were ſo jealous. Accordingly, he had taken care to have it ſaid in the Bull, that the Pope granted the Diſpenſation of his own motion, and without any previous requeſt; a Clauſe evidently falſe. It is certain, the Bull of Diſpenſation ran in expreſs terms, that the Pope granted it upon what was repreſented to him by Henry and Elizabeth. Beſides what the Pope affirmed, that the Crown of England was fallen to Henry by Hereditary Right, that heap and confuſion of other Titles, namely, the Conſent of the Nobles and People, the Act of Parliament, the King's Marriage with Elizabeth; all this, I ſay, correſponded ſo exactly with Henry's uncertainty concerning his Title, that doubtleſs, it proceeded not from the Pope's own Knowledge, but rather from the King himſelf, who had as it were dictated how the Bull ſhould be worded. In fine, the Pope would never have thought of confirming the Act of Settlement, if he had not been requeſted. But it was not convenient the King ſhould appear to have deſired ſuch a Bull, ſince nothing could be more diſagreeable to the Engliſh. For taking ſuch a ſtep, even before the Statute of Præmunire was enacted, King John entirely loſt the affection and confidence of his Barons, with the Crown which he meant to ſecure by that expedient. Henry III was like to undergo the ſame fate, for taking ſome precautions of this nature. Accordingly, it will hereafter be ſeen, that this Bull was not capable of hindering the King's being frequently moleſted. The Engliſh were not, as formerly, ſuch Bigots, as to imagine, the Pope's Authority could give Henry a Title which he really had not.

The King's meaſures with regard to the Houſe of York. Bacon.

Though the King had happily attained his ends, with reſpect to the Act of Settlement and Succeſſion, he knew however, what the Parliament had done was not agreeable to the ſentiments of the People. He had been called into England to deliver the Nation from the Tyranny of Richard III, and not to diſpoſſeſs entirely the Houſe of York. This is ſo true, that in caſe the Yorkiſts had not joined with him, in order to preſerve the Crown in that Houſe, by means of his marriage with Elizabeth, the Lancaſtrians would never have been able to raiſe him to the Throne. The Queen, Widow of Edward IV, the Duke of Buckingham, the Lord Stanley, were not friends of the Houſe of Lancaſter, tho' private enemies to the perſon of Richard. To theſe however Henry was chiefly indebted for his greatneſs. If the People had been conſulted, and at liberty to chuſe a Sovereign, Richard III indeed would have been diſpoſſeſſed, but Elizabeth placed on the Throne, and the Earl of Richmond left in his exile in Bretagne. Henry therefore was conſidered only as the inſtrument of their deliverance from the Dominion of a Tyrant. But as it was reaſonable to reward him, the giving him a ſhare of the royal dignity, by means of his marriage with the Princeſs Elizabeth, was thought a great recompence. And if it was readily agreed, that his right from the Houſe of Lancaſter ſhould be united with Elizabeth's, it was rather to avoid freſh troubles by that expedient, than out of a belief of the lawfulneſs of his title. He had himſelf gladly accepted the propoſal, and upon that foundation it was that he formed his enterprize; otherwiſe he would have doubtleſs met with leſs aſſiſtance and much greater oppoſition. But he had no ſooner gained the Battle of Boſworth, but he formed the deſign of reigning in his own right only, and excluding entirely the Houſe of York, wherein he deceived the expectation of the Engliſh, and abuſed their confidence. This is what he had always in his thoughts, tho' he concealed his uneaſineſs with all poſſible care.

The King's Progreſs into the North. Hall. Bacon. Hollingſh.

As the Houſe of York had moſt Adherents in the northern Counties, Henry reſolved to take a progreſs into thoſe parts. He hoped that his preſence, with ſome Acts of Grace and Favor he might have occaſion to diſpenſe, would be capable of producing a good effect. With this view, he departed towards the middle of the Spring, and kept his Eaſter at Lincoln. During his ſtay in that City, he heard, the Lord Lovel, one of Richard the Third's Favorites, Humphrey and Thomas Stafford, Brothers, who had refuſed to accept of the general pardon, were gone out of Sanctuary (1), but to what place was unknown. As he was ignorant what their deſign could be, he continued his Journey to York. Shortly after, he received more certain intelligence concerning the Fugitives. He was told, the Lord Lovel was advancing towards York at the head of three or four thouſand men, and that the Staffords were in arms in Worceſterſhire before the City of Worceſter. This news gave him no ſmall uneaſineſs. He ſaw himſelf in that part of the Kingdom where he knew he was not beloved, and where it was not eaſy to raiſe forces. Beſides, he had reaſon to fear the Lord Lovel had correſpondents in York, and among the Nobility of the County; conſequently there was no time to loſe. He muſt ſpeedily reſolve either to quit York, or take ſome courſe to oppoſe the Rebels. In this ſtrait, he choſe to ſeem unconcerned, perceiving that flight could not but produce a very ill effect. So, without ſhewing any fear, he armed ſuch of his Followers as were moſt proper to bear arms, and commiſſioned ſome truſty friends to raiſe Men in and about York with all poſſible diligence. He was ſo fortunate, and ſo faithfully ſerved as to aſſemble in a ſhort time three thouſand Men, of whom he gave the Command to his Uncle the Duke of Bedford. But theſe Troops were ſo ill armed and in ſuch diſorder, that they were not much to be relied on. Beſides, they were raiſed in a County where the Inhabitants were not well-affected to the King. For this reaſon, Henry expreſly charged the Duke of Bedford to avoid fighting if poſſible, till reinforced, but however to ſhew no fear, and proclaim, in his name, pardon to all that would lay down their arms. This precaution ſucceeded to his wiſh. The Duke of Bedford approaching the Malecontents, ordered the Proclamation to be publiſhed in terms denoting great ſuperiority and confidence. It had however little effect on the Rebels. But the Lord Lovel their Commander, fearing they would accept of the pardon, forſook them firſt. He retired all alone, and hid himſelf in Lancaſhire at his friend Sir Thomas Broughton's, and ſhortly after paſſed into Flanders to the Ducheſs Dowager of Burgundy. His Army being without a Leader, ſubmitted to the King's Mercy. The Staffords, who were beſieging Worceſter, hearing what paſſed in the North, raiſed the Siege, and abandoning their Troops, took Sanctuary in the Church of Colnham, a little Village [near Abington.] But that Church enjoying no peculiar privilege, it was judged in the King's Bench to be no ſufficient Sanctuary for Traitors. So the two Brothers being taken thence by force, Humphrey the eldeſt was ſent to London to be executed at Tyburn; but Thomas, as being ſeduced by his Brother, was pardoned. This Rebellion, the firſt in this Reign, was like a Blaze which laſted not long. It was quenched with the blood of one ſingle Perſon. We ſhall ſee, hereafter, others which coſt the King more to extinguiſh the Flames.

September the 20th, the Queen was delivered (2) of a Prince, tho' ſhe had been but eight Months with child. The King would have the new-born Prince called Arthur, in memory of the famous Britiſh Monarch, of whoſe race he deſired to be thought. The Family of the Tudors being Britiſh or Welſh, it was not unlikely that Henry deſigned by naming his Son Arthur, to inſinuate his being deſcended from that illuſtrious Monarch. It is certain however, this report was not ſpread, nor Genealogies forged to confirm it, till after the time we are ſpeaking

Nay, ſome affirm, he was beheaded.

Murmurs of the People.

The King's Proceedings to deprive the Houſe of York of their rights, had very much diſſatisfied the People, who expected quite another thing. They who had called in Henry had been in hopes, that the titles of the two Houſes being confounded by his Marriage with Elizabeth, there would be no more diſtinction between Yorkiſts and Lancaſtrians, but all might equally expect the Places in the King's diſpoſal. Theſe hopes were further confirmed by the Birth of Prince Arthur, in whoſe perſon were united the litigious rights of the two Houſes. But it was ſeen with extreme concern, that the King ſtill conſidered the Houſe of York as Rivals and Enemies, and that his Jealouſy reached to the Queen herſelf, whoſe intereſt ſhould have been as dear to him as his own. For, not content to ſhew by his continual coldneſs, and by ſeveral mortifications he made her indure, the little kindneſs he had for her, he had given her a very ſenſible mark of it, in deferring her Coronation, as if ſhe had been unworthy to ſit on the Throne with him. Nay, after ſhe had brought him a Son, her Coronation was no more talked of than when they were firſt married. This conduct plainly ſhewed, the Houſe of York was ſtill odious to him, and that he feared to take any ſtep which might give the People occaſion to believe ſhe had ſome right to the Crown. It was impoſſible but this affectation ſhould cauſe great concern in the Yorkiſts, who were much more numerous than the Lancaſtrians.

It is rumoured that the King deſigned to put Warwick to Death, Bacon. Hall. and that one of Edward's Sons was alive.

This diſcontent being almoſt univerſal, ſome malicious perſons ſpread a report, that the King intended to put to death the Earl of Warwick, Priſoner in the Tower, and the ſole Male of the Houſe of York. Their Deſign was, no doubt, to compare Henry with Richard III, who had taken away the lives of his two Nephews to ſecure the Crown, and intimate to the People, that in changing Kings, they had only received one Tyrant for another. Moreover, it was openly rumoured, that one of Edward the Fourth's Sons was ſtill alive, having, as it were miraculouſly, eſcaped his Uncle's cruelty. All this plainly tended to ſound the People's inclinations. The King himſelf, whether he was the Author of this rumour, as his Hiſtorian affirms, or only fomented it by his carriage (1), was not ſorry the People ran after a Phantome, becauſe it hindered them from too firmly adhering to the Perſons of the Houſe of York, which really exiſted. Mean while, as the eagerneſs wherewith the People ſwallowed this falſe report, was a clear evidence how ready they would be, if a favorable opportunity offered, to liſt againſt the King, ſo it gave occaſion to the Project I am going to ſpeak of.

Project of a Prieſt. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh. Bacon.

A certain Oxford Prieſt, one Richard Simon, perceiving the People's joy at the falſe report of one of Edward the Fourth's Sons being alive, took it into his head to put upon the World for Richard, Duke of York, Brother of Edward V, a young Man, named Lambert Simnel, a Baker's Son, whom he trained up in his houſe, and believed proper to play ſuch a part. He was about the Duke of York's age (2), of good natural parts, and in all his behaviour had ſomething grand, and above his birth. Simon had ſcarce begun inſtructing his Pupil, when another rumour was ſpread, that the Earl of Warwick had made his eſcape out of the Tower. This news, though falſe, cauſed among the People ſo general a joy, that the Prieſt thought fit to alter his Project, and make Simnel paſs for the Earl of Warwick. Simnel's age agreed better with the Earl's, and the circumſtance of his eſcape was ſuitable to the Plot. His Pupil was to be well inſtructed for this purpoſe, ſince he was not to perſonate a young Man taken out of his Cradle in his infancy, and concealed in ſome private place, but a Prince well known, and brought up in the Court of Edward IV. The Earl was about twelve years old when impriſoned by Richard III. Simnel therefore was to learn to talk pertinently of Edward's Court, and to know particularly the Lords and Ladies that frequented it, as well as the King and Queen. This gives occaſion to preſume, that the Prieſt was himſelf inſtructed by perſons well-informed, and the Plot ſuggeſted to him. For, though he had the aſſurance to form ſuch a deſign, it is not likely he could inſtruct his Pupil in many particulars, which he was neceſſarily to know. At leaſt, it is certain, the King imagined, the Queen his Mother-in-law, and other friends of the Houſe of York, were the real Authors of this contrivance, and only made uſe of the Prieſt as an inſtrument to execute their Deſigns. The Queen-Dowager was extremely intriguing. It was ſhe that had ſet on foot the Project in favour of the King when in Bretagne, and thereby ſhewn her credit with the Yorkiſts. Beſides, ſhe could not but be very much diſpleaſed with the King's coldneſs to her Daughter, and his refuſing to have her crowned. This alone was ſufficient to cauſe the King to ſuſpect her. But it may be, there was more than bare ſuſpicions. 1486.

He makes Simnel paſs for the Earl of Warwick.

The King ſuſpects the Queen-Dowager. Bacon.

Be this as it will, Simon, or thoſe that employed him, not thinking proper to produce Simnel firſt in England, where he might be examined too cloſely, and by Perſons too knowing, judged it convenient that he ſhould act his firſt ſcene in Ireland, where Simon the Prieſt accompanied him. In all appearance, ſome meaſures had been taken for his reception in that Country. Since Henry's acceſſion to the Throne, he had very much neglected the affairs of that Iſland, reckoning that being maſter in England, the Iriſh were not to be feared. Indeed, he made the Duke of Bedford Governor of Ireland, in the room of the Earl of Lincoln, Nephew of Richard III, but had continued the ſame Deputy, the ſame Chancellor, and all the reſt of the officers placed there by Richard. So, the Duke of Bedford being ſtill in England, Thomas Fitz-Gerald Earl of Kildare commanded in Ireland as Deputy, and his Brother was Chancellor (3).

The Prieſt carries Simnel into Ireland. Hall. Bacon. Hollingſh. Bacon.

Simnel is received and proclaimed King. Hall. Hollingſh. Bacon.

It is more than probable, that the Earl of Kildare was in the Plot, and had even begun to take meaſures to cauſe Lambert Simnel, the pretended Earl of Warwick, to be acknowledged in Ireland. Ever ſince June laſt, Henry had received notice that ſomething was contriving againſt his ſervice in that Country, though he knew not the particulars. Upon this information, he ſent for the Deputy to Court, but the Earl found means to cauſe the Council of Ireland to write to him, that the Deputy's preſence was abſolutely neceſſary in the Iſland. Simnel being arrived at Dublin, addreſſed himſelf to the Earl of Kildare as Earl of Warwick, and informed him how he eſcaped out of the Tower. If the Earl of Kildare had not been in the Plot, or at leaſt, wiſhed the thing to be as Simnel related it, he would doubtleſs have ſeized the Pretender. It was his duty, as he commanded in Ireland in the King's name. But inſtead of taking that courſe, he left him at liberty, and ſo ordered it, with his Brother the Chancellor's help, that the arrival of the pretended Earl of Warwick was divulged, without their appearing to be concerned. They would firſt ſee how the People would be affected with the news. The Impreſſion it made, was as great and as ſudden, as the Authors of the Plot could deſire. When it was known in Dublin that the Earl of Warwick was arrived, the People expreſſed ſo great joy, that the Deputy and Chancellor believed there was no danger in acknowledging the Pretender. So, after a conference with their friends and confidents, they ſolemnly waited upon him at his lodging, and conducted him with great pomp to the Caſtle, where he was treated like a Prince (4). Simnel received the reſpect that was paid him with a countenance and carriage that by no means ſavoured of the meanneſs of his Birth. In a few days he was proclaimed in Dublin King of England, and Lord of Ireland, by the name of Edward VI. The Iriſh regarded not the attainder of the Duke of Clarence his pretended Father, having newly learnt by the example of Henry himſelf, that the advancement to the Throne takes away all defects.

The King is embarraſſed. Hall. Bacon.

The news of ſo unexpected an event made the King very uneaſy, becauſe it ſtruck upon that ſtring, which he ever moſt feared; namely, his Title, of the goodneſs whereof he was not himſelf thoroughly ſatisfied. Indeed, the victory of Boſworth had given him an opportunity to decide the queſtion himſelf in his favour. But he was very ſenſible, that if the Titles of the two Houſes came once more to be put in the balance, he ſhould want a ſecond victory to confirm his, and the Houſe of York would have reaſons more than ſufficient, if their affairs grew proſperous. In the next place, Ireland, where the pretended Earl of Warwick was retired, was a Country wholly devoted to the Houſe of York, and conſequently it was not eaſy to attack the Rebels there. For that purpoſe, it would be neceſſary to lead thither a numerous Army, which could not be done without immenſe charge. In fine, it was to be feared, the flames which began to appear in Ireland, would reach England, and that there was a ſecret correſpondence between the Iriſh and Engliſh. In this ſtrait, he called a Council of his moſt inti-

Henry confines his Mother-in-law to a Monaſtery, and ſeizes her Eſtate. Hall. Bacon. Hollingſh.

Be this as it will, preſently after holding this Council, he ordered his Mother-in-law to be confined in the Nunnery of Bermondſey [in Southwark.] Moreover he ſeized all her Eſtate, which was very conſiderable. But as he did not care to diſcover to the publick the reaſon of this rigorous uſage, becauſe he could not perhaps give ſufficient proof of her crime, he cauſed it to be reported, that ſhe was thus puniſhed for delivering the Princeſſes her Daughters into the hands of Richard III. This pretence rendered his action ſtill more enormous with the people. They could not help thinking it very ſtrange, that the Queen Dowager ſhould be ſo ſeverely puniſhed for a fault, which might rather be deemed a weakneſs than a premeditated malice. In the next place, it could not be conceived, why the King had ſo long neglected to inquire into this pretended crime. In the third place, ſince he had married her Daughter, he ſeemed to have owned that ſhe was innocent, or at leaſt had forgiven her. Laſtly, all knowing her to have been one of the principal inſtruments of his advancement to the Throne, they could not but abhor his ingratitude. This ſevere uſage was thought to be a plain indication of a ſettled deſign, to uſe all pretences to complete the ruin of the Houſe of York and its adherents. But it was not only compaſſion for the Queen's ſufferings, which gave riſe to theſe reflections; her example ſtruck terror into all the Kingdom, there being very few families but what were guilty, either of having aſſiſted Richard III, or of not having oppoſed him. When it was conſidered therefore, that the King's Mother-in-law was reduced to this ſad condition, for not having been willing or able to reſiſt the Tyranny of the late King, every one was afraid of being called to account for the like crimes, which were ſuppoſed to be buried in oblivion. Notwithſtanding all this, the Queen Dowager was confined to the day of her death, which happened not till ſome years after (2).

She dies in Confinement.

The Earl of Warwick is ſhown in publick. Hall. Bacon. Hollingſh.

It was thought at firſt that the Queen Dowager's misfortune proceeded from the cauſe publiſhed by the King. But it was quickly perceived to be an effect of the decrees of the ſecret Council called by the King upon Simnel's affair. Shortly after, purſuant to another decree of the ſame Council, the King ordered the true Earl of Warwick to be ſhown in publick, who was led through the principal ſtreets of London, and then conducted in ſolemn proceſſion to St. Paul's, where multitudes were aſſembled to ſee him. There, all had time allowed them to view him attentively. Nay, he was made to talk with thoſe that knew him beſt, and particularly with ſuch as were known to be well affected to the Houſe of York; after which, he was again conveyed to the Tower. But the Iriſh maintained, that the Earl of Warwick, ſhown at London, was an impoſtor, and their's at Dublin the true Earl. They even took occaſion from hence to exclaim againſt the King, for proſtituting the ceremony of a proceſſion to ſuch a cheat. The King fearing the miſchief would gain ground, thought to ſtop it, by proclaiming a general pardon to all that ſhould quit the Rebels, and by promiſing a reward to thoſe that ſhould diſcover the ſecret of the plot. At the ſame time he ſent orders to guard the Ports, that the Male-contents of England might not paſs over and join their friends in Ireland. But all this was not capable to break the meaſures of his enemies.

Bacon.

The Earl of Lincoln goes over to the Ducheſs of Burgundy. Hall. Stow Hollingſh. Bacon.

It was not only in Ireland that troubles were preparing for him. The readineſs wherewith ſome Engliſh Lords and Gentlemen embraced this opportunity to endeavour his ruin, plainly ſhowed, the conſpiracy had been laid ſome time before in England. Indeed, it is not likely, a ſingle Prieſt ſhould have formed ſuch a project, without imparting it to perſons more able than himſelf to accompliſh it. Be this as it will, John Earl of Lincoln, declared by Richard III his Uncle, preſumptive Heir of the Crown, was the firſt that openly appeared to maintain the intereſt of the pretended Earl of Warwick. He was Son of John de la Pole Earl of Suffolk, and Elizabeth Siſter of Edward IV, and Richard III. This Earl however ſeemed to act contrary to his own intereſt in taking part with the Earl of Warwick, who was nearer the Throne than himſelf. But as, probably, he was not ignorant, the perſon in Ireland was a cheat, he did not queſtion that he ſhould eaſily deſtroy him, when he had made him his inſtrument to dethrone Henry. So, upon the firſt news of Simnel's being received and proclaimed King at Dublin, he embarked for Flanders, to concert with the Ducheſs Dowager of Burgundy, the means to accompliſh this undertaking. 1486.

Diſpoſition of the Ducheſs with regard to the King. Bacon.

Since the death of Charles Duke of Burgundy, Margaret of York his Widow, Siſter of Edward IV, and Richard III, lived in Flanders where her Dower was aſſigned her. As ſhe had no Children by the Duke her Husband, ſhe carefully attended the education of the Archduke Philip, Son of Maximilian of Auſtria, and Maria of Burgundy her Daughter-in-law. She had with extreme concern, ſeen the revolution which reſtored the Houſe of Lancaſter to the Throne, in prejudice of the Houſe of York. She would however have been patient, if Henry VII in uniting the two Houſes by his marriage with Elizabeth, had held the balance even, and diſpenſed his favours impartially to the friends of both parties. But ſhe altered her mind, when ſhe ſaw Henry delayed marrying her Niece till the Crown was adjudged to himſelf, without any mixture of the Title of the Houſe of York. She could not ſee without trouble, that, even after his marriage, he refuſed to let Elizabeth be crowned, an honour no Queen of England had been debarred of ſince the conqueſt; and the birth of a Son had not induced him to do her that juſtice. So, perceiving his hatred of the whole Houſe of York was implacable, ſhe did not think herſelf obliged to have much regard for him. On the contrary, ſhe believed, ſhe might without ſcruple, labour his ruin. Indeed, it is uncertain whether this Princeſs was concerned in the Prieſt's and Simnel's plot, before Ireland declared for him. It is however very likely, ſhe had helped to manage, together with the Queen Dowager, the Earl of Lincoln, and ſome other friends of the Houſe of York. For, the Earl of Lincoln's voyage into Flanders, upon the firſt news of Simnel's arrival in Ireland, gives occaſion to preſume, he held private intelligence with the Ducheſs of Burgundy, and from her expected the ſucceſs of the enterprize. The Lord Lovel, who was in Flanders before him, was likewiſe in the Plot as well as Sir Thomas Broughton, who ſtaid in England to ſend them notice of what was tranſacting there.

She promiſes to aſſiſt the Earl of Lincoln. Hall. Bacon.

Whether the Ducheſs of Burgundy contrived this Plot herſelf, or was only informed of it by the Earl of Lincoln, ſhe readily embraced this opportunity, which ſhe believed ſufficiently favorable to inſpire her with hopes of defeating Henry's eſtabliſhment. Having adviſed with the Earl of Lincoln, Lord Lovel, and ſome other Fugitives, ſhe promiſed to furniſh them with two thouſand veteran German Soldiers, under the command of Martin Swart an Officer of note, with whom they ſhould paſs into Ireland, to ſtrengthen the new King's party. She did not at all doubt but theſe ſuccours coming from a foreign Country would encourage the Yorkiſts to take Arms in England. In this ſituation were the King's affairs about the end of the year 1486. But before we proceed to the occurrences of the next year, we muſt briefly ſee what had paſſed in the neighbouring Countries, eſpecially in France and Bretagne during the courſe of this year.

Affairs of Bretagne. Argentré.

I left the Duke of Orleans in Bretagne with the Prince of Orange and the Earl of Dunois. Theſe Princes were no ſooner in that Country, but many of their friends came and joined them, and even brought them ſome Troops. The Duke of Bretagne was old and infirm both in body and mind. Since the death of Landais he did not know who to truſt with the adminiſtration of his affairs, conſidering his Barons but as ſo many enemies, though he had granted them a pardon. The Duke of Orleans finding him thus embarraſſed, gained ſuch an aſcendent over him, that he governed Bretagne as if he had been the Sovereign. The advantages he enjoyed in that Country, where almoſt every thing was in his diſpoſal, drew thither many Frenchmen, who came to offer him their ſervice. Mean while, the Duke of Bretagne aſſembled the States, and cauſed his eldeſt Daughter Ann to be declared Heireſs of the Duchy; and in caſe ſhe died without iſſue, it was decreed, her younger Siſter Iſabel ſhould ſucceed her.

The Lords of Bretagne newly reconciled to their Sovereign, perceiving, the Duke of Orleans ruled abſolutely in the Duke's Name, and that the French flocked to him in Crowds, began to entertain ſuſpicions of their Prince. They were afraid, he had ſent for all theſe Strangers to help him to be revenged of them for their outrage upon 1486. his Favorite In this belief, they assembled at Chateaubriant to consult what was to be done to prevent the danger with which they thought themselves threatned. They were headed by the Lord of Rieux Marshal of Bretagne. Charles VIII, who was apprehensive, the Duke of Orleans intended to make use of the Duke of Bretagne's Forces to raise fresh troubles in France, thought it his Interest to cherish the British Lords discontent. He hoped thereby to hinder the Duke of Bretagne from assisting the Duke of Orleans. To that end, he sent to the Barons assembled at Chateaubriant, Andrew d' Epinay commonly called the Cardinal of Bourdeaux, with an offer of his Protection. The offer was gladly received by many of them, some of whom perhaps were already gained by the Court of France. Others, foreseeing the Inconveniences that might follow, were for rejecting it. They alledged the several attempts of Charles's Predecessors to become masters of Bretagne, and how dangerous it was to admit the French into the Country. In fine, to prevent this mischief, it was agreed, that a Treaty should be made with the King of France, to determine the number of Men he was to find them, and to set bounds to his pretensions. Pursuant to this resolution, they signed with the Cardinal a Treaty, importing, that the King should send them an aid not exceeding four hundred Lances, and four thousand Foot; that he should not take or besiege any place, neither make any demands upon the Duchy before Duke Francis's death. Charles ratified the Treaty, but as he afterwards showed, not with design to observe it.

The Cardinal of Bourdeaux being returned to the King, told him, that during his stay at Chateaubriant, he had learnt, that the Prince of Orange was secretly treating of a Marriage between Maximilian of Austria, and Ann, eldest Daughter and Heiress of the Duke of Bretagne. This discovery obliged King Charles to form the project of seizing Bretagne, if perhaps it was not quite formed already. The posture of the affairs of Europe was extremely favorable. Ferdinand and Isabella King and Queen of Arragon and Castile, little regarded the preservation of Bretagne. Besides, they were then employed in their wars with the Moors of Granada. But though Charles might have feared, that Ferdinand would enter into some League for the Duke of Bretagne's defense, he had an infallible way to prevent him: And that was, to restore him Roussillon, which was of much less consequence than Bretagne to the Crown of France. Henry VII, who had a manifest Interest to oppose this enterprize, was embarassed with affairs that, probably, would hinder him from medling with those of others. It was precisely at the time, when the pretended Earl of Warwick began to appear in Ireland. As for the Low-Countries, Charles had not much to fear from thence. Philip, the Sovereign, was still a Minor. Maximilian his Father and Guardian, who governed these Provinces in his name, was but little regarded. Though he had made Peace with the Flemings, there was however a mutual distrust, which would not suffer him to send his Forces out of the Country. Besides, the war with France was renewed this year, on account of Terouenne, surprized in full Peace by the Governor of Douay. In short, though Maximilian was the Emperor's Son, and chosen King of the Romans in February this year, he was ever in extreme want of Money, his new Dignity having made no addition to his power (1).

1487. Treaty of Commerce with the Low-Countries. Jan. 2. Act. Pub. XII. p. 318. ---- 320.

In the beginning of the year 1487, Henry concluded with Maximilian a Treaty wholly relating to Trade, and which was only provisional, till certain Articles could be settled, upon which the English and Flemings with difficulty agreed. The Trade between England and the Low-Countries was so necessary for the Subjects of both Princes, that it could not be interrupted without both being sufferers. But for that very reason each strove to reap some advantage from the situation of affairs, which rendered the Treaties very difficult.

Mean while, Henry was not easy, since the Earl of Lincoln's retiring into Flanders. He knew the Duchess of Burgundy to be haughty and enterprising (2), and powerful enough to assist such as would attempt to disturb him. The Earl of Lincoln's retreat into Flanders, presently after Simnel's arrival in Ireland, left him no room to question, there was a design formed between the Earl and the Duchess of Burgundy, to support the pretended Earl of Warwick. So, fearing the storm would divide and fall upon him both from Flanders and Ireland, he resolved to have two armies, under the command of the Duke of Bedford and the Earl of Oxford, to be ready at the same time to oppose the descent of the Flemings and Irish, if they should think of attacking England. Mean while, as he was not afraid of an Invasion before Summer, he resolved to improve the leisure the Winter Season afforded him, in taking a progress into the eastern Counties of Suffolk and Norfolk. There was most danger from those parts, by reason of the neighbourhood of the Low-Countries. When he was come to St. Edmundsbury, he heard, the Marquis of Dorset was hastening to clear himself of some Imputations laid to his Charge, and to offer his service. But the King believing, that after what he had lately done to the Queen Dowager, the Marquis her Brother could have no great affection for him, refused to receive him, and sent the Earl of Oxford to meet him, with orders to carry him to the Tower. He let him know however, that after the troubles were appeased he should willingly hear him, and if he caused him to be arrested, it was purely to provide for his own safety, by preventing his hearkening to those that might give him ill advice (3). Then, he came to Norwich (4), from whence he went in Pilgrimage to our Lady of Walsingham (5), after which he returned to London (6).

1487. He visits Norfolk and Suffolk. Hall. Bacon. &c. He returns to London.

It was not till the beginning of May, that the Earl of Lincoln, the Lord Level, and Martin Swart, sailed for Ireland, with the two thousand Germans raised by the Dutchess of Burgundy, at her own expence. Presently after their arrival at Dublin, they proceeded to the Coronation of the pretended King, which was performed with great Solemnity, in the presence of the Earl of Kildare, the Chancellor, and the rest of the great Officers. He was crowned with a Crown taken from the head of the Virgin's Statue in St. Mary's Church. There were but two or three Bishops that refused to acknowledge the new King (7). The History of Ireland says, that the pretended Sovereign summoned a kind of Parliament, where the Clergy granted the Pope a Subsidy, for fear the Court of Rome should take occasion from these proceedings to trouble them.

The Earl of Lincoln arrives in Ireland. May. Simnel is crowned at Dublin. J. Ware. Hib. Ireland.

The Coronation being over, a great Council was held to consult what was next to be done. Their success in Ireland, where not a Sword was drawn for Henry, made them expect great matters in England. The Leaders fancied, they were in a much better Condition to overthrow Henry, than Henry himself was when he passed into England, to overthrow Richard III. They scarce doubted of Success, being sure, as they imagined, the English for the most part would rise in their favour. However, some were for making Ireland the Seat of the war. They alledged, as the chief reason, that Henry would never venture to come over in person, or in case he quitted England, his absence would occasion in the Kingdom Insurrections which would greatly promote the Affairs of the new King. Had this advice been taken, Henry would have been very much embarassed. In that case, he must have had two strong armies on foot, one to subdue Ireland, the other to keep all quiet in England. It is easy to see, that at such a juncture it would not have been prudent to leave England without Troops, both by reason of the Correspondents, the Rebels might have there, and the neighbourhood of the Duchess of Burgundy, who would have taken advantage of such a neglect. Accordingly, Henry, as I observed, had already resolved to have two armies. But others on the contrary represented, that Ireland was not able to pay the German Troops, much less maintain a long war. That besides, the standing upon the defensive in Ireland was not the way to dethrone Henry, but the attacking him in England, where it was likely, they should meet with many friends. This advice was strengthened by another reason, which was not alledged, but however was the real motive thereof, namely, that the Germans and Irish were in hopes of making their fortunes in England, whereas in Ireland, they had scarce wherewithal to subsist. So, it was resolved to pass immediately into England, in the same Vessels that had transported the Germans. Mean while, Henry hearing of the Earl of Lincoln's arrival in Ireland with the foreign

Henry aſſembles his Army at Coventry. Hall.

Some time after, he heard that Simnel was landed in Lancaſhire (1), in Company with the Earls of Lincoln and Kildare, the Lord Lovel and the German General. Sir Thomas Broughton joining the Rebels with a ſmall body of Engliſh, they all marched together towards York, without committing any Act of Hoſtility in their rout, in order to draw the People to their ſide. But they found themſelves deceived in their expectation. Not a Man, except what Broughton had brought, took arms in their favour, the Engliſh not liking at all to receive a King at the hands of the Iriſh and Germans. The Earl of Lincoln, who commanded the Army, had reſolved to avoid fighting, in expectation of being joined by great numbers of Male-contents. But ſeeing the People's coldneſs, he thought he ſhould come to a Battle as ſoon as poſſible, leſt his Army, which was but eight thouſand ſtrong, ſhould diminiſh inſtead of increaſing. So, changing his rout on a ſudden, he marched towards Newark, in hopes to become maſter of that place before the King ſhould arrive.

Mean while, Henry was advanced as far as Nottingham, where he held a Council of War. He had yet drawn together but ſix thouſand Men, and for that reaſon ſeveral adviſed him to decline fighting till the reſt of the Troops which were expected, had joined him. But he was of another opinion. As he could not believe that the Earl of Lincoln had formed ſuch an enterprize, without aſſurances of being aſſiſted, he judged it requiſite to give him Battle without delay. Two days after he ſaw his Army reinforced with five or ſix thouſand men (2), whereupon all the reaſons againſt the reſolution, he had taken, entirely vaniſhed. As ſoon as he had reviewed theſe new Troops, he detached ſeveral parties of Light-Horſe to diſcover the Earl of Lincoln's deſigns, and being informed, he was advancing towards Newark, reſolved to prevent him. To that end he marched with ſuch expedition, that he encamped between the Enemies Army and Newark. The Earl of Lincoln advanced that day to a little Village called Stoke, where he encamped on the ſide of a Hill. Next Morning being June the 6th (3), Henry offered him Battle, leaving only in the Plain a ſpace to ſerve for the field. But he was debarred of one great advantage, in that the ground being narrow, would not allow him to extend the Front of his Army, which was more numerous than that of the Enemy. For which reaſon he was forced to draw up his Army into three lines, having taken care to place in the firſt all his beſt Troops to the number of ſix thouſand Men. Probably the Earl of Lincoln had deſignedly choſen that ground, in hopes, that if he could defeat the King's firſt line, they would fall foul on the reſt of the Army and put them in diſorder, as it happened to Richard III in the Battle of Boſworth. In effect, it was the King's firſt line only that fought. They ſtood for three Hours the efforts of the Germans, who being uſed to War, and well diſciplined, fought with great order, and inſpired the Iriſh with Courage. At length the Earls of Lincoln and Kildare (4), and Martin Swart being ſlain on the place, and moſt of the Germans killed or wounded, the Iriſh took to flight, not being able alone to reſiſt the Engliſh. It is ſaid, there were at leaſt four thouſand killed on the ſide of the Rebels, and half of the King's firſt line. Which ſhows with what obſtinacy it was fought on both ſides (5).

Earl of Lincoln ſlain. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

Among the Priſoners were found the new King of Ireland, become Lambert Simnel as before, and the Prieſt his Companion and Inſtructor. Henry, either out of Generoſity or Policy, was pleaſed to give Simnel his life, and to honour, with the office of Turn-ſpit in his Kitchen, the Perſon that had boldly aſpired to the Throne, and even worn a Crown. Some time after he was preferred to be one of the King's Faulconers [in which office he died.] As for the Prieſt, he was immediately committed cloſe Priſoner, and heard of no more. Some imagined he was privately put to death, others that the King was pleaſed to ſpare his life, in order to learn the moſt ſecret circumſtances of the conſpiracy, and it may be, to confront him with the guilty, if there was occaſion. However it does not appear in Hiſtory, that Henry made any diſcovery by that means. At leaſt, there was nothing divulged. If the Queen Dowager was in the Plot, ſhe could not be more rigorouſly puniſhed than ſhe was already, unleſs ſhe was brought to the Scaffold. As for the Ducheſs of Burgundy, ſhe had no occaſion to fear any Proceedings againſt her. It is ſaid the King was extremely ſorry for the death of the Earl of Lincoln, which robbed him of the ſatisfaction of knowing all the particulars of the Plot. As for the Lord Lovel, ſome ſay he was drowned in attempting to ſwim the Trent, others affirm, he was ſlain in the Battle. Some again report, that he ſpent the reſidue of his life in a Cave. Be this as it will, he appeared no more from that time.

The Lord Lovel appears no more. Hall. Bacon.

Preſently after the Battle, the King marched to Lincoln, where he made ſome ſtay, and then went to York. In his way, were tried many perſons accuſed of holding intelligence with the late Rebels. It is true, moſt of them were puniſhed only by Fines, the King's ſole aim being to fill his Coffers. And therefore he choſe rather that theſe Trials ſhould be ended by Commiſſioners of his own appointing, or by a Court Martial, than by the uſual courſe of Juſtice, which was not ſo favorable to his deſign. For, in accuſations of this Nature, the Laws of England admit of no medium between death and abſolute diſcharge, and the King would have neither. But Commiſſioners and Court Martials are not ſo ſtrictly confined to the Letter of the Law (6), but judge in a more arbitrary manner. Therefore the frequent incroachment, of what is called in England the Martial Law, upon the privileges of the People, has been the cauſe of reducing it within juſt bounds, ſo that it cannot take place but by an Act of Parliament made for that purpoſe (7). As for adminiſtring juſtice by Commiſſioners, it is true the King has ſtill that prerogative, but then he ſeldom uſes it, and in certain caſes only by Commiſſions of Oyer and Terminer (8) as they are called. It is certain, Henry upon this occaſion diſcovered his covetous and ſelfiſh Temper. He pretended to favour the guilty in ſparing their lives: But this Clemency was more than balanced by his ſeverity, in ſtripping them of their poſſeſſions. The crime they were charged with was not of having aſſiſted the Rebels, but of having raiſed and diſperſed a report ſome days before the Battle, that the Royal Army was cut in pieces. The King ſuppoſing that ſuch a report was ſpread only to diſcourage his friends, and hinder them from bringing him Troops, made ſtrict Inquiry after thoſe that were ſuſpected of this new ſort of crime. As his ſole aim was to make an advantage of the Fines and Confiſcations, the perſons commiſſioned for Judges were more ready and leſs ſcrupulous to favour his deſign, than if the lives of the parties accuſed had been at ſtake. It may be eaſily gueſſed the King made choice of the fitteſt perſons for his purpoſe. His Hiſtorian ſays, that Henry's progreſs to Lincoln and York, was more like an itinerary Circuit of Juſtice, than a King's progreſs to viſit his Counties.

When the King had drawn what he wanted from the guilty or ſuſpected perſons, he ſent for a papal commiſſion, to impower the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to abſolve thoſe that had incurred the Penalty of Excommunication decreed by the Bull before-mentioned. The Pope in this Commmiſſion took for granted, that they who had attempted to diſturb Henry in the poſſeſſion of the Crown, were ſtruck with bitter remorſe, and therefore he was willing, from a motive of charity, to eaſe their conſcience. But it was evident, that this was only for a further Support of the King's title.

That as for Debtors who had taken Sanctuary to defraud their Creditors, their perſons only ſhould be protected, but their goods out of Sanctuary ſhould be liable to ſeizure. As for Traitors, the King was allowed to appoint them Keepers in their Sanctuaries to prevent their eſcape. Certainly it was a great abuſe to make Churches ſerve to protect Villains. The Queen is crowned. Nov. 25. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

In the King's progreſs to Lincoln and York, he had frequent occaſion to perceive that his partiality to the Houſe of York, and injurious Treatment of his Queen in refuſing to have her crowned, were the main Springs of the People's diſcontent. So, contrary to his inclination, and with a ſole view to prevent future troubles, he reſolved at laſt to do her that Juſtice. He came to London the beginning of November, where he made a triumphant entry. Next day he went in Proceſſion to St. Paul's, and had Te Deum ſung for his victory over the Rebels. He was very glad to render it as conſpicuous as poſſible, in order to ſtrike terror into his Enemies. Then he commiſſioned the Duke of Bedford to execute the office of High-Steward at the Queen's Coronation, which was performed on the 25th of November, with the uſual Solemnities. The Queen was then one and twenty years old, and had now been married two years. So the King's affected delay of her Coronation, could not but be deemed a conſequence of a ſettled deſign to humble the Houſe of York, and the Queen in particular, whom the King conſidered as his Rival. Accordingly, as it was eaſily perceived, that his reſolution to have her crowned immediately after Simnel's Affair, was the effect of his fear, he was not thanked for it, becauſe he was believed to do it with regret. He likewiſe releaſed the Marquiſs of Dorſet without examination, probably to give the People ſome ſatisfaction. He intended to have it thought an Act of Grace, and withal to leave the Marquiſs in the fear of being ſtill called to an account. But it is to be preſumed, that ſince he was ſo little inclined to ſhow mercy to the Yorkiſts, he would not have diſcharged the Marquiſs ſo eaſily, had there been proofs to convict him.

Troubles in Scotland. Buchanan. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

During the King's ſtay at York (1), after the Battle of Stoke, publick diſturbances in Scotland gave him an opportunity to enter into a Negotiation with James III, from which he hoped to reap ſome advantage. I have ſpoken of James's Character in the Reign of Edward IV, and ſhown how odious he had rendered himſelf to his great Men, even to their being forced to hang his Favorites. The War made upon him by Edward IV, and his danger of being dethroned, ſeemed to have ſomething moderated his paſſions, or at leaſt, obliged him to ſhow them leſs. But the Death of Prince Alexander his Brother, and of Edward IV, and the troubles in England during the Reign of Richard III, giving room to believe he had nothing more to fear, he returned to his former courſes. Without reflecting any more on the risk he had run, he entirely gave himſelf up to a new Sett of Favorites, Men of mean Birth, and no leſs odious to the Nation than the former. But this was a trifle in compariſon of the deſign he afterwards formed. As he harboured in his Breaſt a violent deſire of revenge upon the great Men who had offended him, he reſolved to diſpatch at once all thoſe whom he conſidered as his principal Enemies. To that end he careſſed them exceedingly, and became very familiar with them, the better to ſurpriſe them. When by this diſſimulation he had drawn almoſt all of them to Court, he communicated his deſign to the Earl of Douglaſs, and told him, he did not intend to neglect ſo fair an opportunity of deſtroying all his Enemies at once. Douglaſs feigned to approve his reſolution, but privately warned the Lords of their danger, and retired with them from Court. The King being diſappointed, reſolved to execute his deſign by open force, and levied Troops for that purpoſe, but the Lords likewiſe armed for their defence. As all mutual confidence was deſtroyed, and nothing to be expected from an agreement with ſuch a Prince, they found means to gain his Son, by making him apprehenſive, they were going to deliver Scotland to the King of England, if he would not put himſelf at their head. As ſoon as the Prince had joined the Lords, their party grew ſo powerful, that the King beginning to repent his enterprize, propoſed an agreement. But he was told, there was no other way to a reconciliation than the King's reſignation of the Crown to his Son. All hopes of Peace vaniſhing upon this propoſal, James ſhut himſelf up in the Caſtle of Edinburgh, from whence he diſpatched Ambaſſadors to the Pope, and the Kings of France and England, to deſire their aſſiſtance.

1487. It was in September, whilſt Henry was at York, that the Ambaſſadors of Scotland came to him, under colour of treating of ſome differences concerning the Fiſhery of the river Eske. Henry, who had an admirable talent at turning all things to his advantage, thought this a good opportunity to be rid at once of the Queen his Mother-in-law, and her two Daughters, by marrying them in Scotland. For that purpoſe he ſent to King James, Richard Fox Biſhop of Exeter, and Sir Richard Edgecomb, who agreed with him (2) upon the following articles, with their Maſter's pleaſure.

IV. That the King of England ſhould reſign for ever to the King of Scotland, the Town of Berwick.

V. That, in order to ſettle the Articles and Conditions of the three Marriages, Commiſſioners on both ſides ſhould meet at Edinburgh the 24th of January next, and another aſſembly be held upon the ſame ſubject in May.

VI. That the two Kings ſhall have an interview in July.

VII. Laſtly, That the Truce concluded between the two Kingdoms, being to expire July the 3d, 1488, ſhould be prolonged to the 1ſt of September 1489.

As for the ſuccours which James expected from Henry, they were not mentioned in theſe Preliminaries. Probably, King James's Ambaſſadors were ſatisfied with a verbal promiſe.

Henry ratified theſe Articles, the 20th of December, but the King of Scotland's ratification is not with Henry's in the Collection of the Publick Acts. Perhaps James was prevented by the troubles in his Kingdom, which daily increaſed, and cauſed likewiſe this project to vaniſh into air, as will be ſeen under the next year. p. 331.

Affairs of the Low-Countries. P. Daniel.

The War continued all this time in the Low-Countries, between Charles VIII and Maximilian, to the advantage of the firſt, whoſe Troops ſurprized St. Omer, and Terouenne. Some time after, Maximilian having cauſed the Lord Ruffingheim to be carried away and conducted to Wilvorde, the Priſoner found means to eſcape and retire to Gaunt. Upon his arrival, he ſtirred up the Gantois to revolt, and take arms againſt Maximilian. This war was of very great Conſequence with regard to the affairs of Bretagne, of which it is neceſſary at preſent to give a particular, though brief account, becauſe they are to be the ſubject of the Hiſtory of the five following years.

Affairs of Bretagne. Argentre. Hall. Bacon.

The King of France, and the Lords of Bretagne had treated together with very different views. The Lords imagined, it was an excellent means to ſecure them from the deſigns of their Duke, and Charles perceived, it was an infallible way to conquer Bretagne.

Charles VIII makes great Progreſs in Bretagne.

In the beginning of the Spring 1487, Charles ſent four armies into Bretagne, from four different quarters. The firſt alone was ſix thouſand ſtrong, which exceeded already the number he had promiſed to find by the Treaty. Upon news of this Invaſion, the Duke of Bretagne ſeeing himſelf forſaken by almoſt all his Barons, retired into the Center of his Country, being accompanied by the Duke of Orleans, the Prince of Orange, the Earl of Dunois, and ſome other French Lords of the Duke of Orleans's Party. He ſtaid ſome time at Maletroit, where he very haſtily aſſembled an army of ſixteen thouſand Men, ill-armed, and undiſciplined, by reaſon of the long Peace Bretagne had enjoyed.

The Duke's Court was in ſo great Conſternation, that none knew what courſe to take to reſiſt ſo formidable an Invaſion. Indeed, means were found to engage the Lord d' Albret, then in Navarre, to take the Duke's part, on promiſe of a Marriage with the Princeſs Ann, Heireſs of Bretagne. The Duke himſelf, and all the reſt of the Lords, the Duke of Orleans excepted, gave it under their hands to procure him this Marriage, but without intention to perform their word. The Duke of Bretagne did not think him conſiderable enough for his Daughter. The Earl of Dunois deſigned to marry the young Princeſs to the Duke of Orleans, and the Prince of Orange was privately labouring to procure this rich match for the King of the Romans. Thus this engagement was only intended to perſwade the Lord d' Albret to withdraw two 1487. Troops of Men at Arms, which he had in the French Army, and ſend them into the Duke of Bretagne's Service. Poor refuge upon ſo preſſing an occaſion!

Mean while, the French being joined in one body, advanced into the Country, and laid Siege to Ploermel. The Duke of Bretagne immediately marched to the relief of that place, but had the mortification to ſee himſelf forſaken by his army, of which there remained not with him above four thouſand Men. Surprized at this unexpected accident, he retired to Vannes. But the French, now maſters of Ploermel, purſued him ſo briskly, that he was obliged to embark in great diſorder, and ſhut himſelf up in Nantz. The French improving this Conſternation, took Vannes and Dinant, and then beſieged Nantz. Some time before, the Duke had ſent the Earl of Dunois to England to deſire aſſiſtance. But though the Earl had embarked four ſeveral times, contrary winds had ſtill hindered him from purſuing his Voyage. Mean while, the Marſhal de Rieux head of the Male-contents, perceiving King Charles ſo ill obſerved the Treaty, complained of it in ſtrong terms. But inſtead of receiving any ſatisfaction, he was told, that great offence was taken at his boldneſs.

Embaſſy of France to Henry about Bretagne. Faon. Hall. Hollingſh.

Whilſt Charles was employed in the Siege of Nantz, he heard, the King of England had obtained a ſignal Victory over his enemies, and the affair of the pretended Earl of Warwick was entirely ended. 'Till then he had believed him ſo embarraſſed at home, that he had not vouchſafed to ſay any thing to him concerning the war with Bretagne. But when he knew him freed from his troubles, he ſent Ambaſſadors to try to divert him from any deſign he might have to interpoſe in that affair.

The French Ambaſſadors diſcourſe to the King.

The Ambaſſadors found the King at Leiceſter, where they had their Audience. They told him, that the King their maſter conſidering him as his beſt friend, had ſent them to impart to him the Succeſs of his arms in Flanders, and withal to congratulate him upon his Victory over his rebellious Subjects: That they were moreover charged to tell him, that the King their maſter was forced to enter into a juſt war with the Duke of Bretagne, who had received the Duke of Orleans, declared enemy of France, not to protect him, but ſolely with a view to aid him to raiſe Commotions in the Kingdom, by lending him the aſſiſtance of his arms: That the King of France could not omit taking proper meaſures to prevent his pernicious deſigns, and therefore his war with the Duke of Bretagne was properly defenſive only, though he had cauſed an army to enter his Dominions: That he that gave the firſt blow, was not to be deemed the Aggreſſor, but he that gave the Provocation: That the Duke of Bretagne could not deny that he had harboured in his Dominions, nay, in his very Court, French Rebels, and formed plots with them very prejudicial to France, without being able to complain of any injury: That therefore the King their maſter hoped from his Wiſdom and Juſtice, that before he concerned himſelf in the war, he would weigh the ill Conſequences of a Protection given to rebellious Subjects, contrary to the Law of Nations, and the moſt ſolemn Treaties, particularly by a Homager: That if he was ſomething obliged to the Duke of Bretagne, on the other hand, he had not, doubtleſs, forgot the aid he had received from the King of France, when the Duke of Bretagne had not only abandoned him, but was even going to deliver him to his enemy: That this aid was given contrary to the Intereſt of France, ſince it would be better for her, that a Tyrant, odious to all his Subjects, ſhould reign in England, than ſuch a Prince as himſelf: That therefore, the King their maſter hoped, he would not undertake the defence of the Duke of Bretagne in ſo ill-grounded a quarrel, but on the contrary, aſſiſt his real friend, or at leaſt, ſtand neuter.

The King's Anſwer. Hall. Bacon.

The Ambaſſadors avoiding, as a rock, to ſpeak of their maſter's deſign to conquer Bretagne, the King thought not proper to mention it in his anſwer, though it was not difficult to perceive it through all their diſguiſes. He contented himſelf with telling them, that of all perſons, he was moſt obliged to the King of France, and the Duke of Bretagne. For which reaſon he was extremely deſirous to give them both real marks of his Gratitude. That therefore he would, on the preſent occaſion, diſcharge the duty of a true friend, by endeavouring amicably to end their differences, and very ſpeedily ſend them Ambaſſadors to offer his mediation.

The King has a wrong Notion of the War of Bretagne. Ibid.

Henry was not ſo blind, but he ſaw the King of France's intent. But unhappily for Bretagne, he was poſſeſſed with a notion, that Charles would never be able to execute his deſigns. His belief was founded upon the Forces of Bretagne, which had hitherto ſucceſsfully reſiſted France; upon the natural Levity of the French, who are eaſily diſcouraged by difficulties; upon the troubles the Duke of Orleans could raiſe in the Kingdom, by means of his friends; and upon the diverſion, the King of the Romans could make in Flanders. Purſuant to this principle, which appeared afterwards to be very wrong, he reſolved to become only Mediator, without ſending any effective Supplies to the Duke of Bretagne. He did not doubt that King Charles would conſent to an accommodation, for fear of drawing upon him the arms of England. Indeed, it was evidently the Intereſt of the Engliſh to prevent the ruin of Bretagne, and therefore Charles muſt have thought, they would uſe their utmoſt endeavours to oppoſe his deſign. Accordingly, Henry building upon this foundation, that Bretagne could not be ſubdued, if England ſeriouſly eſpouſed her quarrel, and that Charles would not believe him ſo impolitick as to ſuffer that Duchy to become a Province of France, imagined he would readily accept of his mediation, and deſiſt from his enterprize. He hoped to reap from thence two conſiderable advantages. Firſt, the reputation of making Peace between the two Princes, to whom he was equally obliged. The ſecond was much more important to him. As he was naturally very covetous, and as the deſire of heaping up riches was the chief end of all his projects, he perceived this affair would furniſh an occaſion to demand money of the Parliament, under colour of aſſiſting Bretagne, and that he might keep this money without employing it (1). 1487.

He offers his Mediation to both the Princes. Charles accepts of it. Hall. Bacon. Stow.

Purſuant to this ſcheme, he ſent Ambaſſadors (2) to King Charles to offer his mediation, and in caſe it was accepted, the Ambaſſadors had orders to make the ſame offer to the Duke of Bretagne. Charles was then employed in the Siege of Nantz, and as he hoped to be ſoon maſter of the place, ſaw nothing more after that, capable of hindering him from entirely conquering Bretagne. So, all his endeavours tended only to manage, that the King of England ſhould not aſſiſt the Duke of Bretagne before the taking of Nantz. When the Ambaſſadors offered him the mediation of the King their maſter, he anſwered with great diſſimulation, he willingly conſented, that the King of England ſhould act not only as mediator between him and the Duke of Bretagne, but alſo as judge, and abſolute arbiter of the peace. He was in hopes, either the Duke of Bretagne would reject this propoſal, or if he accepted it, he ſhould poſſibly gain time till the taking of Nantz; after which, he conſidered himſelf as maſter of Bretagne.

The Duke rejects it. Hall.

The Ambaſſadors imagining they had ſurmounted the greateſt difficulty, repaired to the Duke of Bretagne, who was ſhut up in Nantz, and made him the ſame offer from their maſter. The Duke of Orleans told them in the name of that Prince, that at a time when his Country was invaded, and ready to be ſwallowed up by the French, he expected rather an effective ſupply from the King of England, than a mediation, which muſt be fruitleſs, ſince nothing was more eaſy than to prolong the Negotiation till Bretagne was loſt: That he intreated the King to remember the favours he had received in Bretagne, and conſider of what conſequence it was to England to hinder that Dukedom from becoming a Province of France. The Ambaſſadors returning with this anſwer to King Charles, he took occaſion to tell them, that for his part, he was very deſirous of Peace, as plainly appeared by his propoſal, but was ſorry to find that the Duke of Bretagne, beſet by the Duke of Orleans, would never conſent, without being forced by the continuation of the War. This he artfully inſtilled into the Ambaſſadors, who at their return into England, told the King, it was proper to leave the Duke of Bretagne in his preſent ill circumſtances, that he might be induced of himſelf to deſire the rejected Mediation.

Charles makes this Refuſal turn to his advantage.

The Earl of Dunois cauſes the Siege of Nantz to be raiſed.

Mean while, the Siege of Nantz was vigorouſly carried on (3). Charles, probably, would have at laſt taken the place, had not the Earl of Dunois been detained in lower Bretagne by contrary Winds. Whilſt he was in thoſe parts, the Inhabitants of the Country hearing their Duke was beſieged in Nantz, aſſembled to the number of ſixty thouſand Men, with a reſolution to relieve him. The Earl of Dunois perceiving them in this diſpoſition, put himſelf at their head, and approached Nantz, the French not daring to attack the undiſciplined multitude. On the contrary, they contracted their quarters for their Accordingly, Henry diſpatched the Abbot of Abingdon, Sir Richard Edgecombe, and Chriſtopher Urſwick to France. Hall, fol. 13. Bacon, p. 590. Hollingſhead, p. 1432.

This ſo ſeaſonable a relief, obliged the French to retire, in deſpair of taking the place. The raiſing of the Siege confirmed Henry in his belief, that the conqueſt of Bretagne was too difficult for France. So, perſiſting ſtill in his reſolution to ſtand neuter, he had not even the thought of ſending ſuccours to the Duke of Bretagne. He pretended however, to have his intereſt at heart; but it was only to procure a Subſidy from the Parliament, which he had ſummoned for the 9th of November. Mean while, he ſent again the ſame Ambaſſadors to King Charles and the Duke of Bretagne, under colour of being perfectly informed of the ſtate of this affair, in order to lay it before the Parliament, though he knew beforehand what anſwer they were to bring back.

Henry is confirmed in his wrong notion of the Affair of Bretagne.

Hall.

About this time Edward Lord Woodville, the Queen's Uncle, deſired the King's licenſe to go and ſerve the Duke of Bretagne with a Troop of Voluntiers. Henry denied his requeſt, not thinking proper to aid one of the parties when he was offering them his mediation. Nevertheleſs Woodville failed from the Iſle of Wight [of which he was Governour,] with four hundred Men into Bretagne. This aid, though inconſiderable, made a great noiſe at the Court of France. Charles publickly complained of it; but as Henry denied that the Lord Woodville had carried theſe Troops to the Duke with his conſent, was contented with that ſatisfaction. He was very careful, at ſuch a juncture, not to quarrel with Henry for ſo ſmall a matter.

The Lords of Bretagne are reconciled to the Duke. June 20.

Before the Engliſh Ambaſſadors arrived in Bretagne, there had been in that Country a revolution prejudicial to the King of France's affairs. The Lords of Bretagne who had treated with him, plainly perceiving his intention was to conquer the Duchy, made their peace with the Duke, and obtained a full pardon. The Marſhal de Rieux, their head, was the laſt to comply. He would firſt be thoroughly convinced of the French King's deſigns, which yet he only ſuſpected. For that purpoſe, after privately treating with the Duke of Orleans, he ſent a meſſenger to the King to tell him, that the Duke of Orleans offered to quit Bretagne with all his followers; and therefore, ſince the French Troops had entered Bretagne only to expel that Prince, he moſt humbly beſought him to recall them, purſuant to his Treaty with the Barons. Ann of Beaujeu, who was haughty and proud, imagining there was no need of any farther ceremony, told the meſſenger, the King had gone too far to recede, and would ſee the iſſue of the affair. This anſwer obliged the Marſhal to follow the example of the reſt of the Barons, and be reconciled to the Duke, who gave him the command of his Army.

The French take Dol.

Though Charles had raiſed the Siege of Nantz, he continued his conqueſts elſewhere. Soon after his Troops took the Town of Dol by ſtorm; whereupon the Duke not thinking himſelf ſafe in Nantz, thought fit to retire to Rennes. He ſaw himſelf extremely preſſed, and yet did not hear that preparations were any where making for his relief. In this extremity, he was perſuaded by the Prince of Orange, to promiſe Ann his eldeſt Daughter to the King of the Romans, though he had already promiſed her to the Lord d'Albret. The Prince of Orange made him believe that Maximilian, finding himſelf concerned to defend Bretagne, would not fail to come to his aſſiſtance with a powerful Army. But at this very time, the revolt of the Gantois diſabled that Prince to do any thing for Bretagne.

Henry's Ambaſſadors diſcover the King of France's deſigns. Hall. Bacon.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed, Henry's Ambaſſadors in Bretagne had frequent opportunities to be convinced that Charles was only amuſing the King their maſter, and intended to conquer that Duchy. Henry knew this ſtill better than they; but was willing, their report ſhould ſerve for foundation to demand a Subſidy for the defence of Bretagne, though he ſtill believed the affair might be adjuſted, without drawing the Sword. His ſole aim was to make the Parliament apprehenſive of the loſs of Bretagne, that they might more readily ſupply him with money, which he intended to put entirely into his Coffers. 1487.

The Parliament meets.

The Parliament met the 9th of November, juſt after the return of the Ambaſſadors. Care had been taken to divulge the report they had brought to the King, to prepare the Commons to make a powerful effort in the defence of Bretagne. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury (1) as Lord Chancellor, opened the Seſſion with a Speech to both Houſes to this effect:

The Chancellor's Speech. Bacon.

" That the King thanked his Parliament for the Acts " paſſed in his favour at their laſt meeting: That he was " ſo well ſatisfied of their affection, that he had made it a " rule to himſelf to communicate to ſo good ſubjects all " affairs, as well foreign as domeſtick, that might happen, " and that one now occurred, concerning which he deſired " to have their advice.

" That the King of France (as no doubt they had heard) " was making fierce War upon the Duke of Bretagne: " That he alledged for reaſon the protection given by the " Duke of Bretagne to the Duke of Orleans; but others " gueſſed a very different motive: That both parties had " applied to the King, one to pray him to ſtand neuter, the other to deſire a powerful aid: That the King " having offered his mediation, found the French King " ready to treat, but without diſcontinuing the War: " That the Duke on the contrary, though he was very " deſirous of peace, and moſt wanted it, was averſe to a " Negotiation, not upon confidence of his own ſtrength, " but upon diſtruſt of the French Court's ſincerity: That " after ſundry Embaſſies tending to an amicable determination of this affair, the King had deſiſted from his mediation, becauſe he could neither remove the Duke of " Bretagne's diſtruſt, nor perſuade the King of France to " ceaſe Hoſtilities during the Treaty: That this being " the ſtate of the caſe, he deſired their advice, whether " he ſhould ſend ſuccours to the Duke of Bretagne, " and enter into a defenſive league with him againſt " France."

After thus ſtating the queſtion, he alledged ſeveral arguments pro and con, his aim being, under colour of leaving the Parliament free to determine what they ſhould judge proper, to make them ſenſible of the neceſſity of aiding Bretagne. This neceſſity was in effect ſo evident, that there was need but of a very moderate knowledge of the intereſts of the State, to ſee of what conſequence it was to England to prevent the conqueſt of Bretagne. However, it is worth noting, that the King knowing how much it concerned the Engliſh to defend Bretagne, alledged theſe reaſons by the mouth of his Chancellor, only to obtain a Subſidy, without intending however, to employ it in ſupport of the oppreſſed Prince. This will plainly appear in his whole future conduct. The Parliament, according to the King's expectation, failed not to adviſe him to undertake the defence of the Duke of Bretagne, and granted him for that purpoſe as large a Subſidy as had ever been given to any former King (2) on account of a foreign War (3).

As ſoon as the Parliament broke up, Henry reſumed the way of Negotiation with Charles, ſtill fancying that the terrour of his Arms would lead that Prince to an agreement. The only means however to ſave Bretagne, was to ſend thither a ſtrong aid, and declare War with France, according to the Parliament's intention. But Henry had laid another plan, founded wholly upon his extreme deſire that the affair might be decided, without his being forced to expend the money lately received. He was content therefore with ſending Ambaſſadors to King Charles, to notify to him the Parliament's reſolu-

The other remarkable Statutes now enacted were theſe: 1. Charles's Anſwer.

The Court of France eaſily perceived by theſe proceedings, that the King of England had no great deſire vigorouſly to puſh this affair, ſince, when he ſhould have been preparing for War, he contented himſelf with ſending Ambaſſies. So, Charles told the Ambaſſadors, that he was always ready to accept of the King of England for Arbiter of the differences between him and the Duke of Bretagne; but did not intend to ſuffer himſelf to be amuſed with a Treaty, which would only ſerve to give the Duke time and opportunity to reſtore his affairs. That he ſhould be always willing to treat, provided it was not meant to require a Truce deſtructive of his intereſts.

1488. The Duke of Bretagne makes ſome progreſs. Argentré. Mezer. i.

The Winter procured the Duke of Bretagne a ceſſation of Arms, which all the inſtances of the King of England had not been able to obtain, as it obliged the King of France to put his Troops into quarters, and return to Paris. Moreover in March 1488, the Marſhal de Rieux retook Vannes and Dinant, and garriſoned Ancennis and Chateaubriant. On the other hand, the Lord d'Albret's two Troops of Men at Arms deſerted the French ſervice, and joined the Duke's Army. But this little turn of fortune was of no long continuance. In April the King took the field again, and having retaken Ancennis and Chateaubriant, razed them to the ground. After that, he marched to Fougeres, and beſieged at once that place and St. Aubin du Cormier.

Charles beſieges Fougeres and St. Aubin.

The Lord d'Albret arrives in Bretagne, and preſſes the Duke about his Marriage. The Duke evades his demand.

Mean time, the Lord d'Albret having accepted the propoſal made him in the beginning of the War, came into Bretagne to ſerve the Duke with a thouſand Horſe. Upon his arrival, he preſſed the Duke to perform his promiſe concerning the marriage. The Duke, who had privately promiſed his Daughter to Maximilian, being greatly embaraſſed, put the young Princeſs upon declaring, ſhe would never eſpouſe the Lord d'Albret, tho' ſhe was not then above eleven years old. This oppoſition gave the Duke a pretence to elude d'Albret's purſuits, till the Princeſs's obſtinacy could be conquered.

He ſues for Peace to the King of France.

Mean while, the unfortunate Duke finding himſelf little able to reſiſt the French, and receiving aſſiſtance neither from Maximilian nor the King of England, ſent the Earl of Dunois to Charles to ſue for peace. Charles did not think fit to return a poſitive anſwer. He was willing firſt to ſee the ſucceſs of his two Sieges. On the other hand, he was in Treaty with Henry for a Truce which he expected ſhortly to conclude; and that was to determine him, either to refuſe peace to the Duke, or enter into Treaty with him. So, keeping the Earl of Dunois ſtill at Court, under divers pretences, he put him off from day to day, till he had received certain advice from England. Shortly after, he heard that Henry had ſigned at Windſor a Truce, to commence the 14th of July this year, and to end the 17th of January 1490. Thus having nothing to fear from England, he wholly applied himſelf to continue his conqueſts.

New Truce between France and England. Act. Pub. XII. p. 337, 344.

Remark on Henry's Conduct,

Moſt certainly Henry, in leaving the Duke of Bretagne to the mercy of his Enemy, acted directly contrary to the Parliament's intention, which had granted him a Subſidy for the aſſiſtance of that Prince. This Truce, made without any neceſſity, when the Duke of Bretagne was moſt preſſed, plainly ſhews, he ſuffered himſelf to be blinded by the Court of France, or rather by the deſire of keeping the money granted by the Parliament for the aid of Bretagne. The Duke's occaſion for a powerful aſſiſtance could not be more preſſing. Charles was in the heart of his Country, at the head of a ſtrong Army, taking his Towns one after another, and he not able to make any reſiſtance. At the ſame time Henry was concluding with France a Truce which tied up his hands, and afforded King Charles time and facility to conquer Bretagne. Wherefore his Hiſtorian, prepoſſeſſed no doubt in his favor, and not imagining, he had thus cauſeleſsly forſaken the poor Duke in his diſtreſs, mentions not this Truce made with France at ſo unſeaſonable a time. Moreover, he makes the Succours ſent by Henry into Bretagne, to arrive there the beginning of Auguſt this year, whereas it is very certain they came not till March ſeven months after. Theſe affected delays, which ſurprized all the world, proceeded wholly from the King's wrong notion of this War, and his deſire to end it, without being obliged to uſe the money given by Parliament.

The Duke of Bretagne refuſes to ſubmit. Argentré. Hall.

Mean time, the Duke of Bretagne, the Duke of Orleans, the Prince of Orange, and the Marſhal de Rieux, were in the utmoſt confuſion. The King of the Romans, the King of England, the Duke of Lorrain, had ſeemed to eſpouſe their quarrel; but it did not appear that any of them were preparing to aſſiſt them. In this extremity, a Council was held to conſider what courſe was to be taken. Moſt were for marching to the relief of Fougeres, and joining Battle rather than ſuffer that place to be loſt. The Marſhal de Rieux oppoſed in vain this dangerous advice, by repreſenting that the loſs of a Battle would infallibly be attended with the ruin of Bretagne. That it would be much wiſer to delay the time till the neighbouring Princes ſhould ſee their own intereſt, ſince it could not but be extremely prejudicial to them to ſuffer Bretagne to be ſwallowed up by France. To this it was replied, that probably Bretagne would be loſt before any Succours arrived, and therefore the only way to ſave it was a victory. The Duke of Bretagne's underſtanding was ſo impaired, that he was little able to judge ſoundly of an Affair of ſuch conſequence. So ſuffering himſelf to be governed by the Counſels of the Duke of Orleans and the Prince of Orange his Nephew, he reſolved to march to the relief of Fougeres. But upon his approach, he found the Town had already capitulated. Then he determined to relieve St. Aubin du Cormier, but the Governor, for want of Proviſions and Ammunition, had ſurrendered a few days before. 1488.

The Duke of Orleans and Prince of Orange are ſuſpected.

Whilſt the Duke of Bretagne was marching to St. Aubin, all the Forces of France joined in one body, under the command of Lewis de Trimouille, for fear the Duke had intended to retake that place. In a few days, the two Armies were ſo near one another, that it was not poſſible to part without giving Battle. Whilſt they were preparing on both ſides, a rumour being ſpread among the Bretons, that the Duke of Orleans and the Prince of Orange were going to betray them, they were upon the point of disbanding. But the two Princes removed their fears, by going amongſt them to charge on foot. The Battle was fought the 28th of July, with fatal ſucceſs to the Duke of Bretagne, who was defeated with the loſs of his beſt Troops. The Duke of Orleans and the Prince of Orange being taken Priſoners, the King commanded the firſt to be confined in the Tower of Bourges, but ſet the other at liberty. The four hundred Engliſh brought over by the Lord Woodville, were almoſt all ſlain with their Leader (1). As the Engliſh were then diſtinguiſhed by a Red-Croſs, twelve hundred (2) Bretons were joined to them with the ſame Badge, to make the French believe, that freſh Succours were arrived from England. It may be, this gave occaſion to ſome to affirm, that King Henry had already ſent a freſh body of Troops to the Duke of Bretagne. The Lord Verulam, who has writ the Hiſtory of this Reign, does not ſay this, but aſſures us, that eight thouſand Engliſh arrived within a few days, and offered the French Battle, who did not think proper to accept it. Polydore Virgil and ſeveral others ſay the ſame thing. But herein they are miſtaken. Henry had not yet made any Treaty with the Duke of Bretagne, and it was not till after the Duke's death, and in March the next year, that he ſent, as will be ſeen, ſix thouſand Men to the Ducheſs his Daughter.

Rennes refuſes to ſurrender.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in Bretagne, Henry was levying in England the money granted by Parliament. That was a principal Affair which he haſtened extremely, on pretence of the Duke of Bretagne's preſſing occaſion for a ſpeedy aſſiſtance. All the Counties, except Yorkſhire, and the Biſhoprick of Durham, readily paid the Tax impoſed by the Parliament. But in theſe parts, where the friends of the Houſe of York were very numerous, it was not collected with the ſame eaſe. Some factious perſons ſtirring up the People, the Commiſſioners for gathering the Subſidy met with ſo much oppoſition, that they were obliged to make application to the Earl of Northumberland (3), who immediately gave the Court notice [and deſired the King's direction.] The King anſwered, he would not have one penny abated of the money granted by Parliament, both by reaſon of the urgent occaſion, and becauſe other Counties might be incouraged to deſire the like mitigation. Upon this anſwer, the Earl of Northumberland aſſembled the principal Juſtices and Free-Holders of the County, and in very imperious Terms declared to them the King's intention. The rough manner in which he ſpoke to them, without ſhewing any regard for perſons who were but too much incenſed, gave them reaſon to think, he himſelf adviſed the King to ſuch an anſwer. This being rumoured in York, the Mob roſe, and aſſaulting the Earl's houſe, forced it open, and murdered him with ſeveral of his Servants. But the Mutineers did not reſt there. Preſently after, being inflamed by one John a Chamber an Incendiary, they ſet Sir John Egremond at their head, and publickly declared they were marching to London to give the King battle.

The Earl of Surrey diſperſes them.

Henry being informed of this Inſurrection, ſent into the North a body of Troops under the command of the Earl of Surrey (1), whom he had releaſed out of the Tower, and received into favour, preparing to follow him in perſon with more conſiderable Forces. But whilſt he was on his way, he heard that Surrey had beaten and diſperſed the Rebels, and John a Chamber was taken Priſoner. As for Egremond, he had the good fortune to eſcape and retire into Flanders to the Ducheſs of Burgundy, whoſe Palace was a Sanctuary to all the King's Enemies. Though this Affair was ended, Henry however purſued his Journey to York, where he ordered John a Chamber to be hanged on a Gibbet raiſed in the midſt of a ſquare Gallows, on which twelve of his Accomplices were hanged round about him. After that, he returned to London, leaving the Earl of Surrey Preſident of the North, and Sir Richard Tunſtal his principal Commiſſioner, to levy the Subſidy, of which he would not remit a denier.

He feigns to be reſolved to aid Bretagne.

Mean time, the news of the Battle of St. Aubin being brought to the King, he ſeemed reſolved to ſend a powerful aid to the Duke of Bretagne. But it was ſtill in hopes that the terror of his Arms would oblige King Charles to conſent to a Peace. This Artifice was not however capable of deceiving the Court of France, which plainly ſaw through all his deſigns.

Sad condition of the Duke of Bretagne. Haræus. Hall. Hollingſh.

The loſs of a Battle had reduced the Duke of Bretagne to a State worthy of pity. He could no longer ſupport himſelf with his own forces alone, and ſaw no preparations for his defence, either in Flanders or England. Henry had put him in hopes of aſſiſtance, but was not in haſte to ſend him any. As for Maximilian, inſtead of being able to aſſiſt his future Father in-law, he was himſelf detained Priſoner in a Sedition againſt him at Bruges, where ſeveral of his Officers were killed. His Captivity laſted from the beginning of January to the 15th of May, and his releaſe then was owing to the Emperor Frederick his Father, who had marched into the Low-Countries at the head of an Army to his relief. So inſtead of thinking to aſſiſt Bretagne, he was himſelf ſeeking on all ſides for foreign Succours againſt the Flemings. To that end, forgetting his engagements with the Duke of Bretagne, he ſent this very year to the King and Queen of Spain, to demand in marriage Iſabella their eldeſt Daughter, and at the ſame time Jane their ſecond Daughter for his Son Philip. The firſt of theſe demands could not be granted, Iſabella being already promiſed to the Prince of Portugal. But the other was effected in time. At laſt in September, Philip de Cleves Lord of Ravenſtein, heading the Gantois and ſurprizing the City of Bruſſels, Maximilian retired into Germany, leaving in the Low-Countries, Albert Duke of Saxony to command in his place, in the name of the Archduke his Son.

Maximilian retires into Germany.

The Duke of Bretagne ſues for Peace. Reaſons why Charles granted it. Hall. Bacon.

There was therefore no appearance of aid for the Duke of Bretagne, either from England or the Low-Countries, or in ſhort, from any other place. In this diſtreſs, the unfortunate Duke humbly ſued to the King of France for peace, who very readily complied with his requeſt, not from a motive of Generoſity, but to put it entirely out of his power to defend himſelf, by cauſing him to loſe the aſſiſtance of the King of England, whoſe intereſt it was to ſupport him. Though Henry had agreed to a Truce with France, which was not to expire till January 1490, Charles was afraid however he would change his mind, and aſſiſt the Duke his Ally with all his Forces next Campain. In order therefore to divert him from this thought, he very willingly concluded a Peace with the Duke of Bretagne, intending to keep it no farther than was conſiſtent with his Intereſts. For in his whole Conduct, with regard to Bretagne, he did not ſeem more ſcrupulous than his Father King Lewis XI was in all his Negotiations.

Charles VIII's Pretenſions. Argentré.

The diſcuſſion of Charles's pretenſions upon Bretagne, delayed for ſome time the concluſion of the Peace which was negotiating at Verger, a Seat belonging to the Marſhal de Rieux, where the King then was. Charles pretending, that after the deceaſe of the Duke of Bretagne, the Guardianſhip of his Daughters belonged to him as Sovereign Lord of the Duchy, this pretenſion was diſputed by the Bretons, who affirmed the Dukes of Bretagne had never done Liege-Homage to the Kings of France, and conſequently they had no right to claim the Guardianſhip in queſtion. It was no favorable Juncture to decide, to the advantage of the Bretons, this ſo long, and as yet undetermined diſpute. But this pretenſion of Charles was a trifle, in compariſon of another of much greater conſequence. He maintained, that the Duchy itſelf belonged to him, by virtue of a certain Grant to King Lewis XI, from the Lady de la Broſſe, Heireſs of the Houſe of Blois, who had formerly diſputed Bretagne with the Anceſtors of Francis II. This was renewing an old quarrel, which had been ended by ſeveral Treaties, and particularly by that of Guerande, whereby the Houſe of Blois relinquiſhed all claim. However, Charles inſiſted not obſtinately upon theſe two Articles, contenting himſelf with having intimated his pretenſions, in order to proſecute them in time and place. So, the Treaty was concluded about the end of Auguſt, importing, that Charles ſhould remain with the places he had conquered, and withdraw his Forces out of the reſt of Bretagne. But he did not intend to obſerve this laſt Article. The Duke ratified the Treaty at Coyron, where he then was, and therefore it is called by the Bretons, the Treaty of Coyron, and by the French, the Treaty of Verger, or Vergy.

Diſſenſions among the Bretons upon the death of the Duke.

A few days after, namely, on the 9th of September, died Francis II, Duke of Bretagne, in a very advanced age, and with his underſtanding ſo impaired, that for ſome years paſt, he had been uncapable of governing the State. Ann his eldeſt Daughter, about twelve years old, ſucceeded him. The Duke her Father had appointed her for Guardian, the Marſhal de Rieux, who was to be aſſiſted by the Earl of Cominge. But Philip de Montauban Chancellor of Bretagne found means to carry away the young Ducheſs to Guerande, where under colour of giving her advice, he made her ſpeak as he pleaſed. This occaſioned between the Marſhal and the Chancellor a quarrel, which proved extremely prejudicial to the Ducheſs, and to all the Bretons in general.

Henry pretends to aid the Ducheſs. Hall.

Henry hearing of the Duke of Bretagne's deceaſe, openly declared, that he conſidered the Intereſt of the young Orphan Ducheſs as his own, and ſeemed to prepare in earneſt to aſſiſt her. But as he knew likewiſe that, a few days before the Duke's death, a proviſional Treaty had been concluded till all the King of France's pretenſions were ſettled, he did not queſtion that the affair would be ended by way of Negotiation. The Buſineſs was only to hinder King Charles from taking advantage of the preſent Conſternation of the Bretons. This he imagined could be effected, by loudly proclaiming his concern for the Ducheſs's affairs. He ſtill believed, Charles feared him, and rather than break with him, would reſign much of his pretenſions. So, his aim was to become arbiter of this difference, and avoid a war which would have forced him to empty his Coffers.

He ſends Embaſſies to ſeveral Courts, Act. Pub. XII. p. 334, 336—355.

For this purpoſe it was that he ſent Ambaſſadors to the King of the Romans, to the Archduke his Son, and to the Kings of Spain and Portugal, to make the King of France believe, he was labouring to form a League againſt him. He ſent alſo an Embaſſy to Charles himſelf (2), to preſs him to end entirely the affair of Bretagne by a Treaty. At the ſame time, he ſent Edgecomb and Ainſe- and offers to aid Ann. p. 348. worth to offer his aſſiſtance to the Ducheſs, and empowered them to promiſe in his name, to find her ſuch a number of Troops, upon ſufficient Security for the re-payment of the Charges. Affairs of Scotland. Buchanan. Hall.

The affair of Bretagne ſo employed the Kings of France and England, that James III could obtain no aſſiſtance from either, againſt the Lords who had the Prince his Son at their head. The Male-contents would have been very glad to decide the quarrel by a battle. But the King ſtill kept in the Caſtle of Edinburgh, where it was not poſſible to force him. Though Charles and Henry had promiſed him aid, they were not very deſirous to eſpouſe his quarrel. Mean while, he was ſtill in hopes, and therefore kept cloſe, expecting the performance of their promiſe.

Whilſt his affairs were in this ſituation, he was adviſed to quit the Caſtle of Edinburgh for Sterling as the more convenient place, and there expect the foreign ſuccours. James taking this advice, began his march with his few Troops, and preſently the Lords were cloſe after him. He was however far enough before them to be ſecure, if the Governor of Sterling, bribed by his enemies, had not refuſed him admittance. So, not knowing where to go, he reſolved to return to Edinburgh; but meeting the Army of the Male-contents, was forced to fight, though much inferior in number of Troops. He was killed in the Battle which was fought in the month of June. After his death, James IV, his eldeſt Son, about 1489. On the 10th of February 1489, the Ambaſſadors, ſent into Bretagne, concluded a Treaty with the Ducheſs, of which the principal article was, that the King ingaged to ſend into Bretagne an aid of ſix thouſand Men. To conſider this alone, one would be apt to imagine, Henry acted only from a principle of generoſity, or at leaſt for the intereſt of his Kingdom. But he had no ſuch thought. His ſole aim was firſt to hinder Bretagne from being over-run by a ſudden invaſion of the French, in order to give room for a Treaty. In the next place, to draw a pecuniary advantage from the ſuccours, ſent the Ducheſs, the expences whereof he was willing to advance, in order to be afterwards re-paid with uſury. As this Treaty manifeſtly ſhows his intereſted views in this affair, it will not be improper to inſert the ſubſtance of each article: Which added to what will be ſaid hereafter, will ſerve in great meaſure to give a juſt idea of this Prince's character.

Henry's aim in his Treaty with Ann.

Treaty of Redon. Act. Pub. XII. p. 362.

I. The antient Treaties between England and Bretagne ſhall be obſerved.

II. There ſhall be a conſtant friendſhip and alliance between the King of England and the Ducheſs of Bretagne.

III. They ſhall mutually aſſiſt one another in caſe either is attacked.

IV. If the King ſhall carry War into France for the recovery of Guienne and Normandy, the Ducheſs ſhall find him Troops according to her power.

V. The King ſhall alſo aid the Ducheſs, if ſhe carries the War into France for the recovery of her right, without prejudice however to the Truce concluded between England and France, which is not to expire till the 17th of January 1490.

VI. Neither of the two parties ſhall admit into his Dominions the rebellious Subjects of the other.

VII. The King ſhall ſend the Ducheſs at his own charge an aid of ſix thouſand Men; upon condition, that a ſufficient number of theſe Troops be allotted to guard the cautionary Towns hereafter mentioned, which ſhall be delivered to the King. But the number ſhall not exceed five hundred.

VIII. Theſe ſix thouſand Men ſhall ſerve the Ducheſs at the King's expence till the firſt of November.

IX. Immediately after that day the Ducheſs ſhall find Ships with all neceſſaries, to tranſport the Troops into England.

X. The ſix thouſand Men ſhall be embarked at Portſmouth about the middle of this inſtant February, or at fartheſt, by the end of the ſaid month, upon Veſſels provided by the Ducheſs.

XI. The Ducheſs ingages to repay the King all his expences, for the tranſportation of the Troops both out and home, and for their maintenance whilſt in her ſervice, as alſo for the defence of the cautionary Towns hereafter mentioned.

XII. The Re-imburſement ſhall be made in England.

XIII. It may be made at ſeveral payments; the cautionary Towns remaining in the King's hands till the whole is paid.

XIV. Immediately after the arrival of the ſix thouſand Men in Bretagne, the Ducheſs ſhall deliver any two of the following places the King ſhall chuſe, Tonclaromneau, Hennebond, Avray, Vannes, Guerande, with all their revenues, to be kept till the King is fully repaid, without any deduction, and then only ſhall he be obliged to reſtore them.

XV. If the King carries War into France upon his own account, and the Ducheſs find him ſuccours, her expences ſhall be deducted out of what ſhe ſhall owe the King. In like manner if the King aid the Ducheſs in an offenſive War with France, ſhe ſhall re-pay his charges upon that occaſion.

XVI. If any of the places now poſſeſſed by the King of France be re-taken, the King ſhall have liberty to chuſe one or two of theſe places, in the room of one or two of thoſe which ſhall then be in his hands. Upon condition however that he chuſe not Breſt and Tonclaromneau at the ſame time.

XVII. Two Commiſſioners ſhall be appointed on each ſide, to ſettle the King's expences for the aſſiſtance of Bretagne.

XVIII. The Ducheſs ſhall ſwear before the Engliſh Ambaſſadors, that ſhe will not demand again the cautionary Towns till the whole Debt be paid. The Marſhall of Bretagne with three or four of the principal Lords ſhall take the ſame Oath.

XIX. Before the cautionary Towns ſhall be delivered to the King, they ſhall be furniſhed with a ſufficient quantity of Artillery, and a fortnight's proviſions.

XX. The Fairs and Markets ſhall be kept there as uſual.

XXI. As ſoon as part of the King's Troops ſhall arrive in any Port of Bretagne, the Ducheſs ſhall ſend to the Ships ſixteen Hoſtages; namely,------or at leaſt four of them to be detained till the cautionary Towns are delivered.

XXII. The Ducheſs, the Marſhal, and three or four of the principal Lords ſhall ſwear upon the Holy Goſpels, that ſhe will not make a contract of marriage with any perſon whatever without the King's conſent.

XXIII. She ſhall make no alliance, nor hold intelligence with any Prince, except the King of the Romans and the King of Spain, nor even with theſe without the King's conſent (2).

XXIV. She ſhall conclude neither Peace nor Truce for above two months, nor even make a Truce for that time, without including the King.

XXV. The King promiſes the ſame thing on his part.

XXVI. The Treaty of Commerce between England and Bretagne of the 22d of July 1486, ſhall be renewed.

XXVII. The King and the Ducheſs ſhall give mutual ſecurity for the obſervance of the Treaty of Commerce.

XXVIII. Engliſh money ſhall paſs in Bretagne after this manner,------the King ſhall be obliged to receive the ſame Money in payment.

Remarks upon this Treaty.

It is eaſy to perceive that in making this Treaty Henry had three different views. Firſt, to prevent Charles VIII from becoming maſter of Bretagne, whilſt the Ducheſs was ſo little able to reſiſt him. If Charles ſhould have finiſhed the conqueſt of Bretagne next Campaign, as was very eaſy, Henry would have been blamed by all Europe. Particularly, he would have been inexcuſable to the Parliament, who had granted him a very conſiderable ſubſidy for the defence of that Duchy. His ſecond view was to frighten the King of France, by the ſending of Engliſh Troops into a compliance to end the affair by way of Negotiation. This is manifeſt from his lending the ſix thouſand Men for eight months only, and that too, when they were of no ſervice but to prevent the Court of France from violating the Treaty of Vergy then in force. His third and chief aim was, to ſecure the reimburſement of what he was going to advance, for the maintenance of the ſix thouſand Men for eight months. He had already projected the keeping for his own uſe the ſubſidy granted by Parliament for the defence of Bretagne, in the expectation of deciding the affair by his mediation. Mean while, he ſaw that the young Princeſs, in her circumſtances, could not reſiſt the King of France, if he thought of purſuing his conqueſts. So, to oblige King Charles to enter into Treaty, it was neceſſary to ſhow him the Ducheſs would not want Protectors, if he pretended to continue to uſe the way of Arms. He could not help therefore advancing the money, ſince the Ducheſs was not able to do it. But withal he took ſo great care not to loſe his money, that it is viſible from the Treaty, his principal aim was the re-payment of his expences. There are two farther remarks to be made upon his conduct. Firſt, 'tis probable, he would lend his Troops out but for eight months, leaſt the ſum ſhould mount too high, and conſequently become difficult to be repaid. Secondly, he was willing not only to ſecure the principal, but to receive it alſo with intereſt. For, after receiving places in mortgage for his ſecurity, he left the ſum undetermined, in order to have it ſettled by Commiſſioners. He knew that when he had the Towns in his hands, Ann would one day be forced to ſubmit to what he ſhould preſcribe, and it would be in his power to mount the charges of levying and maintaining his Troops as high as he pleaſed. What I am ſaying is not a bare conjecture, ſince we ſhall find in the ſequel that he raiſed this expence to an exorbitant ſum. Thus Ann was ſo bound by the Treaty, that this aid was no leſs expenſive to her than

But in a Council held upon that occaſion, the Chancellor de Rochefort was utterly againſt it, from motives of honour and equity. His opinion made the deeper impreſſion upon the King, as he ſtill feared, that, though the King of England acted but faintly, he would alter his mind. Beſides Henry's Embaſſies to Spain, to the King of the Romans, and to the Archduke, gave the Court of France ſome uneaſineſs. They were afraid of a league which would have obſtructed the execution of a grand project already formed, and which will be mentioned hereafter.

Diſſention in Bretagne. Argentré.

Whilſt the Treaty was negotiating at Redon, the Ducheſs's affairs were in a deplorable ſtate. She not only ſaw a French Army in the heart of her Country, and in poſſeſſion of ſeveral Towns; but moreover, was deſtitute of Men and money. What was ſtill more grievous at ſuch a juncture, was the diſſention among her principal Lords. The Marſhal de Rieux pretended to govern her, as her guardian. But Philip de Montauban her Chancellor had ſuch an aſcendent over her, that he cauſed her to conſider the Marſhal as an enemy, ſo that ſhe abſolutely refuſed to be under his guardianſhip. Montauban's pretence to exaſperate her was, that the Marſhall would have married her to the Lord d' Albret. But the Chancellor repreſented to her that the Marſhal intended to ruin her, by giving her a Husband unable to protect her. He even inſinuated that the Marſhal was bribed by the King of France, whoſe intereſt it was to marry her to a Lord not ſupported by any Prince in Europe. It may be the Chancellor was himſelf gained in favour of the King of the Romans. Be this as it will, their diſſention was carried ſo far, that the Marſhal de Rieux cauſed the Gates of Nantz to be ſhut upon the Ducheſs, and even threatened to beſiege her in Rennes. It is not therefore ſurpriſing that Montauban, who managed the Ducheſs's affairs, ſhould agree to the Treaty of Redon; ſince, by the arrival of the Engliſh Forces his party would be exceedingly ſtrengthened.

The Engliſh arrive in Bretagne. Hall. Act. Pub. XII. p. 355, 360, 373, 378, 380, 381, 394.

The Engliſh Succours at laſt arrived in March, which with Henry's Embaſſies to ſeveral Courts, made King Charles imagine, he intended to act vigorouſly in defence of Bretagne (1). In this belief, finding he could not execute his deſigns by open force, without entering into war with the Engliſh, and drawing perhaps other enemies upon himſelf, he thought ſome other courſe ſhould be taken. There was on foot a Treaty of Peace between him and Maximilian, and between Maximilian and the Gantois, by the mediation of the German Princes, aſſembled at Francfort. As this affair was in a good way, he did not queſtion that a Peace would inſue. He had in his power, Margaret Daughter of the King of the Romans, in order to eſpouſe her when marriageable, and was not ignorant of the late Duke of Bretagne's engagement with that Prince, concerning his Daughter's marriage. So, not at all doubting, that his future Father-in-law, with whom he was going to conclude a Peace, would be ready to favour him, he ſent and offered the Ducheſs of Bretagne to make him Umpire of their differences. Ann gladly accepted the propoſal, being almoſt ſure of the favour of a Prince who expected to marry her, and Maximilian did not want much Intreaty to become arbiter of an affair, in which he himſelf was ſo much concerned. Thus Charles, Ann, and Maximilian, acted all three with Inſincerity.

Charles and Ann take Maximilian for Umpire. Argentré.

Treaty made at Francfort.

The Ambaſſadors of France and Bretagne being met at Francfort, concluded, by the mediation of the King of the Romans, a proviſional Treaty, importing, that Charles ſhould reſtore the places conquered upon Bretagne, except Dinant, St. Aubin, Fougeres, and St. Malo: That theſe four Towns ſhould be committed in truſt to Maximilian, and the Duke of Bourbon, and the French Troops march out of the reſt of Bretagne: That on her part, the Ducheſs ſhould ſend away the Engliſh: And in April next, a Congreſs be held at Tournay, to adjuſt all diſputes: That, in the mean time, both parties ſhould ſend their reaſons to Avignon, to be examined and diſcuſſed by Civilians, that their opinions might ſerve for the Inſtruction of the mediators. 1489.

This Treaty was without effect, though both Parties ſeemed pleaſed with it. Ann was obliged by the Treaty of Redon, to deliver two places to the King of England, and theſe two places were to be kept by five hundred Engliſh. By the preſent Treaty, ſhe promiſed to ſend away all the Engliſh. But as the five hundred Men which kept the two places were not excepted, Charles pretended, he was not bound to execute the Treaty of Francfort, till all the Engliſh were departed from Bretagne, to which Ann could not oblige them. So, though in November, purſuant to the Treaty of Redon, the Engliſh Forces returned into England, the five hundred Men however remained, and it was not in the Ducheſs's power to ſend them away, unleſs ſhe repaid the King of England all his charges, which was impoſſible. The affair reſted therefore in the ſame ſtate it was before the Treaty of Francfort, and the two parties neither ſent their reaſons to Avignon, nor their Ambaſſadors to Tournay.

Charles keeps not the Treaty.

Mean time, Maximilian's marriage with Ann was negotiating with all poſſible ſecrecy. Maximilian's agents repreſented to the young Princeſs, the honour ſhe would enjoy of being Queen of the Romans, and in time, Empreſs. But with this honour, ſhe would have wanted a powerful aſſiſtance, which her Lover was not able to give her. He could not draw any Forces out of Flanders, and ſend them to Bretagne, without breaking with France, included in his late Peace with the Gantois. Beſides, this Peace was ſo ill ſecured, that it did not laſt a whole year. Thus Maximilian, Son of an Emperor, himſelf King of the Romans, and Governor of the Low-Countries, had only empty Titles, which gave him little power. Nevertheleſs, the young Ducheſs was ſtill made to expect a powerful aid from him, whether her adviſers wilfully ſhut their Eyes, or becauſe there was then no other Prince in Europe, from whom ſhe could hope for any aſſiſtance. The King of England might have protected her, but had entertained ſo wrong a notion of the affair, that the Iſſue alone was capable to undeceive him.

The Ducheſs is perſwaded to marry Maximilian. Argentré.

At laſt, the Marriage was accompliſhed in November, with a Ceremony [then altogether new in thoſe parts.] For the Prince of Naſſau, Ambaſſador and Proxy of Maximilian, put his naked Leg into the bed where the Ducheſs was laid, as a ſort of Conſummation. This was done however with ſuch ſecrecy, that neither Charles nor Henry appear to have known it, till March 1491. It is true, Argentré, Hiſtorian of Bretagne, ſays, that from the beginning of the year 1490, all the publick Acts ran in the name of Maximilian and Ann. If ſo, it would be hard to conceive how their marriage could be kept ſecret. But very probably, Argentré was miſtaken one whole year. For we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts of England, ſeveral Commiſſions of the year 1490, in the name of the Ducheſs alone, and the firſt there with Maximilian's name, is dated in March 1491 (2).

The Marriage is ſolemnized by Proxy. Argentré. Hall. Bacon.

1490. Though the Engliſh Troops were returned, Charles renewed not Hoſtilities in Bretagne. This forbearance made Henry imagine he had attained his end, that is, had frightned Charles by the ſole appearance of rupture. The truth is, Charles was greatly embaraſſed. He could not think of letting go Bretagne, and on the other hand, perceived it would be very difficult to finiſh the Conqueſt, without drawing on himſelf a war from England, and perhaps from ſeveral other States.

Charles is put to a ſtand.

Mean while, Ann ſeeing the war would infallibly be renewed, as ſoon as her marriage was divulged, uſed all her endeavours to convince Henry of the neceſſity of ſending freſh Succours to Bretagne, without diſcovering however the true reaſon. For this purpoſe ſhe ſent to him in February 1490, Chancellor Montauban, and other Ambaſſadors, with orders to deſire aſſiſtance, and an expreſs power to promiſe in her name, that ſhe would never marry without his conſent (3). This ſhows, her marriage with Maximilian was ſtill a ſecret, which ſhe did not think fit to divulge. In their Inſtructions, the Ambaſſadors were ordered to acquaint the King with her proteſtation in form, againſt her Father's engagement with the Lord d' Albret, and with whatever d' Albret and de Rieux had done to compel her to ratify the ſame. was 1490. was an Insinuation of her wanting his assistance, as well against her own Subjects, as the King of France, and that Bretagne was in danger from both. But all this was not capable to move Henry. Instead of treating with the Dutchess about fresh Supplies, he sent Ambassadors to France (1), with power to treat with King Charles concerning all that Prince's differences with the Dutchess of Bretagne. He was still of opinion, that Charles dreading the junction of England with Bretagne, wanted only a Peace. In this belief, he resolved to make him pay for it, insisting upon a fresh demand, hitherto unthought of, namely, the Arrears of the Pension which Lewis XI was bound to pay to Edward IV, by the Treaty of Pequigny, which by a subsequent Treaty, was to continue till the death of the survivor of the two Kings. These Arrears amounted to the Sum of one hundred twenty five thousand Crowns, which the Ambassadors had orders to demand. From that time, this Article was always inserted in the King's Commissions to treat with France. Henry imagined, that in Charles's Treaty with Ann, of which he thought himself almost sure, he would submit to this Article, least it should be an obstacle to the Peace.

He refuses to take advantage of Charles's being at a stand. P. 453, 454.

Whilst his Ambassadors were in France, he could not dispense with appointing Commissioners to treat with those of Bretagne. But it was only to amuse them. The Negotiation solely tended to a Treaty, which still more strongly than the former, secured him the reimbursement of his Charges on the Dutchess's account, without any mention of the desired assistance. The whole amounted to some verbal promises on the King's part, that he would never forsake the Dutchess. He believed this assistance was entirely needless in the present situation of the affair, still imagining, King Charles was wholly inclined to a Peace. Mean while, Charles in his turn, amused the English Ambassadors, resolving to conclude nothing, till he could more plainly discover Henry's Intention. He had an army in the bowels of Bretagne, and several Towns in his possession, and Ann was little able to expel him with her own Forces alone. For this reason, he willingly waited for a favorable opportunity to end the affair, otherwise than by the King of England's mediation, of whom he was too jealous. Henry thinking him otherwise disposed, made it his chief business to secure the payment of what he had advanced for the assistance of Bretagne. And therefore, under colour that the City of Nantz was in danger of falling into the hands of the French, he demanded to have it in his power, promising to restore it whenever required. But presently after he heard, the Lord d' Albret had prevented him, and that despairing to marry the Dutchess, he had joined with France, and taken that rich City, where he had made a great Booty.

but it is taken by d' Albret.

During these Negotiations, fresh troubles arose in Flanders, very prejudicial to the affairs of the Dutchess of Bretagne. The Duke of Saxony, who commanded in Flanders for Maximilian, having published an Edict concerning the Coin, the Inhabitants of Bruges refused to comply with it, and drew the Gantois into their revolt. The King of France, who desired nothing more than to see war kindled in Flanders, sent aid (2) to the rebels, under the Conduct of Marshal Desquerdes Governor of Picardy (3). On the other side, Maximilian, or the Duke of Saxony in his name, sent Ambassadors to Henry, to make a League with him against France.

They make great progress.

With the aid arrived from Picardy, the rebels made great progress, and after taking Ipre and Sluce, besieged Dixmude. Henry, angry with Charles for delaying his answer so long, and moreover being concerned to support the Archduke, resolved to send him aid. To that purpose, he suddenly dispatched [the Lord Morley (4) with] a thousand Men to Calais, with orders to the Lord D'aubeney, Governor of that place, to relieve Dixmude, if possible. D'aubeney joining a thousand Men of his Garrison (5), to those come from England, marched directly to Dixmude, which was not well invested. He entered the Town by night without opposition, and at break of day sallying out of the opposite gate, fell upon the Camp of the French and Flemings, and entirely routed them (6). This affair bred a great coldness between Charles and Henry. But Charles durst not complain, since he had no more right to assist rebellious Subjects, than had Henry to assist the Sovereign.

Mean time, the Ambassadors of Bretagne waited at London to no manner of purpose. The King gave them however good words, which served only to ingage them the more to do his, instead of the Dutchess's, Affairs. On the 26th of July he required of them, an Acknowledgment that he had punctually executed the Treaty of Redon; a fresh engagement to reimburse all his charges; and a promise to deliver to him Morlaix and Concarneau, upon the hopes of an aid which he never intended to give. However, it was necessary, in order to attain his ends, to make the King of France believe, he really designed to assist the Dutchess of Bretagne, since it was the only means to stop his proceedings. Charles seemed to have some knowledge of Henry's thoughts, for he appeared more cold than ever, with respect to his agreement with the Dutchess. He returned no direct answer, neither did he talk of restoring his Conquests upon Bretagne, or of paying the Arrears of the Pension due till the death of Edward IV. So, Henry thought it time to proceed more openly, and give that Monarch reason to fear not only the Arms of England but also of several other States. In the beginning of this year he had renewed the Treaties of Alliance with Portugal and Denmark. In September he concluded with Maximilian and his Son Philip, a League against France for their mutual defence, and for that of the Dutchess of Bretagne. At the same time he published a Treaty made with Ferdinand and Isabella in March the last year. By this Treaty, the two Kings ingaged to make war upon the King of France, unless he would restore Roussillon to Ferdinand, and Guienne and Normandy to Henry. Moreover they agreed upon a Marriage between Arthur Prince of Wales, Henry's Son, and Catherine, third Daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, as soon as the Prince was fourteen, and the Princess twelve years of age. His Treaty with the King of the Romans had relation to this. The three Princes were to enter France at the same time, each at the head of an Army as well for their own, as for the Interests of the Dutchess of Bretagne. But by secret Articles signed two days after, there were so many restrictions concerning the time, manner, and conditions of the War, that it plainly appears Henry's sole aim was to frighten the King of France. By one of the secret Articles, the time of this invasion was fixed to the 15th of August, 1492.

By the secret Articles the Alliance came to nothing. Act. Pub. XII. p. 403, 413.

The 4th of October, Henry concluded with John Galeazzo Duke of Milan a Treaty of Alliance, containing only general Articles of Amity and good understanding. Mean while, Henry failed not to reap this advantage, that these Negotiations, which were openly transacting, embarassed the French King. Indeed, all these Treaties, the secret Articles whereof he knew not, gave him uneasiness. He had reason to fear, that a League was forming against him, which would obstruct not only the Conquest of Bretagne, but also that of the Kingdom of Naples, which he had been some time meditating. It was this that hindered his renewing the War in Bretagne, though the Dutchess's circumstances were such, that it seemed easy to dispossess her entirely. Besides Henry's conduct appeared so extraordinary, that he knew not what to think. That Monarch made great noise about the League he was forming for the defence of Bretagne, and yet sent no aid. In this uncertainty, Charles resolved to send an Ambassy into England, under pretence of taking off Henry from the Dutchess's party, but in reality to know by his answer what he was to hope or fear from him. He chose for this purpose Francis de Luxemburg Viscount of Martigues, Waleran de Sams, and Robert Gaguin, General of the Order of the Trinity. These Ambassadors being arrived at London, had their audience of the King, where nothing particular passed. Some days after, the King having nominated to treat with them Richard Fox Bishop of Exeter, Thomas Earl of Ormond, and some others (7), in their first conference, the General of the Order of the Trinity being the Speaker, made the most submissive and cringing Speech that ever came out of the mouth of a French Ambassador to a foreign Prince, if after all the matter is to be referred to Henry VII's Historian. As I have several reasons to suspect this Speech to be rather the Historian's than the Ambassador's, I shall only relate the principal points, without keeping to the very words, or mentioning certain Articles which seem to me altogether improbable (8).

" to paſs by all formalities, and make advances unuſual
" in ſuch Sovereigns as he. He would not however con-
" ceal from him another motive which made him deſi-
" rous of Peace. Having reſolved to carry his Arms in-
" to remote Countries, it could not but be for his advan" tage, that all the World ſhould know he was in friend-
" ſhip with all his Neighbours, and particularly with the " King of England. Then the Ambaſſador himſelf took " care to excuſe Henry's ſending aid into Bretagne and
" Flanders, though it was againſt France, and owned it
" to be no juſt cauſe of rupture between the two Crowns.
" As for Flanders, he juſtified the King his maſter's ſend-
" ing Troops thither, becauſe it was his duty to protect " the Flemings his Vaſſals (1), againſt the King of the " Romans their Oppreſſor. After that, the Ambaſſador
" added, King Charles intended to make war upon the " Kingdom of Naples, unjuſtly detained from him by a
" Baſtard of the Houſe of Arragon. That Kingdom be" longing to him by undoubted right, he was bound in " honour to try to recover it. But his thoughts did not

" Naples ſerve as a Bridge to tranſport his Forces into
" the Eaſt, and overthrow the Empire of the Turks, to

" his reſolution for a holy War, he was content for the " honour and advantage of the Chriſtian religion, to beg
" Peace at the hands of all the Princes of Europe, that he " might not be diverted by any obſtacle from them.

The Ambaſſador concluded with ſaying, " He had only
" another Affair to mention, not as a ſubject of Treaty,
" but as a mark of his Maſter's great deſire to preſerve a
" good underſtanding with the King of England, namely,
" Being Sovereign Lord of Bretagne, and as ſuch Guar-

Some days after, the Ambaſſadors of France being ſent for to the Council, the Chancellor returned them the following Anſwer from the King: " That the King his
" Maſter had not forgot his former love and friendſhip
" with the King of France. That if the friendſhip was
" ſtill the ſame, there was no occaſion to talk of it: But " if not, it was not words but deeds that muſt renew it:
" That as for the Affair of Bretagne, he could not help
" thinking it ſtrange that the King of France ſhould
" make him his inſtrument to ruin one of his beſt Allies,
" and moreover pretend, he was very much obliged to
" him for it: As for the Ducheſs's marriage, he meant
" not to meddle with it, provided the King of France
" would proceed by Law and not by the Sword: That
" however, what had paſſed in Bretagne as well as in " Flanders did not make ſo deep an impreſſion, as to re-
" fuſe to treat of Peace, if all their other Affairs might " be debated at the ſame time. That as for the War
" upon Naples, the King had but one thing to ſay,
" which was, as the King of France thought himſelf
He demands all France. " bound in honour to try to recover that Kingdom, ſo
" for the ſame reaſon the King thought himſelf obliged " to exert his utmoſt for the recovery of Guienne, Nor-
" mandy, and the Kingdom of France itſelf, which of " right belonged to him."

Motive of the Demand. Henry had eaſily diſcovered the deſign of this Embaſſy, and that, by a general propoſal to live in peace with him, Charles had no other view than to ſound his intentions with reſpect to Bretagne. Wherefore, according to the maxim he had eſtabliſhed, which was to frighten him, he threatened a War, not only for the intereſt of the Ducheſs of Bretagne, but alſo for his own. Mean while, it is likely he ſpoiled his affairs by carrying the artifice too far, and that Charles was ſenſible, this anſwer was only bare words, which would not be followed by deeds. It
Charles diſcovers it. was not at all probable, that in the then ſituation of France, Henry who tottered as it were in the Throne of a Kingdom full of Male-contents, would renew a quarrel of that importance, of which he could not naturally expect to ſee a happy Iſſue. His reputation for being one of the moſt prudent Princes of his time, made it incredible that he would imbark in ſuch an undertaking. So Charles taking for granted, that he intended only to frighten him, ſtill purſued his courſe, with reſpect to Bretagne, and ſucceeded in the end, as will be ſeen under the next year. On the other hand, his Ambaſſadors, ſurprized at the Chancellor's Speech, anſwered with warmth, that the King their Sovereign feared not ſuch threats, and was able to maintain his juſt rights againſt any perſon whatever (2). The Chancellor calmly replied, the King expected no other anſwer from them; but would forthwith ſend Ambaſſadors to the King of France, to acquaint him more fully with his intentions. Then he asked them whether the King of France would agree to have the diſpoſal of the marriage of the Ducheſs of Bretagne, with an exception that he ſhould not marry her himſelf (3). The Ambaſſadors anſwered, the Queſtion put to the Ambaſſadors. King their maſter was ſo far from any thoughts of marrying the Ducheſs of Bretagne, that he had given them no inſtructions upon that head.

1490. The Ambaſſadors Reply. Bacon.

During all theſe Negotiations, Ann was extremely troubled to ſee no aid come either from Maximilian or the King of England. She had hitherto kept her marriage ſecret; but perceiving it could not be concealed any longer, and that it was not honorable to hide it from him whom ſhe deemed her principal Protector, ſent a ſolemn Embaſſy into England, conſiſting of the Prince of Orange, the Earl of Dunois, and the Chancellor. Their buſineſs was to deſire aid, and probably, notify her marriage to the King. For, till after this Embaſſy which arrived in England the beginning of the next year, we do not find in the Publick Acts, Maximilian's name joined with her's.

Ann notifies to Henry her Marriage.

In February 1491 Henry ſent Ambaſſadors into France (4) according to his promiſe. Their Commiſſion was, to treat of all his differences with King Charles, and in particular of a certain ſum due to him from that Prince, as alſo of the affair between Charles and the Ducheſs of Bretagne. Theſe inſtructions alone are a clear evidence, that Henry deſigned not vigorouſly to puſh his pretenſions to the Realm of France, or at leaſt, to Guienne and Normandy. For, is it probable that he would have comprized under the general word Differences his claim to all France, or to two of the richeſt Provinces, and have ſpecified a debt of a hundred and twenty-five thouſand Crowns, if the firſt had been the principal? It is therefore manifeſt, he ſtill perſiſted in his deſire to end the affair of Bretagne without War, and to ſecure the ſums he had advanced.

1491. Henry's Embaſſy to Charles. Act. Pub. XII. p. 432. Bacon.

A few days after, he appointed Commiſſioners to treat with the Ambaſſadors that came laſt from Bretagne. Then it was probably, that the Ducheſs's marriage with Maximilian was imparted to him (5). Perhaps he was told of it before, though he pretended ignorance, becauſe it had not been notified to him in form.

Ann's marriage is imparted to him. p. 436, 438.

Mean while, Charles having at laſt heard of this marriage, which had been made a great ſecret, reſolved to uſe no more ceremony, but vigorouſly haſten the conqueſt of Bretagne. In all appearance, he plainly ſaw through all Henry's diſguiſes, and perhaps believed the acquiſition of Bretagne well worth the hazarding a rupture with England. As for Maximilian, he did not much fear him, and had an infallible expedient to pacify the King of Arragon, by reſtoring Rouſſillon, much leſs important to the Crown of France than Bretagne. So, without further conſideration, he ordered Rennes, Capital of the Duchy, to be inveſted, where the Princeſs then was. During the Siege, which laſted ſome months, Ann ſent into England, John Bouteiller Lord of Maupertuis, and Peter Cojalu, to deſire Henry's aſſiſtance. Shortly after ſhe ſent alſo the Counteſs de la Val, and the Marſhal de Rieux, and ſome others, to inform him of her condition, and demonſtrate to him, that Bretagne was going to fall into the hands of France. This Embaſſy furniſhed the King with a pretence to borrow money of his Subjects, to enable him to make war upon France. And yet, though he ſeemed extremely in haſte, he gave no orders for levying Troops, but was very intent upon collecting the Loans.

But all this tended only to make a great noiſe, in order to deter the King of France from his deſign to conquer Bretagne. So, Henry not being able to depend in any meaſure upon ſuch Allies, and ſeeing Bretagne almoſt loſt, was unwilling to ingage alone in its defence. His ſole aim was to ſecure by the dread of this League, the payment of what was owed him by France and Bretagne. Mean while, Henry and Ferdinand, in order to attain their ends, were to feign a real intention to make war upon France.

Charles VIII demands Ann in Marriage. Argentré. P. Daniel.

Whilſt theſe two Monarchs were taking meaſures to accompliſh their deſigns, and the Ambaſſadors of Bretagne were waiting in vain at London, Charles cauſed the Siege of Rennes to be continued. But finding the Siege was in an ill way, and the ſeaſon now far advanced, he ſought and found a readier and more effectual means than the Sword to ſecure the poſſeſſion of Bretagne. He gained, by his liberalities, all the young Ducheſs's Counſellors, who ſhould perſuade her to break off her marriage with Maximilian, and take himſelf for her Husband. Perhaps he had formed that project before. But however, he firſt diſcovered it during the Siege of Rennes. When he was ſecure of the concurrence of the Lords of Bretagne, he cauſed the Ducheſs, then above fifteen years of age, to be ſo importuned, that ſhe had not a moment's repoſe. She at firſt couragiouſly withſtood all their ſollicitations, affirming, ſhe could not reſolve to be falſe to a Prince whom ſhe had voluntarily eſpouſed. But it was repreſented to her, That Maximilian had forſaken her firſt: That inſtead of coming in perſon to defend her, or at leaſt, of ſending her aids proportionable to her wants, he had remained quietly in Germany, as if what paſſed in Bretagne no way concerned him: That in the preſent poſture of affairs, it was impoſſible to hinder Bretagne from becoming a Province of France, and then Maximilian would regard her ſtill leſs, when he ſaw her diſpoſſeſſed of her Dominions: Nay, perhaps ſhe would have the confuſion to ſee that he himſelf would cancel his marriage, and ſo loſe at once both her Duchy and Spouſe, and reduce her Subjects to ſlavery: That in marrying the King of France, ſhe might ſecure by a Treaty, the Sovereignty and Liberties of Bretagne; whereas, by an obſtinate and fruitleſs defence, ſhe would ruin her ſubjects, without reaping any advantage herſelf. In fine, That the King of France was more proper for one of her age: That the glorious title of Queen of the Romans, and Empreſs, ought not to tempt her, ſince that of Queen of France, with a real Kingdom, was not of leſs value. Mean while, as the Ducheſs reſiſted, Charles thought of another expedient to conquer her reſolution. He went himſelf and took the Duke of Orleans out of the Tower of Bourges, where he was confined after the battle of St. Aubin, and told him, that knowing how great confidence the young Ducheſs of Bretagne placed in him, he required him, in return for his freedom, to try to perſuade her to comply with his deſires. The Duke of Orleans, who was tired of his impriſonment, willingly accepted of the Office, and repairing to Rennes, ſucceeded at laſt in determining the Ducheſs to the marriage, which was accordingly concluded December the 16th, 1491.

Charles empties the Duke of Orleans; who prevails with the Ducheſs, and the marriage is concluded. Argentré. Mezeray.

Whilſt this affair was in hand, Charles amuſed the Engliſh Ambaſſadors, being unwilling to conclude any thing, or even treat with them till he ſaw the ſucceſs of his Negotiation with Ann. At laſt, the Ambaſſadors hearing the marriage was upon the point of concluſion, withdrew about the end of November, without taking leave. Thus Henry ſaw, not without confuſion, that he had loſt the fruit of his avaritious Policy, not only as he had not ſaved Bretagne, but chiefly as the reimburſement of the ſums he had advanced, was become more precarious than ever. Nevertheleſs, he had ſtill one refuge left, which he knew how to improve, and which brought him off, if not with honour, at leaſt with a pecuniary advantage, the thing he had all along aimed at. Happily for him, Charles was poſſeſſed with his deſign to conquer the Kingdom of Naples. As a rupture with England would have laid invincible Obſtacles in his way, he thought it ſhould by all means be avoided. Henry on his part, well knowing that, in the preſent juncture, Charles would not ſcruple to purchaſe a Peace, feigned an extreme reſentment of the affront he had received, and a reſolution to be revenged at any rate. The moment his Ambaſſadors made their report, he iſſued out orders to levy Forces, and prepare Tranſports, intimating, he was going to undertake the moſt dreadful War that had ever been between England and France (1). He ſeemed to prepare to tread in the ſteps of Edward III and Henry V, and not think of reſting till he had forced the Crown of France from the Houſe of Valois. We ſhall ſee preſently to what all this ardour tended. 1491.

The Archbiſhop of England withdraws. Hall.

Henry prepares for War. Act. Pub. XII. p. 463, 464, 471, 476. Hall. Hollingſh.

Maximilian was inraged when he heard Charles had thus injuriouſly robbed him of his Wife. He threatened, like Henry, to carry Fire and Sword into the heart of France, in revenge of ſo deadly an affront. On the other hand, the Archduke Philip demanded his Siſter Margaret who was at Paris, and affianced to King Charles. But the Court of France did not yet think fit to ſend back that Princeſs. They feared neither Father nor Son. Their whole attention was employed in laying the ſtorm with which they were threatned from England and Spain, and which appeared much more violent than it really was. But before I relate the effects of this quarrel, it will be neceſſary briefly to mention the affairs of Scotland.

The King of the Romans threatens high. Hall. Bacon. Hollingſh.

Since James IV's acceſſion to the Crown of Scotland, he had found it very difficult to maintain himſelf in the Throne. The troubles which immediately broke out, ſtill continued by the Policy of the King of England, who took care to foment them. He gave from time to time the Scotch Male-contents ſome little aids, which enabled them to ſupport themſelves, but not to make any great progreſs againſt their King. It is a Policy very uſual with Princes, to cheriſh the troubles of their Neighbours, in a belief that it is a moſt effectual way to preſerve Peace at home, though there are ſome who would ſcruple to uſe ſuch means. But Henry was not of this number. He even ſeems to have been leſs ſcrupulous than many others, ſince we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that the Lord Bothwel and Sir Thomas Tod, both Scots, had engaged to deliver into his hands the Perſons of the King of Scotland, and the Duke of Roſs his Brother, which could not be done without notorious treachery. It even appears by the Record, that he had lent the Earl of Boghan and Sir Thomas Tod, 266 l. 13 s. 4 d. Sterling, to enable them to execute this deſign, and that Tod left his Son in hoſtage for ſecurity. This Act is dated April the 17th, 1491.

Two Scotchmen bargain to deliver up the King to Henry. Act. Pub. XII. p. 440.

This project miſcarrying, Henry who was preparing for the war with France, would firſt be ſecured from the diverſions, the Scots might make in England during his abſence. James for his part, deſired nothing more than to deprive thoſe of his Subjects that were in arms againſt him, of the protection ever afforded them by the King of England. So, the two Kings ſending their Ambaſſadors to Caldſtream upon Tweed, a Treaty of Truce was concluded, from the 21ſt of December, to that day five years 1496. By this Treaty, the City of Berwick, with its Territory, was to ſtand neuter, and the Lordſhip of Lorn in Scotland, with the little Iſland of Lundey belonging to England, were excepted out of the Truce. Henry ratified the Treaty January the 9th, 1492. But probably, the King of Scotland, whether bribed by France, or from ſome other motive, refuſed to confirm it. He agreed however, to a much ſhorter Truce, from the 20th of February 1492, to the 20th of November following.

France ſeemed to be threatened from all ſides with a furious war. Maximilian preſſed it to the utmoſt of his power, reckoning that his Son Philip, then twenty years old, would make a powerful diverſion in Flanders, whilſt the Allies acted in other places. Henry was openly preparing for war with great noiſe and boaſtings. In fine, Ferdinand and Iſabella, who had lately put a glorious period to the war with the Moors, by the taking of Granada, publickly threatned to invade France: Charles therefore would have been in great danger, had this powerful League been in reality, what it was in appearance. After taking poſſeſſion of Bretagne, he thought of executing his grand project, concerning the Conqueſt of Naples. But he muſt firſt diſpel the ſtorm that was gathering in Spain, England, and Flanders. Whilſt he was wholly employed in this affair, Henry was no leſs intent upon his own concerns. 1492.

France is threatened on all ſides.

In the beginning of the year 1492, he aſſembled a Parliament, and communicated to both Houſes his deſign to carry war into France, not with intent to ask their advice, as in the caſe of Bretagne, but to acquaint them with his reſolution to exert his utmoſt endeavours to recover the Kingdom of France, which he called the Inheritance of his Anceſtors. To inflame them the more, he ſet before them the glorious Battles of Crecy, Poictiers, and Azincourt, where the Engliſh alone, with a ſmall 1492. number of Troops, vanquiſhed the ſtrongeſt armies of France. He would thereby inſinuate, that he was no leſs a Warrior than Edward III, the Prince of Wales his Son, and Henry V. In demanding an aid of Money proportionable to the greatneſs of the enterprize, he exhorted the Commons to ſpare the purſes of the poor, and lay the Tax upon the rich, not at all queſtioning, whether what he required would be granted. Certainly great fault might have been found with his management of the former Subſidy. It was granted for the defence of Bretagne, and yet the Duchy was loſt without his uſing the leaſt endeavours to prevent it. But the Conqueſt of the Kingdom of France was a very proper decoy to draw in the Parliament. The truth is, the King had no deſire to imbark in ſo hazardous an undertaking. He knew that France being now at unity with itſelf, the Conqueſt of it would be too difficult a task. Of his two Allies, the one had Will but not Power, and the other had Power but not Will; Ferdinand's aim being, by ſhew of war to attain a Peace, which might procure him the reſtitution of Rouſſillon. Beſides, as he had but newly ended his war with the Moors, he was not in condition to begin another with France. However, Henry expreſſed to his Parliament and Council, an ardent deſire to render his name famous, by the Conqueſt of France, or at leaſt of Normandy and Guienne. Herein he had a view to his profit two ways, upon his Subjects for a Subſidy for the War, and upon his Enemies for a Peace, which would ſecure him the payment of what was due to him. He eaſily foreſaw, that the defection of the King of the Romans, and of Ferdinand, would afford him a plauſible excuſe to deſiſt from a war he was undertaking with ſo much noiſe. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Biſhop of Exeter, were the only perſons that knew his real Intentions. Shortly after, the laſt was removed to the See of Bath and Wells.

The Parliament grants a Benevolence. Hall. Bacon.

The Parliament took fire, as the King expected, and granted him a very conſiderable Sum, which, purſuant to his deſire, was to be levied upon the rich, by the name of Benevolence (1). This ſort of Tax was introduced by Edward IV, and raiſed without conſent of Parliament. Richard III, to ingratiate himſelf with the people, aboliſhed it, but this Parliament revived it (2), and gave it the Seal of their Authority (3).

Embaſſy from France. Feb. 5. Act. Pub. XII. p. 470.

Shortly after, Henry received Ambaſſadors from King Charles, with propoſals that were not made publick. There was reaſon to believe, nothing was concluded in their Conferences with the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Biſhop Fox, ſince the warlike preparations were ſtill ſeen to continue. However, very likely, theſe Ambaſſadors laid the firſt foundations of the Peace, which was made before the end of the year.

Succours ſent to the Archduke. Hall. Bacon. Hollingſh.

The preparations which were making in England were very ſeaſonable for the Archduke Philip. Since the laſt year the Gantois had revolted once more, and ſet at their head Philip de Cleves, a great ſtickler for France. Some troubles in Holland preventing the Archduke from endeavouring to ſuppreſs this revolt, it was the middle of this year before he marched againſt Philip de Cleves, and beſieged him in Sluice. He would have found it difficult to take that place, if Henry had not ſent him twelve Ships, and two thouſand five hundred Men (5). With this aid he was enabled to compel the rebels to ſue for Peace, and deliver Sluice into his hands.

The warlike Preparations go on but ſlowly.

As the King had no Intention to puſh vigorouſly the war with France, he haſtened not his preparations, being glad to begin the Campain late, in order to end it the ſooner. Mean while, he ſent Ambaſſadors to France (6), to ſhew he was willing to try fair means before he proceeded to arms. But it is extremely probable, this Embaſſy was ſent only to finiſh, with King Charles, the Terms of Peace. Moreover, the King's honour was to be ſecured, who after making ſo much noiſe, was unwilling to deſiſt, without a ſeeming neceſſity. To that end he muſt act in concert with the King of France. At the ſame time, Henry ſent Ambaſſadors (7) to the King of the Romans, and to Ferdinand, to ſummon them to take the Field and enter France according to their Treaty. But he knew they had neither Power nor Will to perform their engagements. Maximilian had no army, and Ferdinand was now in Treaty with Charles, for the reſtitution of Rouſſillon. And yet, Henry pretending Ignorance of theſe things, ſeemed to have great dependence upon them. In the beginning of Auguſt, he iſſued out orders for the levying a greater number of Forces, and on the 22d of the ſame month, appointed Commiſſioners to confer at Caldſtream, with thoſe of Scotland. All this afforded him pretences to delay his expedition. At length, though not till the 2d of October (8), he came to Dover in order to imbark (9), having conſtituted by Patent his eldeſt Son Arthur Prince of Wales, Guardian of the Realm. Such of his Courtiers who were ignorant of his deſigns, could not forbear telling him, it was very late to begin a Campain. But he anſwered, That he intended not to make a Summer's Buſineſs of the war, and therefore it did not ſignify when it began. That he had Calais at his back, where he might winter, in order to be ready to open the Campain early next Spring. He arrived the ſame day at Calais, where his whole army being aſſembled, amounted to twenty five thouſand Foot, and ſixteen hundred Horſe (10).

Bacon.

Before he embarked, Henry received a Letter from the Marſhal Deſquerdes, offering a Negotiation of Peace in England (11). But he thought it more proper, in order to ſalve appearances, to treat in France itſelf. He was ſcarce landed at Calais, when the Ambaſſadors ſent to the King of the Romans arrived, and told him, that Maximilian was wholly unprepared to enter France as he had promiſed. This news was immediately made known to the whole army. Some days after, he received from his Ambaſſadors in Spain, Letters which were likewiſe made publick, importing, that Ferdinand had concluded a Peace with the King of France, upon promiſe to reſtore Rouſſillon, without demanding the three hundred thouſand Crowns lent by Lewis XI upon that Country. Henry knew all this before, but had ſo ordered, that theſe advices came together after his arrival in France, that it might appear, he was forced to the Peace he intended to make. Upon theſe advices, at which he feigned to be very much ſurprized, he agreed, that Richard Fox Biſhop of Bath and Wells, and the Lord d'Aubeney Governor of Calais ſhould enter into Conference at Eſtaples, with the Marſhal Deſquerdes. He marched however the 15th of October, to beſiege Boulogne, and in four days appeared before the Place. It muſt be remarked, that King Charles was then at Tours, and though the warlike preparations in England had made great noiſe, there was no army in Picardy to oppoſe the Invaſion of the Engliſh; at leaſt Hiſtory mentions no ſuch thing. This is a clear evidence that all Henry's proceedings were concerted with the King of France, who was not ſo unprovided with Troops, but he could have ſent an army ſufficient to ſtop his progreſs. So, this pretended Siege of Boulogne was only an artifice to diſcourage the Engliſh, that by conſidering the difficulties of a Siege at ſuch a Seaſon, they might be the leſs ſurprized at a Peace. At the end of eight days, Henry received at the Camp before Boulogne, the Articles of Peace agreed by the Commiſſioners of both parties, with the approbation of the two Kings, the ſubſtance whereof was as follows:

III. That the King of France ſhould pay theſe two debts at ſeveral times, namely, fifty thouſand Livres every year, every Livre at twenty Scutz, or Crowns, and to be paid half-yearly, till the whole was paid.

IV. Whereas in the obligation given by the Ducheſs of Bretagne to the King of England, there was no Sum ſpecified, the King of England ſhould be obliged to make proof of his debt before Commiſſioners of Bretagne or France, to be ſent to England for that purpoſe.

V. That the two Kings ſhould name ſuch of their Allies as they meant to include in the Peace, who ſhould be obliged to declare within four months, whether they would be included or not.

VI. That in caſe the King of the Romans, and the Archduke Philip his Son deſired to be included in the Treaty, and if afterwards the King of France ſhould, in any manner whatever, invade their Country, it ſhould be lawful for the King of England to aſſiſt them. But if, on the contrary, they ſhould attack the King of France, the King of England ſhould give them no aid.

VII. That in caſe the two Kings approved of theſe Articles, they ſhould give each other Hoſtages till the Treaty was drawn and ſigned in form.

Henry aſks the opinion of his principal Officers,

As theſe Articles exactly correſponded with Henry's intentions, from the beginning of the War of Bretagne, there is no queſtion that they were framed by himſelf or his own Ambaſſadors. And yet, he would have them paſs for Propoſals from the French King, and feigned to doubt whether he ſhould accept or reject them. For that purpoſe, he called a Council of all the Lords and general Officers, and ſent them the Articles, with his who adviſe him to peace.

orders to give him their real opinion. As probably this Council was managed by ſome perſon of great credit who was in the King's ſecret, all that were preſent unanimouſly agreed, he ought to accept of the Terms. They gave their reaſons in a long memorial under all their hands, which in ſhort, omitting the Exaggerations, were as follow:

Their reaſons for ſo doing. P. 490.

I. The firſt reaſon was taken from the length of the nights, the coldneſs of the Weather, the want of Proviſions as they were to come by Sea, the fear of Diſtempers, and the like.

II. The ſecond reaſon was founded upon the conſideration of the Sum offered, far exceeding any ever yet paid by France to the King's Predeceſſors; and likewiſe, upon the apprehenſion of the Murmurings the refuſal of a Peace might occaſion in England and in the Army.

III. They alledged as a third reaſon, the great advantage that would accrue by the Peace to the King of the Romans and the Archduke: The benefit they had already received in the reſtitution of Sluice: And laſtly, the fruits which the Engliſh Merchants would reap, ſince the Peace would ſecure their Commerce with Flanders.

IV. They ſaid, the King had honorably kept his word with his Allies, notwithſtanding the inſtances of his Council, who ſollicited him to defer his expedition to a more convenient Seaſon, and till his Allies ſhould be ready: That he had led his Army into France, put himſelf in condition to encounter alone all the Enemy's Forces, and expoſed his perſon to the greateſt dangers, at a time when his Allies diſappointed him. That therefore, if the War was not continued, he might very juſtly caſt the blame upon them.

V. That the King was far from being in the ſame ſituation with Edward IV, when he led an Army into France: That Edward was joined by the Duke of Burgundy with all his Forces, and by ſeveral French Lords who were in his intereſt: That he was in poſſeſſion of all the Towns as far as the Somme, and began the War in the midſt of Summer: That, on the contrary, the King was not aſſiſted with any foreign Troops: That when he marched out of the Gates of Calais, he entred the Enemy's Country, and was advanced to Boulogne: That he had razed ſeveral Places, as Ardres and Montory, and had ſtood four and twenty Days ready for Battle, defying the Armies of France.

VI. That very likely, the People of England would thank the King for a Peace which would put an end to Taxes and Exactions, and reſtore the publick Tranquillity.

VII. They added once more, that the reſtoring the Archduke to his Dominions, would redound to the King's honor, and the Nation's advantage, by reaſon of their Trade with his Subjects. 1492.

VIII. They ſaid, that before the Siege of Boulogne, it was thought to be a weak Place and eaſy to be taken; but, on the contrary, it was found to be well fortified, ſtrongly garriſoned, and plentifully provided with Artillery and Proviſions. That therefore, in all appearance, if the King continued the Siege, he would be forced to raiſe it with diſgrace, whereas by making a Peace, he could retire with honor.

IX. Their laſt reaſon was, that it was impracticable to continue the War during the Winter, without utterly deſtroying the Army, which would extremely afflict the whole Kingdom.

Remarks on theſe Reaſons.

If theſe reaſons are never ſo little conſidered, they will be found to be all falſe and deceitful, except the Article of the money, which was the only true one. Without weighing them too particularly, I ſhall only obſerve, that of all the inconveniencies alledged by the Officers, there was not one but what the King might have foreſeen, and actually did foreſee. He could blame himſelf only for beginning the Campain ſo late. All in the 5th Article concerning Edward IV is evidently falſe. As for the murmurs of the People, which were pretended to be feared in caſe the King rejected the Peace, it was much more probable, on the contrary, that the Nation would murmur to ſee the money given for a War with France, employed in making a diſhonorable Peace, advantagious only to the King. In a word, the King's precaution to cauſe this Peace to be approved by the Officers of his Army was a clear evidence, he was himſelf convinced of the little advantage it would be to England.

Treaty concluded at Eſtaples. Act. Pub. XII. p. 479. Hall. Bacon. Hollingſh.

Henry feigning to be determined by theſe reaſons to accept of the Peace, the Treaty was drawn up in form, and ſigned at Eſtaples the 3d of November (1). Charles ratified it the 6th of the ſame month. He was then at Tours, unconcerned at the ſeemingly threatened invaſion, though an Engliſh Army in France had ever made his Predeceſſors extremely uneaſy. What was peculiar to this Treaty, was, that tho' it was called a Treaty of Peace, it was however to expire with the Lives of the two Kings. But the Succeſſor of him that died firſt, was to ratify it within a year after his Acceſſion to the Crown. I imagine this was an expedient deviſed to excuſe the ſilence concerning the Kingdom of France, or at leaſt, Guienne and Normandy, of which there was no mention, though the War was proclaimed ſolely upon that occaſion. Mean while, this Treaty, which properly concerned only the payment of two debts, was to be approved and confirmed by the States of France, and the Parliament of England. This ſhews, it was not conſidered as a bare Truce, and indeed it was called a Treaty of Peace. But on the other hand, it is hard to conceive how a Treaty, wherein the principal difference was not ſettled, and which was to be in force but till the death of the two Kings, could be deemed a Treaty of Peace. Can any thing be more like a Truce? However this be, Henry took great care to ſee that the King of France ratified every particular Article of the Treaty, and eſpecially thoſe concerning the payment of the money. Charles was likewiſe, on his part, very punctual in paying the fifty thouſand Livres every year (2), as was alſo Lewis XII his Succeſſor.

Reflections on the Affair of Bretagne.

After this manner ended the War of Bretagne, which had laſted ſince the year 1487. I ſay the War of Bretagne, becauſe That I have been ſpeaking of, was only a conſequence thereof. Henry reaped the intended advantage, that is to ſay, large Sums of money which were not employed in the ſervice of the publick. In the firſt place, he obtained of the Parliament a Tenth of all the perſonal Eſtates of his Subjects, of which he expended no more than was neceſſary for levying and maintaining ſix thouſand Men for eight months. But this expence was only advanced, the money being repaid him with intereſt. We have ſeen that he mounted his charges to ſix hundred and twenty thouſand Crowns of Gold, a prodigious Sum in thoſe days, when money was much ſcarcer than at preſent (3). In the next place, he borrowed money throughout the whole Kingdom, which probably was never repaid. There was likewiſe granted him a Subſidy under the name of Benevolence, which amounted to a very great Sum, much beyond what was neceſſary for the maintenance of his Army, the two or three months it was on foot. Laſtly, he received a hundred and

1492. and twenty-five thouſand Crowns for the Arrears of the Penſion due to Edward IV. But on the other hand, he ſuffered Bretagne to be loſt, to the irreparable damage of England, ſince her Alliance with the Duke of Bretagne gave her an advantage over France which ſhe could never after recover. Beſides, the recovery of the money advanced for Bretagne, is to be aſcribed rather to his good fortune than policy. He was ſolely indebted for it to the King of France's deſign upon the Kingdom of Naples, which induced him to purchaſe a Peace with England. Otherwiſe, Henry would have found it very difficult to recover his money, and who knows what might have happened, had he been forced to obtain it by dint of ſword? But the advantages Charles reaped by this Peace were much more conſiderable. For the Penſion of fifty thouſand Livres paid a few years, and which he received with intereſt from Bretagne, he annexed that Duchy to the Crown of France, and deprived the Engliſh of their moſt conſiderable Ally.

I have dwelt the longer upon the circumſtances of this Affair, becauſe they perfectly diſcover the Genius and Character of Henry VII. This Monarch, ever greedy of money, having always his intereſt in view, found means to make an advantage whether of War or of Peace, and turn every thing to his profit. It was he that by his Policy, wholly bent to his own private intereſt, gave the turn we have ſeen to the Affairs of Bretagne.

1493. Henry imagined he might for the future hope for a peaceable Reign. He ſaw among his Subjects no appearance of revolt. Not a Prince or Princeſs of the Houſe of York was in condition to give him any diſturbance. He kept the Earl of Warwick Priſoner in the Tower. Edward IV's Daughters were in his power, and there was no Lord of the York party of ſufficient credit to raiſe Commotions in the Kingdom. On the other hand, he was in Peace or Truce with his Neighbours, and in the ſeven years and a half that he had been on the Throne, had by his Oeconomy heaped up ſuch large Sums of money, as none of his Predeceſſors had ever been maſter of at once. And yet this State of proſperity was not capable of diſmaying his Enemies. Whilſt he was wholly employed in the Affairs I have been relating, the Ducheſs Dowager of Burgundy was labouring to raiſe him troubles at home, ſo much the more dangerous as they were not ſuſpected. This Princeſs was not ignorant how well diſpoſed the Engliſh and Iriſh were to the Houſe of York; and upon their affection ſhe chiefly built her hopes of dethroning Henry. Though Lambert Simnel's Affair had miſcarried, ſhe did not aſcribe the ill Succeſs ſo much to the project it ſelf, as to the managers. Beſides, Henry was expoſed to the hazard of a Battle, which he might have loſt, and it was not impoſſible but he might be vanquiſhed for the future, if he was in the ſame caſe. Thus ſhe did not deſpair of wreſting the Crown from the Houſe of Lancaſter, or rather of Tudor, after which, ſhe reckoned it would be eaſy to reſtore the Houſe of York.

She ſets up one Perkin Warbeck to perſonate the Duke of York. Hall. Bacon. Hollingſh. Stow.

Since Simnel's misfortune, ſhe had never ceaſed to ſpread a report, either by herſelf or Emiſſaries, that Richard Duke of York, ſecond Son of Edward IV, had eſcaped the Cruelty of his Uncle Richard III, and was ſtill alive. This ſhe did to prepare people to receive a ſecond Fantom, who was to perſonate the young Prince her Nephew, as Lambert Simnel had perſonated the Earl of Warwick. To this end, ſhe looked out carefully for young Lads of the Duke of York's age, fit for her purpoſe. At length ſhe met with one, in whom ſhe fancied to ſee all the qualities requiſite to repreſent that Prince. His name was Perkin Warbeck, Son of [John Osbeck] a Jewiſh Convert of Tournay, who had long lived at London. Edward IV having occaſion to know this Jew, and receive ſome Service from him, was pleaſed to do him the honour to ſtand Godfather to one of his Children, and gave him the name of Peter, from whence was formed the diminutive Peterkin, or Perkin. Some years after, Osbeck being returned into Flanders, placed young Perkin with one of his relations at Antwerp, who kept him ſome time. This Boy was ſo handſome, and endowed with qualities ſo far above his birth, that many ſuſpected Edward IV to be his Father. And indeed it was ſomething extraordinary, that Edward ſhould ſtand Godfather to one of ſo mean Parentage. Be this as it will, Perkin going from Antwerp, lived in ſeveral Towns of Flanders, and ſhifted habitation ſo often, that when Henry afterwards would have traced him, in order to know the whole ſtory of his Life, he found it very difficult. As Perkin generally converſed with the Engliſh ſettled in the Low-Countries, he was ſo perfect in the Engliſh Tongue, that he might eaſily be taken for an Engliſhman, eſpecially as he had ſpent his Childhood at London. 1493.

Hiſtory of Perkin. Bacon.

This youth being mentioned to the Ducheſs of Burgundy, ſhe commanded him to be privately brought to her Palace, and finding him fit for her deſign, took care to inſtruct him, with reſpect to the Perſon he was to repreſent. Hence we may gueſs, Perkin muſt have been a youth of great Wit and Senſe, to enter into the Ducheſs's deſigns, otherwiſe it would have been fruitleſs to give him Inſtructions. Be this as it will, ſhe ſo often deſcribed Edward IV, his Queeen, Prince Edward their eldeſt Son, and the Princeſſes their Daughters, that after ſeveral repetitions of her Leſſon, he could talk very pertinently of the Court, of the King his pretended Father, at leaſt as far as the Duke of York could be ſuppoſed to know. The natural way he had learnt of relating Circumſtances fit for a Child's memory, and certain particulars of Edward's Court, made the Ducheſs believe, he would not fail to gain credit when he appeared in the World. Above all, ſhe took care to make him perfect in what he was to frame, whilſt in Sanctuary with the Queen, and when taken from thence by the contrivance of Richard III, and particularly in the manner of his eſcaping the hands of the Executioners, who were ordered to murder him. Theſe were particulars ſo much the eaſier to be counterfeited, as there were but few people who could contradict them. Moreover, ſhe taught him to aſſume the Air and Character of a well-bred Prince. She found the youth ſo apt a Scholar, that ſhe was herſelf ſuprized at it. In a ſhort time, Perkin ſo uſed himſelf to talk and act like a Prince, that one would have ſworn he had been born ſo, and educated in a Palace.

The Ducheſs inſtructs him. Hall. Bacon.

It is not known when the Ducheſs of Burgundy took Perkin home to inſtruct him. But very likely, it was not long after the battle of Stoke, where the Earl of Lincoln, and Lambert Simnel were vanquiſhed. However that be, the affair of Bretagne cauſing that Princeſs to think Henry would ſoon break with France, as himſelf would have had it believed, reſolved Perkin ſhould appear as Duke of York, ſo ſoon as the war was begun. Mean while, being very ſenſible, if he appeared firſt in Flanders, or in any Town in the Low-Countries, the world would not fail to ſuſpect her, ſhe ſent him into Portugal (2), where he lived unknown for a year. At length, in 1492, the war between England and France ſeeming unavoidable, ſhe diſpatched orders to Perkin to repair into Ireland, where probably, ſhe had already been tampering with ſeveral perſons of note. Perkin inſtantly obeying, and arriving at Cork, called himſelf Duke of York, Son of Edward IV, in which he was countenanced by the Mayor, who, it is likely, was in the plot. A few days after, he writ to the Earls of Deſmond and Kildare, great Friends of the Houſe of York, acquainting them with his arrival, and deſiring them to come and join him.

She ſends him to Portugal. Hall. Bacon. Hollingſh.

Henry was then employed in his preparations for his Expedition into France. As the Ducheſs of Burgundy imagined he would depart early in the Spring, ſhe expected, he would be embarked in the war with France, by the time Perkin appeared in Ireland, in which ſhe was miſtaken. The report that the Duke of York was come from Portugal into Ireland, cauſed no alteration in the King's meaſures. He believed it to be only a contrivance to divert him from his Enterprize. However, preſently after he was told, the Duke of York who had appeared in Ireland, was gone into France, which made him very uneaſy. And indeed the news was but too true. It happened ſome time before, that one Frion Secretary to the King for the French Tongue, had withdrawn from Court, and retired to Paris, where he was very well received. This Frion, who followed King Charles's Court, hearing the Duke of York was in Ireland, told that Monarch of it, intimating, he might make that affair turn to account.

1493. Whatever Charles thought of this Pretender, he really believed that, though he was an Impoſtor, he might be ſerviceable to him in making a Peace with Henry. In this belief, he ſent Frion into Ireland, to invite the Pretender in his name to come to him, with aſſurance of his protection and aid to recover the Crown of his Anceſtors. Perkin ſeeing himſelf invited by a Prince ſo great and ſo capable to aſſiſt him, departed without a moment's conſideration. When he was arrived in France, he waited upon the King, who gave him a very gracious reception, treated him as Duke of York, lodged him in his Palace, and aſſigned him a Guard, under colour of doing him honor, but in reality to hinder the King of England from cauſing him to be ſeized. The Courtiers imitated their maſters in ſtriving to pay the ſame reſpects to Perkin, as they would have done to the Duke of York. Shortly after, above a hundred Engliſhmen, diſſatisfied with the King, repaired to Paris with offers of their Service to the Pretender. But the honours Perkin received at the Court of France were of no long continuance. As ſoon as Charles was almoſt ſure of a Peace, he diſmiſſed him, for fear Henry, who had now demanded him, ſhould make it one of the Articles of the Treaty. He was unwilling to be thought to ſurprize the young Man, in order to deliver him to his enemy; as on the other hand, he would not have the Peace miſcarry for his ſake.

He receives him as Duke of York, Bacon.

Hall.

But diſmiſſes him when ſure of a Peace. Bacon.

Perkin thought himſelf very happy to be thus freed. He was afraid of worſe uſage, when he heard a Peace was treating between the two Kings. Having readily quitted the Court of France, he retired into Flanders to the Ducheſs of Burgundy, taking great care not to diſcover, he had ever ſeen her before. At the firſt Interview, Margaret acted her part extremely well. She treated him very roughly, and ſeemed much ſurprized, that in her preſence he ſhould dare to call himſelf Duke of York. She ſaid publickly, that having been already impoſed upon by a counterfeit Earl of Warwick, ſhe ſhould be more upon her Guard, and it would not be ſo eaſy to deceive her the ſecond time. That therefore ſhe adviſed him to retire, leſt he incurred the puniſhment due to his boldneſs. Perkin ſeemed not at all troubled at theſe threats, and confeſſing ſhe was in the right to doubt, perſiſted however in affirming, he was the Duke of York her Nephew. The Ducheſs feigning a deſire to convince him of impoſture before her whole Court, put certain queſtions to him, to which, ſhe knew, he could make pertinent anſwers. Accordingly, he replied in ſo natural and unaffected a manner, that the Ducheſs ſeemed aſtoniſhed. In ſhort, they played their parts ſo well, that the Ducheſs pretending ſhe could not reſiſt ſuch evident proofs, owned him for her Nephew, aſſigned him a Guard of thirty Halberdiers, and gave him the title of the white Roſe, the Badge of the Houſe of York. Perkin on his part, laboured to convince the world, he was the real Duke of York, by his natural way of relating the principal paſſages of his Life. If at any time his diſmiſſion out of France was objected to him, he anſwered with a Sigh, it was not very ſtrange, a young Prince, perſecuted by fortune, ſhould be ſacrificed to the Policy of two powerful Monarchs. That this very thing was a ſtrong argument in his favour, ſince the Peace between Charles and Henry could be eſtabliſhed only upon his ruin. What Perkin ſaid, added to the Ducheſs's publick approbation, ſatisfied the whole Court, he was the true Duke of York, and from thence the rumour ſpread throughout all the Low-Countries, and at laſt over all Europe.

He behaves very gracefully.

News being brought into England, about the beginning of the year 1493, that the Duke of York was in Flanders, and owned by the Ducheſs of Burgundy, it cauſed great motions in the Kingdom. The thing was preſently credited by an infinite number of People, ſome of whom were diſſatisfied with the King, and others greedy of novelty. Some blindly followed their Leaders, and others, whoſe Fortunes were deſperate, wiſhed for a change in the Government. The King was not generally beloved. The loſs of Bretagne; his late Peace with the King of France; the uncivil uſage the Queen and the whole Houſe of York had received, and daily did receive at his hands; and laſtly, his unneceſſary Taxes, were but too apt to make the people wiſh the report to be true.

Many in England believe the Duke of York to be alive. Hall. Bacon. Hollingſh.

The King's Conduct.

The King was ſurprized to ſee with what greedineſs the news was received. It convinced him of his great danger from the Yorkiſts, and their conſtant readineſs to embrace all opportunities to ruin him if it was poſſible. He appeared however unconcerned, leſt his fears ſhould encourage his enemies. So, continuing to act as uſual, he waited till they more plainly diſcovered their deſigns. 1493.

He ſends the Garter to the Duke of Calabria. Act. Pub. XII. p. 527. Mar. 5. Hall.

In the beginning of March, Henry ſent (1) the Order of the Garter to Alphonſo Duke of Calabria, eldeſt Son of Ferdinand King of Naples. Alphonſo had been extremely deſirous of this Honour, to inſinuate to the Princes of Italy, that he had in the King of England a Protector who would not ſuffer him to be oppreſſed. He would have thereby induced them to league with the King his Father, againſt Charles VIII, who was going to undertake the conqueſt of the Kingdom of Naples.

He concludes a perpetual Peace with Ferdinand and Iſabella. Act. Pub. XII. p. 517. Mar. 8.

A few days after, Henry concluded at London a Treaty of perpetual peace and amity with Ferdinand and Iſabella, King and Queen of Caſtile and Arragon. This Alliance, which was a reciprocal ingagement of mutual aſſiſtance upon all occaſions, was particular in that it extended not to all the Kings of England and Spain without diſtinction, but only to all their ſucceſſors deſcended from them (2). In this Treaty, the marriage-articles between Prince Arthur and Catherine, Daughter of Ferdinand and Iſabella, were confirmed and renewed (3).

Conſpiracy againſt the King. Bacon.

Mean while, the King's enemies, not content with countenancing the report concerning the Duke of York, were now labouring to form a conſpiracy to dethrone him. His covetous temper had alienated ſeveral of the firmeſt friends to his perſon and the Houſe of Lancaſter. William Stanley Lord Chamberlain, Brother of the Earl of Derby, John Ratcliff Lord Fitz-Walter, Sir Robert Clifford, Sir Simon Montfort, Sir Thomas Thwaites, William Barley, were the chief heads of this conſpiracy. The Lord Chamberlain had greatly contributed to his victory of Boſworth, by declaring for him in ſo critical a minute. The King owned it, but thought him well rewarded with the ſpoils of Boſworth Field, and the office of Lord Chamberlain. But Stanley thinking this too mean a recompence, was not ſatisfied. Sir Robert Clifford was Son of him that murdered the young Earl of Rutland, Brother of Edward IV, at the Battle of Wakefield; and afterwards loſt his life in fighting for the Houſe of Lancaſter. Probably, Henry had forgot the conſtant attachment of that family to his Houſe, and neglected to give him a ſhare in his favors. Clifford and Barley were deputed by the conſpirators to go into Flanders, and concert meaſures with the Ducheſs of Burgundy and the pretended Duke of York, for the accompliſhment of their deſigns. The Ducheſs gave them a very civil reception, deeming it a good omen, that profeſſed enemies of her Houſe ſhould be the firſt to offer their ſervice. Shortly after their arrival, Clifford writ to his friends in England, that the Duke of York, Son of Edward IV, was in Flanders, and that he knew him perfectly well. This news inflamed the conſpirators, and from that time, they ſpared no pains to gain adherents to the pretended Duke of York.

Whilſt the King's enemies were labouring to create him freſh troubles, he himſelf was no leſs intent upon deviſing means to prevent the impending ſtorm (4). His principal buſineſs was to undeceive the people, and, to ſucceed, there was occaſion for two ſorts of proofs. Firſt, it was neceſſary to ſhew that the Duke of York was dead; in the ſecond place, that though he were alive, the perſon that borrowed his name was a counterfeit.

Henry ſeeks to undeceive the People. Bacon.

He orders the Murderers of the Duke of York to be examined. Bacon.

To prove the Duke of York was not living, it was neceſſary to produce the teſtimonies of thoſe who had taken away his life, or ſeen him dead, and who were but four in all; namely, Sir James Tyrrel, ordered by Richard III to put that Prince to death; John Dighton, employed by Tyrrel to commit the fact; Miles Foreſt his ſervant, who aſſiſted him, and the Prieſt who buried the two Princes. Of theſe four perſons, the Prieſt and Foreſt were dead, and there remained only Tyrrel and Dighton. Theſe were apprehended by the King's order and ſent to Priſon. Then, after a private examination, it was given out, that they agreed in their depoſitions; namely that Dighton and Foreſt ſmothered the two Princes in their Bed; and ſhewed their dead Bodies to Tyrrel, and that the Prieſt afterwards buried them under a ſtair-caſe. That ſoon after, Richard ordered them to be removed elſewhere, by the ſame Prieſt who was ſince dead, without diſcovering where he had laid them. It is likely however, that Tyrrel's depoſition was not ſo favorable for the King's purpoſe as Dighton's, ſince he was detained in Priſon, whereas Dighton was releaſed, probably, that he might divulge his own evidence.

Objections againſt the Depoſitions Bacon.

1493. effect the King expected. For, what proof could a confeſſion form, taken at a private examination, and publiſhed by him whoſe intereſt it was to make it appear for his advantage? In the next place, the removal of the Bodies from the place where they were firſt interred, to another unknown, gave cauſe for ſtrong ſuſpicions. Had it not been for this removal, nothing would have been more eaſy than to prove the death of the two Princes, ſince the Bodies would have been ſtill found under the Stair-caſe. So, people imagined, the King, wanting ſo natural a proof, had invented this removal, that his not making uſe of ſo convincing a proof might not be thought ſtrange. Beſides, the teſtimony of two villains who confeſſed themſelves guilty of ſo black a crime, and whoſe evidence was ſo advantagious to the King, could not be of any great weight. Accordingly, the King, finding this method inſufficient to undeceive the people, applied himſelf chiefly to diſcover who this impoſtor was, that pretended to be the Duke of York.

The King ſends Spies into Flanders, Hall. Bacon. Stow. Hollingſh.

To ſucceed in this deſign, he found no better way than to bribe ſeveral perſons, who repaired to the counterfeit Duke, under colour of offering him their ſervice. He charged them to uſe all their endeavours to know who and whence he was, and to trace him from his birth to the day he came to the Ducheſs of Burgundy. At the ſame time, he ordered them to make ſtrict inquiry after his correſpondents in England, and obſerve narrowly every thing that paſſed about him. Eſpecially he enjoined ſome of the diſcreeteſt, to ſpare nothing to gain Sir Robert Clifford, much ſuſpecting him to be concerned in the ſecret. It is ſaid, that in order to make diſcoveries, he bribed the ſervants, and even the very confeſſors of the great Men he ſuſpected. Moreover, to procure his ſpies in Flanders the greater credit, he uſed to have them pronounced excommunicate every Sunday at St. Paul's, by virtue of Pope Innocent VIII's Bull. He was ſo well ſerved by theſe ſpies, that, in ſhort, he came to know, the pretended Duke of York was no other than Perkin Warbeck. He had perfect information of his birth, life, actions, profeſſion, and of all the places he had lived at from his Childhood; which was inſtantly divulged throughout the whole Kingdom. Mean while, as the particulars were publiſhed by the King, the principal party concerned, the generality of People did not think themſelves obliged to believe him upon his bare word. Their prejudice made them require more convincing Proofs.

and cauſes them to be excommunicated, the better to conceal them.

He learns the whole Story of Perkin, and publiſhes it.

Whilſt the King's ſpies were acting in Flanders and England, he had two affairs upon his hands from which he wanted to be diſengaged, in caſe any troubles ſhould ariſe in the Kingdom on account of the pretended Duke of York. The firſt was, to make Peace with Scotland; the ſecond, to get the Peace of Eſtaples confirmed by the Pope, according to agreement with the King of France. For this purpoſe, he ſent Ambaſſadors to Edinburgh and Rome. The former concluded with King James a Truce from April the 30th 1494, to that day ſeven years 1501, upon the ſame terms with that of Caldſtream, which expired the day this was to commence. It appears by the Ambaſſadors inſtructions, that he deſired to conclude a marriage between the King of Scotland and Catherine Daughter of the Counteſs of Wiltſhire, and Grand-daughter of the Duke of Somerſet. But this marriage was not propoſed, or at leaſt the Negotiation did not ſucceed (1).

Philip believed he had then the leſs reaſon to regard the King of England, as he had made a Peace with Charles VIII, by a Treaty concluded at Senlis the 23d of May. Charles had reſtored to the Archduke his Siſter Margaret, with the Earldoms of Artois and Burgundy; but kept ſome Towns on promiſe to deliver them as ſoon as Philip was of age.

The Ambaſſadors brought Philip's anſwer to the King, and withal told him, there was colluſion between him and the Ducheſs of Burgundy. Henry was ſo provoked at this proceeding, that he broke off all commerce with the Archduke, and baniſhed all Flemings out of his Kingdom (3). On the 1ſt of November, Henry writ to the King of France, deſiring to be included in the Peace of Senlis, according to the Tenor of the Treaty. The 17th of the ſame month, he notified to him the ſame thing from Ferdinand King of Naples, and Alphonſo Duke of Calabria his Son, who were expreſly included in the Peace of Senlis, on the part of the Emperor and Archduke. But however King Charles deſiſted not from his project of conquering Naples.

Henry notifies to the King of France that he would be included in the Peace of Senlis. Act. Pub. XII. p. 550, 552.

England was very quiet during the year 1494. Perkin Warbeck ſtill remained in Flanders without offering to ſtir, the execution of his adherents convincing him, the King knew more of his affairs than he imagined. Mean time, Henry laboured underhand to inform himſelf more and more concerning the circumſtances of the conſpiracy, and what the Ducheſs of Burgundy was contriving in England and elſewhere. In this Sir Robert Clifford whom he had gained, was very ſerviceable. He learnt by his means, that Perkin had ſtill ſome dependence in Ireland, and had writ to the Earls of Deſmond and Kildare, when he landed there from Portugal. This diſcovery made him reſolve to take care of the affairs of that Iſland, which had been hitherto much neglected. To that end, he made Henry his ſecond Son, then but two years old, Lieutenant or Governor of Ireland; but appointed for Deputy, Sir Edward Poynings, a Man verſed in affairs, and employed in ſeveral Embaſſies. He gave him a very extenſive power as well over the militia, as the civil Government, that he might put the Iſland upon a good foot (4).

King,

1494. King particularly he vigorouſly attacked the Earls of Deſmond and Kildare (1). The firſt took care of himſelf, and kept out of the reach of the Lord-Deputy: but the Earl of Kildare was ſent Priſoner into England, from whence he was quickly ſent back by the King with marks of eſteem and good-will. As he dreaded freſh troubles in Ireland, where a Rebellion in his circumſtances would have been very incommodious, he thought he ſhould prevent them by acts of Grace, rather than ſeverity; and therefore ſent a Commiſſioner (2) with a general Pardon in form, as well for the Earl of Deſmond, as for all the Iriſh Rebels, to ſtifle if poſſible all the ſeeds of Rebellion in the Iſland, where the Houſe of York had but too many friends.

A famous Parliament in Ireland.

Whilſt Poynings was in Ireland, he held a Parliament famous for the Statutes enacted to the advantage of the Crown of England, and of the Engliſh ſettled in the Iſland. One of theſe Statutes, ſtill called Poynings's Law, ran, that the Parliament of Ireland ſhould not be aſſembled before the Lord Lieutenant and Council had acquainted the King with the reaſons, and obtained the Royal Licence under the Great Seal. It was alſo enacted, that all the Statutes of England concerning the publick, ſhould be obſerved in Ireland. Theſe two Statutes are ſtill in force to this day (3).

Henry exacts Money by unlawful ways. Bacon. Stow.

Though Henry had given ſeveral proofs of his ſelf-intereſted and covetous Temper, they might be coloured with ſome pretence, becauſe the ſecret Springs of his Policy were not yet fully known. But it was not the ſame with regard to his proceedings this year, which plainly diſcovered his nature. The pretence of foreign Affairs failing him, he extorted large Sums from private perſons, by forfeitures upon penal Laws, on purpoſe to fill his Coffers. This proceeding was the more diſpleaſing to the People, as they eaſily perceived it flowed from his natural diſpoſition, ſince he was not obliged by any neceſſity to uſe ſuch extraordinary methods. He was in Peace with all the Princes of Europe. He had drawn from the Parliament two very conſiderable Subſidies, of which he had not expended a fourth part, and even that was repaid him with intereſt. Moreover, beſides divers Confiſcations, he received every year fifty thouſand Livres of the King of France. All this, added to the uſual Revenues of the Crown, which were no leſs than in the foregoing Reigns, ſeemed to enable him to eaſe, inſtead of oppreſſing his Subjects with frivolous accuſations to drain their Purſes. The firſt he attacked in this manner was Sir William Capel Alderman of London, who was fined two thouſand ſeven hundred pounds, and forced to compound with the King for ſixteen hundred. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury was taxed with being the Contriver of theſe methods to procure the King money. But whether Henry's Avarice daily increaſed, or the Miniſters who ſucceeded that Prelate were ſtill leſs ſcrupulous than he, People had but too much reaſon to lament him after his death.

Towards the end of this year, Henry gave a freſh inſtance of his deſire of money, which proved very injurious to his good name, eſpecially as he endeavoured to cover it with the veil of juſtice. By ſecret advices from Sir Robert Clifford he was informed, Sir William Stanley, Lord Chamberlain, was one of Perkin Warbeck's Adherents. Tho' that Lord had done him the greateſt Service imaginable, ſince he had procured him the Victory which raiſed him to the Throne, he reſolved to ſacrifice him to his Avarice, under colour of puniſhing his Crime. I ſay, to his Avarice, and not to Juſtice or Revenge. For if we may judge by his uſual Conduct, with regard to the State-Criminals, of whom there was nothing to be got, he would, doubtleſs, have pardoned Stanley, if the deſire of confiſcating his Eſtate, had not rendered him inexorable.

Hall. Bacon. Stow. Hollingſh.

To attain his ends, he ordered Clifford, who was ſtill in Flanders, to repair privately into England. When he heard the Informer was arrived, he removed to the Tower (4), that the great ones who ſhould be accuſed, might be arreſted more conveniently, and without noiſe. Clifford being come to London without diſcovering himſelf, the King aſſembled the Council (5) in the Tower, and ſent for Sir Robert, who falling down at his feet, craved his pardon, offering to declare whatever he knew of the Conſpiracy. The King immediately pardoned him, but on expreſs condition, he would conceal nothing of what was come to his knowledge. Whereupon Clifford impeached ſeveral perſons, and among the reſt the Lord Chamberlain. The King ſeeming extremely ſurprized, bid him take care what he ſaid, ſince his Life lay at ſtake in caſe the Accuſation was groundleſs. Clifford perſiſting, the Lord Chamberlain was preſently apprehended. Next day he was examined by the Council, where he confeſſed enough to condemn him. The great Service he had done the King and the Intereſt of the Earl of Derby his Brother, made him hope he ſhould not be treated with rigour. But two things rendered his Crime unpardonable. The firſt was his immenſe riches, which promiſed the King a plentiful Confiſcation (6). The ſecond, that he was accuſed, and probably, convicted of ſaying [to Clifford,] ſpeaking of Perkin Warbeck, if he were ſure that young Man were King Edward's Son, he would never bear arms againſt him. This was wounding the King in the moſt ſenſible part, ſince he ſeemed to acknowledge, the Houſe of York had a better Title than the Houſe of Lancaſter. Had he been guilty only of this Crime, it is a queſtion, whether the Judges would have ſentenced him to die, but it is likely, he was convicted of acting more directly againſt the King, and holding Intelligence with Warbeck, and the Ducheſs of Burgundy. All the favour he could obtain, was a delay of ſome weeks, to prepare for death, which he ſuffered not till the beginning of the next year (7). The King's Severity on this occaſion ſeemed exceſſive. All the World imagined he would pardon a Lord to whom he was ſo much obliged, and who had even enabled him to exerciſe Acts of Mercy, by procuring him the Crown. Beſides, he was Brother to the Earl of Derby, a zealous Servant, and Father-in-law of the King.

Great Terror in England. Bacon.

The execution of the Lord Chamberlain terrified the whole Kingdom. He was condemned for a Crime of which few Engliſhmen were innocent, namely, for preferring the Title of York, to that of Lancaſter. But what cauſed ſtill greater dread, was, that the King was perceived to have had Spies about the Lord Chamberlain to obſerve his Conduct, which might be every Man's caſe. The great Men durſt not ſpeak their thoughts to one another, for fear thoſe whom they counted their beſt Friends, were the King's Spies. But this reſtraint was in ſome meaſure made up, by ſwarms of Libels againſt the Judges, the Council, and the King himſelf. This Licenſe ſo diſpleaſed the King, that he ordered five perſons, convicted of diſperſing theſe Libels, to be executed.

Negotiation with Scotland. Act. Pub. XII. p. 551, 554.

Though there was a Truce concluded with Scotland to the 30th of April 1501, there ſtill remained ſome differences between the Engliſh and Scots, concerning certain Lands on the Borders of the two Kingdoms, and the Fiſhery of the River Eske. Henry always dreading ſome Inſurrection in the Kingdom, was extremely deſirous to have no Conteſts with his Neighbours. For this reaſon, he had in May this year, moved, that the differences between England and Scotland might be adjuſted. King James ſeeming to deſire the ſame thing, they both ſent Ambaſſadors to Caldſtream, to agree upon ſome Expedient. Richard Fox was at the head of the Engliſh Ambaſſy (9). But with all his Addreſs, he could not end an affair, which in itſelf ſeemed not very difficult. This cauſed Henry to ſuſpect, that the King of Scotland reſerved it for an occaſion of quarrel, and to order the Earl of Surrey to be upon his guard in the North.

Charles VIII undertakes the Conqueſt of Naples. Commin.

Charles VIII undertook this year the long meditated Conqueſt of the Kingdom of Naples. This affair is ſo well known, it would be needleſs to relate the particulars. It is neceſſary, however, briefly to mention the riſe and principal events.

1494. After ſundry Revolutions, the Crown of Naples fell at length to Joan the firſt of that name. But in 1380 Charles de Durazzo, of the Branch of Hungary, pretending to the ſame Crown, and repairing into Italy, attacked Queen Joan, who finding herſelf preſſed by this Enemy, adopted Lewis I. Duke of Anjou, Uncle of Charles VI. King of France. From that time there was a continual War between the two Houſes of Anjou. At laſt, Charles de Durazzo remained in poſſeſſion of Naples, and was ſucceeded by Ladiſlaus his Son, who dying in 1414, left the Crown of Naples to Joan II his Siſter. Mean time, Lewis I, Duke of Anjou, and Lewis II, his Son, always ſtiled themſelves Kings of Sicily, and preſerved their pretenſions to Sicily on this ſide the Pharo, or the Kingdom of Naples. Lewis II, who died in 1417, left three Sons, namely, Lewis III, Renè, and Charles.

In 1421, Lewis III led an army into Naples to dethrone Joan II, who, for ſupport, adopted Alphonſo King of Arragon. Alphonſo arriving in the Kingdom of Naples, forced Lewis III to quit the Country, and retire into France. Shortly after, upon ſome quarrel between Joan and Alphonſo, Joan revoking the adoption of Alphonſo, adopted the ſame Lewis of Anjou, who would have deprived her of the Crown, and declared him her preſumptive Heir and Succeſſor; but Lewis died without Iſſue in 1431. Joan departed this Life the next year, having made a Will in favour of Renè of Anjou, Brother of Lewis III.

Renè made ſome attempts to take poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Naples, but to no purpoſe. Alphonſo King of Arragon kept the Crown till he died in 1458. He left the Kingdom of Arragon to John his lawful Son, and that of Naples to Ferdinand his Baſtard.

Mezerai. In 1474 Renè made a Will, and appointed for his Heir Charles Earl of Main his Nephew, Son of Charles his younger Brother, to the prejudice of Violante his Daughter Ducheſs of Lorrain, and Renè Duke of Lorrain his Grandſon.

Foundation of Charles VIII's Claim. Charles Earl of Main, Nephew and Heir of King Renè, died in 1481, leaving Lewis XI, King of France, his ſole Heir. By virtue of which Will, Charles VIII, Son of Lewis XI, pretended, the Kingdom of Naples was fallen to him.

If what has been ſaid be never ſo little conſidered, it will doubtleſs be perceived, that Charles's title to the Kingdom of Naples was very diſputable. To decide this caſe in a judicial way, it would have been neceſſary to examine two points of equal Importance in this affair. Firſt, whether Joan II had power to revoke the adoption of Alphonſo King of Arragon, and to adopt Lewis of Anjou in his room. It is true, the French Hiſtorians pretend, Alphonſo would have dethroned his Benefactreſs, and upon that ſuppoſition, the reaſon of the revocation ſeems juſt. But the Arragonians grant not the fact. They aſcribe it to Joan's Levity, who was inconſtant and capricious. In the next place, ſuppoſing the Houſe of Anjou's Title better than the Houſe of Arragon's, this ſecond point muſt have been examined, whether King Renè could ſet aſide Violante his Daughter and her Heirs, and give the Kingdom of Naples to Charles Earl of Main his Nephew. It could not be alledged in favour of this Will, that the Kingdom of Naples was a maſculine Fief, ſince the Houſe of Anjou's Title was derived from a Daughter. So Charles VIII could pretend to that Kingdom, only upon ſuppoſition, that the Laws decided theſe two points in his favour, which was very doubtful, not to ſay worſe. Beſides, the Houſe of Arragon had another Title founded upon a ſixty years poſſeſſion. But what rendered this affair very intricate was, that the Popes, as Sovereign Lords of Naples, ſeemed to have determined it in favour of the Houſe of Anjou, by inveſting the Princes of that Houſe with that Kingdom.

Cauſes of the War of Naples. Mezerai. But it was not ſo much his Title to the Kingdom of Naples, that induced Charles VIII to this Conqueſt, as the Juncture of time, and the ſituation of the affairs of Italy. Ferdinand King of Naples had two Sons; namely, Alphonſo who bore the Title of Duke of Calabria, and Frederic. Alphonſo had a Son called Ferdinand, after his Grandfather. Theſe Arragonian Princes were not beloved in Naples, nor in the reſt of Italy. Beſides, old King Ferdinand had baniſhed the Prince of Salerno, with all the other Heads of the Angevin Faction. And theſe Exiles it was that excited Charles to the Conqueſt of Naples. But this alone would not have ſufficed to determine him to this undertaking, had he not been incouraged by Ludovico Sforza, Uncle of the Duke of Milan. The occaſion was this:

Affairs of Milan. Bern. Corio. Hiſt. di Milan. The Duchy of Milan was paſſed from the Family of Viſconti, to that of Sforza; Philippo Maria Viſconti, laſt Duke of that Houſe, having adopted Francis Sforza, who had married Blanch his only Daughter.

Franciſco Sforza, becoming Duke of Milan after the death of his Father-in-law, died in 1466, leaving two Sons, Galeazzo, who ſucceeded him, and Ludovico, ſirnamed the Black. Galeazzo being aſſaſſinated, John Galeazzo his Son ſucceeded him, under the Guardianſhip of his Mother, a Woman infamous for her Lewdneſs, and of Ludovico his Uncle. Some time after, the young Duke married Iſabella, Daughter of Alphonſo Duke of Calabria, eldeſt Son of Ferdinand King of Naples. John Galeazzo being a Prince of a narrow Genius, Ludovico his Uncle engroſſed the whole power, leaving to his Nephew only the bare Title of Duke, without his being much concerned. But Iſabella his Ducheſs, not bearing to ſee the Duke her Spouſe without any Authority, complained to the Duke of Calabria her Father of this ill uſage. Shortly after, the Duke perſuaded Ferdinand his Father to proclaim War againſt Ludovico, to compel him to reſign the Government to his Nephew. 1494.

To avoid this War it was that Ludovico excited Charles VIII to undertake the Conqueſt of Naples, by putting him in hopes, he would aſſiſt him with all his Forces. He had alſo a further deſign to make uſe of Charles's aid, to become maſter of the Duchy of Milan, and diſpoſſeſs John Galeazzo his Nephew. He had now taken ſome private meaſures to that end with the Emperor Maximilian, to whom he had given Blanch his Niece in Marriage, with a Dower of four hundred thouſand Crowns, and Maximilian had privately inveſted him with the Duchy of Milan for him and his Heirs.

Upon the rumour of Charles VIII's preparations for the Conqueſt of Naples, old King Ferdinand offered him a yearly Tribute of fifty thouſand Crowns; but the offer was rejected. Ferdinand died a little before Charles's Expedition, and was ſucceeded by Alphonſo his eldeſt Son.

The war of Naples ſeems at firſt to be entirely foreign to the Hiſtory of England. However, as it was the ſource and origin of many great Events in Europe, in the next Century, I thought it not improper to ſhew the occaſion, and for the ſame reaſon it is neceſſary to relate the principal Events.

Charles VIII departed from Paris in July 1494, and came to Aſti in Piedmont, where he fell ſick of the Small-Pox. This diſtemper detaining him at Aſti, he could not go from thence till the 6th of October, to Turin, where he was forced to borrow the Ducheſs of Savoy's Jewels, ſo ill provided was he of Money for an Enterprize of that conſequence. Ludovico Sforza made haſte to meet him, and accompanied him to Pavia, where they found Duke John Galeazzo out of order, upon eating ſomething that his Uncle Ludovico had cauſed to be given him. When they came to Placentia they heard of John Galeazzo's death. Then Ludovico left the King, to go and take poſſeſſion of the Duchy of Milan, though the late Duke his Nephew had left a Son. Ludovico having obtained what he wanted, had not the ſame attachment for the King of France as before. On the contrary, he thought only how to drive him out of Italy, by a League of which he was the principal promoter. Charles's Departure and Journey to Rome. Commin.

Mean while, Charles purſuing his march, entered the State of Florence, and compelled Peter de Medicis the Duke, to deliver him four of his beſt Towns, and lend him Money. He made his Entry into the City of Florence the 17th of November, and publiſhed a Manifeſto concerning the war of Naples. Then he took the rout to Rome, and all the places in the Eccleſiaſtical State readily brought him their Keys. Alexander VI, upon the King's approach, deſired Prince Ferdinand, Son of the King of Naples, to depart from Rome, where he was received ſome time before. On the other hand, Frederic Brother of Alphonſo, who was upon the Coaſt of Genoa with a Fleet, came to Naples, where all was in the utmoſt Conſternation. Thus Charles having paſſed through Italy without the leaſt oppoſition, entered Rome the 28th of December, whilſt the Pope in a fright ſhut himſelf up in the Caſtle of Angelo for the Security of his perſon. It is time now to return to the affairs of England. 1495.

Precaution of Henry againſt Scotland. Act. Pub. XII. p. 568. Henry perceiving the Negotiation with Scotland proceeded very ſlowly, without his being able to diſcover any viſible reaſon, was apprehenſive that King James would take occaſion from their differences about the Fiſhery of the River Eske, to break the Truce. So, not to be ſurprized, he ſent the Earl of Surrey orders to levy Troops for the defence of the North, againſt the attempts of the Scots and Iriſh. Theſe attempts which he pretended to fear, were only an excuſe to put himſelf in a State of defence, in caſe the King of Scotland ſhould attack him.

The Duke of York is made Governor of the North. Act. Pub. XII. p. 569. Shortly after, he made the Duke of York his ſecond Son Preſident of the northern Marches, though he was but three years old. He had made him laſt year Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and by that means kept in his own Coffers the Salaries of theſe two Poſts, which muſt have been given to two ſeveral Lords. Never Prince better underſtood the Art of husbanding his Money, and making every thing turn to his profit.

The Pope's Bull about the Rebels. Act. Pub. XII. p. 573.

Perkin's Attempt upon the County of Kent miſcarries. Hall. Bacon.

Hitherto Perkin Warbeck had not ventured to make any attempt in England, knowing that the King was informed of all his Correſpondents. But as the Dutcheſs of Burgundy could not think, of relinquiſhing her hopes of gaining ſome advantage by the Idol formed by herſelf, ſhe reſolved at length to ſend him into England. She judged it neceſſary to ſound the People's Affection for the Houſe of York, without waiting any longer for the Aſſiſtance of the great Men, who being narrowly watched were very cautious. Beſides, ſhe perceived, if the people ſeemed ready to riſe, there would be no want of great Men to ſupport and conduct them. Wherefore, ſhe gave orders to draw together ſome Forces and Ships, and cauſed Perkin Warbeck to imbark, and make a deſcent in the County of Kent. Mean while, Henry knowing nothing of theſe preparations in Flanders, reſolved to go in progreſs to Yorkſhire (2) to viſit the Counteſs his Mother, which ſeemed to be a Juncture very favorable to Perkin's deſign. But as the projected deſcent miſcarried, it was not doubted, that the King being informed of the pretended Duke of York's Intent, had taken that Journey on purpoſe to draw him into the Snare, ſo perſwaded were people that Policy governed all his Actions.

Perkin, purſuant to the Dutcheſs of Burgundy's directions, arrived upon the Coaſt of Kent (3), near Sandwich, and landed ſome Men to ſound the Inclination of the Inhabitants. Theſe Troops made great boaſts of the powerful Armament the Duke of York had made in Flanders, pretending the Ships in ſight were but a ſmall part of the Fleet which would ſoon appear. But the people perceiving, theſe Men were almoſt all Foreigners, inſtead of joining them, adviſed with the Gentlemen of the County to know how they were to behave. And it was reſolved, they ſhould feign to be ready to aſſiſt Perkin, in order to allure him to land and take him priſoner. Purſuant to this reſolution, the people took arms and appeared on the Coaſt, making ſigns to invite Perkin and his Men to land. But Perkin and his Counſellor Frion ſuſpecting the artifice, kept on board, expecting the return of ſome of their people, to inform them of what paſſed on ſhore. At laſt, the Kentiſhmen finding they could draw in no more, fell upon thoſe that were already landed, and cut them in pieces, except about a hundred and fifty, who being taken alive, were all hanged by the King's order. Perkin being Eye-witneſs of his people's misfortune, weighed Anchor and returned into Flanders. Henry, who was then on his progreſs, hearing of the deſcent, was about to turn back towards Kent; but preſently after receiving news of what had paſſed, he continued his Journey (4), and ſpent ſome time with the Counteſs his Mother, at the Earl of Derby's Houſe (5). His intent was thereby to make a ſort of excuſe to that Lord for putting his Brother to death, and give him withal, a proof of the continuance of his favour.

Hall. Bacon. Stow. Hollingſh.

Remarkable Statute. Bacon.

The 13th of October the King called a Parliament, where it was enacted, That no perſon ſhould be impeached or attainted for aſſiſting the King for the time being. It is eaſy to ſee, the deſign of this Act was to hinder a cloſe examination of the King's title to the Crown, ſince let what would be the conſequence, thoſe that ſerved him would be always ſafe (6). Indeed, the precedent he had himſelf given, in cauſing thoſe to be condemned that bore arms for Richard III, muſt have made his friends apprehenſive of being in the ſame caſe, if the like Revolution ſhould happen. But the Clauſe added in the body of the Statute, that if for the future, any Act of Attainder ſhould paſs againſt ſuch as aſſiſted the King for the time being, it ſhould be of no force; this Clauſe I ſay, was void and of no effect. For how could an Act of this, limit the power of a future, Parliament, and cauſe an Act, in its nature revocable, not to be ſo? Mean while, this Statute, which ſeemed to be made ſolely for the people's ſafety, but was however, only for the King's Security, diſcovered Henry's uneaſineſs and uncertainty concerning his title. 1495.

Another to pay the Benevolence. Act. Pub. XII. p. 632.

There was alſo an Act paſſed to oblige thoſe who had not paid their quota of the Benevolence, to pay the Arrears by ſuch a time. This Act brought in large Sums to the King, the Arrears of this Tax being very conſiderable, becauſe the war with France not having laſted any time, many perſons had declined to pay either in full or in part. It appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury was indebted fifteen hundred Pounds Sterling (7).

Warbeck comes to Ireland. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

Whilſt the Parliament was yet aſſembled, the King received advice, that Perkin Warbeck was landed in Ireland. As this could not be but with ſome ill deſign, he gave order that the Coaſts ſhould be ſtrictly guarded, to be ready to oppoſe a deſcent wherever it was made. It was but too true, that the Dutcheſs of Burgundy had ſent Perkin into Ireland to raiſe a Rebellion, and to that end, ſhe had privately treated with the King of Scotland, who, it is likely, had promiſed to aid him. The common opinion is, that the Emperor, the Archduke Philip, and the King of France, were likewiſe in the plot: The two firſt, in revenge of Henry's prohibition to his Subjects of all Commerce with the Low-Countries, and the other, to hinder his entering into a League that was forming in Italy, to which he was ſtrongly ſollicited. Be this as it will, very probably, James, in promiſing to eſpouſe the Intereſts of the pretended Duke of York, had been led thereto by ſome private view, or by the Sollicitation of ſome other Prince.

Bacon.

Warbeck goes to Scotland, and King James marries him to one of his Relations. Hall. Stow. Bacon.

Mean while, ſince Poynings had been in Ireland, the affairs of that Iſland were quite altered. So, Perkin not finding the Country inclined to favour his deſigns, departed for Scotland, where in all appearance, he knew he ſhould be welcome. When he came to Edinburgh, he demanded an Audience of the King, by the name of the Duke of York. James feigning an extreme ſurprize, gave him a ſolemn reception in the preſence of the whole Court. Perkin made a long Speech, recounting his pretended Adventures, and how he eſcaped the Cruelty of Richard III. Then, he inveighed againſt Henry Tudor, who had uſurped the Crown of England, and unjuſtly detained it from the lawful Heirs of Edward IV. He inlarged upon the methods he had uſed to endeavour t recover his Kingdom. He concluded with ſaying, that ſundry Accidents having prevented him from ſucceeding, he was come to put himſelf under his Protection, in hopes that with the aſſiſtance of ſo generous a Prince, he ſhould expel the Uſurper, and aſcend the Throne of his Anceſtors. That then he ſhould always regard him as a Brother, and never miſs an opportunity of ſhowing his gratitude.

Ibid.

James ſeemed to be moved with Perkin's misfortunes, and told him, whoever he was, he ſhould not repent of putting himſelf into his hands. However, he pretended ſtill to have ſome doubt, to ſhow it was upon mature examination that he was convinced of the truth. Shortly after, he publickly owned him for Duke of York, and gave him in marriage, Catherine Gordon Daughter of the Earl of Huntley, one of the handſomeſt and moſt accompliſhed Ladies in Scotland.

Henry proje ts to marry his Daughter to the King of Scotland. Act. Pub. XII. p. 572.

Henry whether he had received private notice of what was plotting againſt him, or it was a pure effect of his foreſight, ardently wiſhed to live in good underſtanding with the King of Scotland. To that end, he had impowered his Ambaſſadors (8), who were to repair to Caldſtream, to treat of the marriage of Margaret his eldeſt Daughter with that Prince. This marriage was indeed accompliſhed ſome years after; but, in all likelihood, was not mentioned in this congreſs, the Ambaſſadors of England having doubtleſs perceived that ſuch a propoſal would be unſeaſonable.

1495. ecclesiastical State, with Cardinal Cæsar Borgia natural Son of Pope Alexander VI in Hostage. Whilst he was upon the march, the Ambassador of Ferdinand King of Spain told him from his master, that when he promised not to molest him in the conquest of Naples, he did not mean that this conquest was to extend to all Italy. That notwithstanding, he saw him in possession of Florence, Pisa, and all the Papal Dominions. That therefore he declared, he did not think himself bound to the observance of their Treaty, and accordingly the Ambassador tore it in pieces before his face. Charles who was sailing with a prosperous gale, made a jest of these threats, and pursued his march.

Mean while Alphonso, the new King of Naples, finding himself attacked by a powerful King who was now upon the borders of his Dominions, was entirely discouraged. As he knew he was not beloved by his Subjects, he resigned his Crown to Ferdinand his Son, and retired to a Monastery, where he died this very year. The new King willing to defend his Kingdom, advanced towards the frontiers to endeavour to stop the King of France. But he saw himself suddenly deserted by his own Troops. In this extremity he would have retired to Naples, but found the Gates shut. In short, he was forced to seek a retreat in the little Isle of Ischia, having first garrisoned the Castles of his Metropolis, where he could enter without passing through the City.

In the mean time, Charles still continued his march. Trivulzi a Milanese, who was in the service of the King of Naples, having surrendered Capua, all the rest of the Towns sent him Deputies with offers of submission. At last, he entered Naples the 22d of February, and within few days became master of the Castles.

Such a torrent of success so blinded the young Monarch and his Council, that they knew not how to take any just measures for the preservation of this Conquest. By degrees the Towns that had submitted, returned to their Sovereign; his Army, which was not very numerous, being unable to furnish Garrisons every where. Besides, the French made themselves so odious to the people of Naples, that they soon repented of receiving them.

Bembo. But what most imbroiled the Conqueror's affairs, was a League formed against him by the Pope, the Emperor, the King of Spain, the Archduke, the King of Naples, Ludovico Sforza new Duke of Milan, and the Republick of Venice. This League, which was for twenty-five years, was signed the 25th of March 1495, and at the same time the Confederates began to assemble their Forces.

Charles found then, it was time to think of his return. But he was resolved first to make a triumphant entry into Naples, from whence he departed the 20th of May in order for France, leaving but few Troops to defend his Conquest. But the Allies did not intend to suffer him to retire thus peaceably. They expected him upon his rout, with an Army of forty thousand Men, and posted themselves at Fornova to oppose his passage. Though Charles was very inferior in number of Troops (1), he was determined to give them Battle, being sensible that he must either conquer or perish. The Battle was fought on the 6th of July, and the success was favorable to the King of France, who defeated that formidable Army and came to Asti the 15th of the same month (2).

Battle of Fornova.

Whilst he was retiring through Italy, Naples submitted again to Ferdinand, and almost all the rest of the Towns that were still in the French interest followed her example. The Duke of Montpensier, left by Charles at Naples with a few Troops, retired to the Castle of le Ovo, where after maintaining a Siege of three months, he was forced at last to capitulate. Thus Charles who had conquered the Kingdom of Naples in the space of three weeks, lost it with the same rapidity. He formed afterwards several projects to recover his Conquest, which, by the obstacles that occurred, came to nothing.

Philip the Archduke assumes the Government of the Low Countries. Act. Pub. XII. p. 576.

This year the Emperor Maximilian came into the Low-Countries, and resigned the Government to his Son Philip, though he still wanted some years of being of Age. After that, he returned into Germany. Philip being no longer under the Emperor's Guardianship, sent, about the end of the year, Ambassadors to Henry to desire the renewal of the Commerce between England and the Low-Countries.

1496. Treaty between England and Flanders. Feb. 24. Ib. p. 578--591. Bacon.

The Ambassadors found no great difficulty to succeed in their Negotiation. The renewal of the Commerce which they were come to desire, was no less necessary for the English than for the Flemings. So, the 24th of February 1496 was concluded at London a Treaty of Peace and perpetual amity between Henry and Philip, and the Trade between the two nations was settled to the satisfaction of both parties. 1496.

Among the Articles of this Treaty, there were two particularly remarkable. By the first, the two Princes ingaged to give neither aid nor refuge to the rebellious Subjects of either. Particularly, Philip obliged himself expresly to hinder the Duchess Dowager of Burgundy, from harbouring the King's rebellious Subjects in the Lands she possessed, by what title soever she held them, whether of Dower or otherwise. That in case she acted contrary to this prohibition, he promised to deprive her of all her possessions in the Low-Countries.

By another Article it was expresly agreed, that any Vessel suffering Shipwrack on the Coasts of either of the two Princes, should not be liable to confiscation, provided there was left alive a Man, Woman, or Child, a Dog, a Cat, or a Cock.

The Flemings called this Treaty [Intercursus Magnus] or the great Treaty of Commerce, not only by reason of the great number of Articles, but chiefly with respect to another, made afterwards, and which not being so much to their advantage, was termed [Intercursus Malus] or the bad Treaty. Ibid. Act. Pub. XII. p. 695, 713.

We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that March the 5th this year, the King granted a Patent to John Cabott a Venetian, and to three of his Sons (3), to go in quest of new Lands with English Colours (4). The Terms were, that after all charges deducted, they should give the King a fifth of the Profit (5). Patent to John Cabott Ib. p. 595.

Mean while, the King of Scotland, not content with affording the pretended Duke of York a Sanctuary in his Dominions, would likewise undertake to place him on the Throne of England. He was told, that as soon as he appeared in that Kingdom at the head of an Army, all the Yorkists would rise in favour of the Pretender. To that end it was, that immediately after his arrival in England he took care to disperse the counterfeit Duke's Proclamation, wherein the King was termed Usurper, Tyrant, and Murderer. Moreover, he promised all sorts of favours to such as would join the lawful Heir, to destroy him that unjustly detained the Crown. But this Proclamation was so ineffectual, that not a Man offered to join the Scots. The truth is, Henry was not beloved, especially in those parts. But as, since Perkin had begun to appear by the name of Duke of York, many were undeceived, and others in doubt, it was not thought proper to hazard life and fortune, without a greater assurance that it was really for a Son of Edward IV. Besides, the execution of the Lord Chamberlain was a terror to all, as no Man could reasonably expect the King's pardon, since that Lord was not spared. At length, James seeing he waited in vain that the English would take arms in favour of his Duke of York, and being unwilling wholly to lose his labour, ravaged Northumberland and got a great booty. Then Perkin feigning to be extremely moved with the calamities of the English, conjured that Prince, before his whole Court, to spare his miserable Subjects. This was a very artful device to perswade the Publick he was really what he pretended to be. James replied with a smile, he thought him very generous to be so careful for what was none of his, in order to save it for his enemy's use. Mean while, the news that an English Army was advancing, made him resolve to return into his own Country, being unwilling to expose his great spoils to the hazard of a Battle. Thus the expedition, from which he expected so great effects, ended only in the ruin of the People of Northumberland. The King of Scotland and Warbeck's Invasion. Buchanan. Bacon. Act. Pub. XII. p. 647. Stow. Proclamation in the name of the Duke of York. Hall. Bacon. The English do not join him. James ravages Northumberland Warbeck's Cunning. Hall. Bacon. Hollingsh.

Whilst these things passed in England, Charles VIII fearing Henry would enter into the league of Italy, took care to have the Peace of Estaples confirmed by the States, as he was bound by the Treaty, which he had hitherto neglected, though it was confirmed by the Parliament of England the last year. However, as he thought not proper to assemble the States General, he caused the Peace to be approved by the States of each Province, with which, in all appearance, Henry was satisfied. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, the approbations of the States of Languedoc, Normandy, and several other Provinces, as likewise of particular Towns of little note, signed by great numbers of common people, as Tradesmen and Husbandmen. Charles VIII causes the Peace of Estaples to be confirmed by the States. Act. Pub. XII. p. 572, 592, 596, 597, 598, 634.

Though the King of Scotland's Invasion had produced no great effect, Henry was however apprehensive of the consequences.

But it appears from Cardinal Bembo, and other Italian Authors, that the King of France retired, after this Battle, in the utmost hurry; and that Ludovico Sforza, and Francisco Gonzaga, the Italian General, favoured his escape. As their Forces were much superior to those of the French King, they might easily have cut off his Retreat, if they had not acted treacherously, as it is undeniably plain they did. See *Card. He knew his Subjects were not pleaſed; that the Yorkiſts were very numerous; that Ireland was not well-affected; and that Perkin Warbeck was in Scotland ready to take advantage of theſe diſpoſitions. So, to prevent the danger which might ariſe from all theſe quarters, he granted firſt a general pardon to all the Iriſh Adherents of the pretended Duke of York, leſt the dread of puniſhment ſhould carry them to revolt. In the ſecond place, he commiſſioned Richard Fox Biſhop of Durham to try, as of himſelf, to enter into Negotiation with the King of Scotland, to treat of the marriage of his eldeſt Daughter Margaret with that Prince. Some time before, he had diſpatched to Rome Robert Sherburn, who had in his name entered into the league of Italy (2) againſt Charles VIII, and the 23d of September ratified what his Ambaſſador had done. He thereby thought himſelf ſufficiently ſupported. For, he had nothing to fear from the King of France, who was elſewhere employed, and the moſt potent Princes of Europe were his Friends and Allies. As for the King of Scotland, he believed, he could eaſily reſiſt him in caſe of attack. However, though he had now taken meaſures to make Peace with that Prince, and had reaſon to hope for ſucceſs, he believed he ought not to loſe this opportunity to demand an aid of money of the Parliament, as well to put himſelf in a ſtate of defence, as to revenge the inſults of the Scots. For this purpoſe, he called a Parliament the 16th of January following. It was however eaſy to foreſee, the King of Scotland being ſupported neither by France, nor the Archduke, nor the Ducheſs of Burgundy, would not undertake to maintain alone a War for the ſake of Perkin Warbeck, though he was ſo blind as to believe him the real Duke of York.

1497. The Parliament meets. Bacon.

Subſidy given for the Scotch War. Hollingſh.

The Parliament being aſſembled the beginning of the year 1497 (4), the King made a Speech to both Houſes, highly aggravating the affront received from the King of Scotland. He repreſented very pathetically, the calamities endured by his northern Subjects, at a time when the Truce ſhould have ſecured them from ſuch inſults. In ſhort, he told them, his honour and the protection he owed his People, would not ſuffer him to let theſe wrongs paſs unrevenged. The Parliament underſtanding him well, gave him a Subſidy (5), after which, they were inſtantly diſſolved, as having been called purpoſely for that affair.

The King raiſes the Subſidy.

Though Henry hoped much from his Negotiation with the King of Scotland, he perceived it neceſſary to prepare for War. Otherwiſe Negotiations generally prove fruitleſs. The levy of the Subſidy granted by the Parliament was the firſt and principal preparation. The neceſſity of a War with Scotland afforded the King a pretence to haſten that affair, from which he expected the ſame advantage as from that of Bretagne; that is to ſay, to put the entire Subſidy into his Coffers. To that end, it was neceſſary the whole ſhould be levied before the Peace was concluded with Scotland, elſe the People would pay their money with reluctance. As the King ſet his heart upon this buſineſs, he gave very ſtrict orders to the Commiſſioners, who were to gather the Subſidy in the ſeveral Counties.

Rebellion in Cornwal. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh. Bacon.

The Commiſſioners proceeding with great rigour, met in the County of Cornwal with unexpected oppoſition. The Corniſhmen being leſs tractable than thoſe of other Counties, loudly complained, that for ſome petty damage done to the other end of the Kingdom, they were robbed of their neceſſary ſubſiſtence. Theſe murmurs were incouraged by one Michael Joſeph, a Farrier of Bodmin, and Thomas Flammock, a Lawyer. Flammock affirmed, that ſubſidies were not to be granted or levied for the War of Scotland, (the Law having provided for it by Eſcuage) much leſs when the Scotch Invaſion was made a pretence to fleece the whole Kingdom: That it would be a ſhame to ſubmit to ſuch an oppreſſion, and all the miſchief ſolely proceeded from the King's Miniſters, who made their Court at the poor people's coſt: That to free themſelves from theſe grievances, it was proper to take arms, and without injuring any perſon, go and preſent a Petition to the King, to pray him to deſiſt from this Tax, and puniſh his evil Counſellors, for a warning to others how they gave him ſuch advice for the future: That a greater ſervice could not be done to the Kingdom, than to deliver it from ſuch Harpies, who ruined it under colour of procuring the King's good. Flammock's chief aim was at [Morton] Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Reginald Bray, becauſe they were generally the King's inſtruments in affairs of this nature. 1497. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

The Rebels march towards London.

Flammock and Joſeph perceiving the people began to take fire, offered to lead them, till ſome Perſon of quality ſhould head them, which, as they ſaid, would ſoon be. And indeed, it appeared afterwards, they were incouraged by Perſons of greater conſideration. This was ſufficient to excite all the rabble of the Country to an inſurrection; and arming themſelves in the beſt manner they could, they marched under the conduct of theſe two Incendiaries into Devonſhire, and from thence into Somerſetſhire. The number of the rebels daily increaſed, by many People of the places where they paſſed, who had nothing to loſe, and were inflamed by the King's ſecret enemies. At Taunton, they killed a Commiſſioner (6), who had ſignalized himſelf by his rigour, in levying the Subſidy. This was all the miſchief they did in their march. Then they proceeded to Wells, where the Lord Audley (7), a Nobleman of a reſtleſs and diſcontented Spirit came and joined them, and was immediately accepted as their General. Audley putting himſelf at their head, led them directly to Salisbury, and from thence to Wincheſter, without ſuffering them to commit any violence, and obliging them to be ſatisfied with a bare ſubſiſtence. When they came to Wincheſter, inſtead of marching to London, as was intended at firſt, they forced their General to lead them into Kent. Flammock having told them, the People of that County were very fond of liberty, they fancied they ſhould be immediately joined by them, in defence of the rights and privileges of the Nation. But when they came there, they were greatly diſappointed. By the diligence of ſome Kentiſh Lords (8), not a Man offered to take arms in their favour. This coldneſs diſcouraged many of the rebels, who foreſeeing their enterprize would not be ſucceſsful, returned quietly to their homes. But thoſe that remained, being encouraged by the King's remiſſineſs, who had ſuffered them to proceed ſo far unmoleſted, inſolently boaſted, they would give him Battle, or take London before his face. In this reſolution they went and encamped (9) between Greenwich and Eltham, within a few miles of London. Hall. Hall. Stow. Bacon. The Lord Audley heads them. They march into Kent, where no body joins them. Hollingſh. Bacon. They march to London.

The King's meaſures againſt the Rebels. Ibid.

When the King firſt heard of this Inſurrection, he was under ſome Conſternation. A war with Scotland, a Rebellion in the Kingdom, and a Pretender to the Crown, ſeemed to him to be three affairs of the laſt Importance, eſpecially as they came upon him at once. Beſides, his inward uneaſineſs concerning the doubtfulneſs of his title, helped to magnify objects. He was apprehenſive that the Corniſh Rebellion was the beginning of a general Conſpiracy, whereof Perkin was waiting the iſſue in Scotland. Happily for him, this Rebellion was at a time when he had an army in readineſs, which was to march into the North, under the Command of the Lord d'Aubeney. But the news of the Inſurrection made him keep his Forces about London, not thinking fit to ſend them into the North at ſuch a Juncture. He contented himſelf therefore with detaching the Earl of Surrey, and ſending him towards the borders of Scotland to oppoſe King James, in caſe he thought of making a ſecond Inroad into England. Mean while, the Rebels traverſed the Counties, and the King made no motion to ſtop them. This Conduct ſurprized all the World, conſidering it was his Cuſtom ſpeedily to march to the place where danger began to appear. But upon this occaſion he thought beſt to act otherwiſe for ſeveral reaſons. Firſt, he was very glad the Rebels were ſo far from their homes, and harraſſed themſelves with long marches. But the chief reaſon of his flowneſs was, that he would ſee if they had any Correſpondents in other Countries, in order to divide his army, if neceſſary, or haſten to the relief of the weakeſt. In fine, Age, and the continued enjoyment of a Crown, had, doubtleſs, rendered him leſs in love with dangers. Any other way ſeemed to him leſs hazardous than a battle, to remedy Evils of this nature.

The King reſolves to give them Battle. Hall. Bacon.

But when the Rebels were encamped on Black-Heath, from whence they might have a proſpect of London, the King could no longer delay to attack them. He would have given occaſion to believe his coldneſs proceeded from fear, which might have produced very ill effects among the people. However, as he was much ſuperior to the Male-contents, both in number of Troops and Military knowledge, he reſolved ſo to diſpoſe all things, as to leave little to Hazard or Fortune. To that end, he divided his army into three Bodies, the firſt whereof, commanded by the Earl of Oxford (1), was ordered behind the hill, where the Rebels were encamped, to cut off their retreat, and, if neceſſary, attack them in the rear. The ſecond, led by the Lord d'Aubeney, was appointed to charge them in the front. The King retained the third about his own perſon, and encamped in St. George's Fields, that in caſe of ill Succeſs he might be ready to renew the fight, or throw himſelf into London and ſecure the City as he ſhould think proper. Beſides, he was not ſo far off, but he could ſuccour his people during the battle.

Battle of Black-heath, where the Rebels are worſted. June 22. Hall. Hollingſh. Bacon.

Every thing ſucceeded as the King expected. The Rebels ſuffered themſelves to be deceived by a report he had cauſed to be ſpread, that he intended to give them battle on the Monday following, whereas he attacked them on the Saturday, which of all the days of the week he fancied to be the moſt fortunate. As they expected it not, they were ſo ſurprized that they had ſcarce time to draw up. On the other hand, for want of Intelligence, they ſuffered themſelves to be ſurrounded by the Earl of Oxford, who being poſted behind them, hindered their retreat. So, of ſix thouſand (2), which was their number, two thouſand were ſlain on the ſpot, and the reſt forced to ſurrender at diſcretion, there being no way to eſcape. The King for this once, cauſed to be executed only the Lord Audley (3), Flammock and the Farrier (4), who were taken alive, but gave the priſoners to the Captors, with leave to compound with them for their ranſoms as they ſhould judge fit. It is not unlikely, that the moderation of the Rebels in their march from Cornwal to London, tempered alſo the King's Severity; eſpecially as they had not aſſerted the title of the Houſe of York, a Crime he never forgave. Be this as it will, he was ſatisfied with theſe three Victims, for the expiation of this great Rebellion.

But whilſt Henry was employed againſt the Corniſh Rebels, the King of Scotland thinking it a favorable Juncture, made a ſecond Irruption into England, and appeared before the Caſtle of Norham. But the Earl of Surrey, then in Yorkſhire, haſtening to its relief (5), James raiſed the Siege and retired into his own Kingdom. The Earl of Surrey, not ſatisfied with driving him out of England, purſued him into Scotland, and took the little Town of Aton. This war was inconvenient to the King upon ſeveral accounts. Firſt, he could not continue it, without uſing all the Money given by the Parliament, which he would have gladly avoided. Beſides, Perkin Warbeck made him uneaſy, and he perceived it would be eaſier to remove him from Scotland by Treaty, than by Arms. He would not however make the firſt advances, but wiſhed the propoſal of peace to come from another, to avoid the diſgrace of a refuſal, in caſe the King of Scotland was diſinclined. 1497. Act. Whilſt he was in this perplexity, he bethought himſelf that Don Pedro d' Ayala, the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, would be a proper Inſtrument to accompliſh this affair. Ayala willingly undertook to go to the King of Scotland, and propoſe, as of himſelf, an agreement with the King of England. He uſed for pretence, that King Ferdinand his maſter, could receive no greater ſatisfaction, than to ſee the two Kings his Friends and Allies, live in peace and good neighbourhood. This expedient ſucceeded according to Henry's expectation. The Ambaſſador found the King of Scotland ſo well inclined, that he writ to the King, if he would enter into Negotiation, he did not queſtion the ſucceſs. Whereupon the two Kings ſent their Ambaſſadors (6) to Aton to treat of a Peace, Ayala performing the office of mediator. The greateſt difficulty that occurred in this Negotiation, was concerning Perkin Warbeck, whom Henry demanded, and the King of Scotland would not deliver. The Biſhop of Durham (7) perceiving he could not gain that point, propoſed an Interview of the two Kings at Newcaſtle. But when it was mentioned to the King of Scotland, he ſaid, though he was very deſirous of Peace, he would not go and beg it of his enemy. At length, an expedient was found agreeable to both parties. And that was, the King of Scotland ſhould honorably diſmiſs the pretended Duke of York, before the Negotiation of a Peace was carried any farther, leſt he ſhould be thought to be forced to it; that afterwards they ſhould treat as if Perkin had never been in Scotland.

Purſuant to this agreement, James told the pretended Duke, he had done for him all that lay in his power: That he had twice entered England at the head of an Army, to try the diſpoſition of the Engliſh: That not having found what was expected, there was no likelihood that with his forces alone, he could place him on the Throne, and diſpoſſeſs a King ſo firmly eſtabliſhed: That his misfortune proceeded ſolely from the Engliſh refuſing to eſpouſe his quarrel, and his being forſaken by thoſe who had engaged him in the undertaking, whilſt the Scots expoſed their Lives for his ſake: That therefore he adviſed him to ſeek his fortune elſewhere; but nevertheleſs, he would make good what he told him at firſt, That he ſhould not repent of putting himſelf into his hands. Perkin ſeeing the King of Scotland bent to diſmiſs him, thanked him for the protection he had hitherto given him, and for all his other favours, entreating him to convey him into Ireland with his Wife, which the King immediately granted.

A Truce of ſeven years between Scotland and England. Act. Pub. XII. p. 673.

As ſoon as Perkin Warbeck was removed from Scotland, there were no farther obſtacles to a Peace. The Ambaſſadors, aſſembled at Aton, ſigned a Truce for ſeven years, commencing the 30th of September, the day of ſigning the Treaty. It was expreſsly agreed, that neither of the two Kings ſhould make war upon the other, by himſelf or Subjects, or by any other Perſon, whereby Perkin Warbeck was ſufficiently underſtood without naming him: That with reſpect to certain points not ſettled by the Ambaſſadors, the two Kings referred them to the deciſion of Ferdinand and Iſabella. Afterwards this Truce, limited to ſeven years, was prolonged till a year after the death of the Survivor of the two Princes. In fine, each of the two Kings gave Letters Patents to the Mediator, deſiring him to report to Ferdinand and Iſabella the differences yet undecided, promiſing to ſtand to their determination. Theſe Letters were full of marks of eſteem and acknowledgment for the Ambaſſador, and the two Kings ſhowed how well pleaſed they were with his equity, wiſdom, impartiality, and the trouble he had readily taken upon him. Nothing could be more honorable for Ayala, whom the Engliſh and Scotch Writers call Hialas or Elias, than the perfect confidence placed in him by theſe two Monarchs. But then, it may be ſaid, he had the

First Proposal of the Marriage of Margaret with the King of Scotland.

I observed that in 1495 and 1496, Henry empowered his Ambassadors to treat of a Marriage between Margaret his Daughter and the King of Scotland. But it does not appear, this affair was mentioned in any of the former Negotiations, or even in this I have been speaking of. It is however very probable, that Henry, who desired this Marriage, did not fail to insinuate the Proposal by the Spanish Ambassador, who was in his interest and confidence. It was a very proper occasion, since Ayala might make the overture as from himself, without engaging Henry in case of refusal. It went no farther for this time, but we shall see presently the happy effects of this Overture, which gave Birth to the Union of the two Kingdoms.

Death of the Prince of Spain. Mayern.

In the beginning of the year, Margaret of Austria, Sister of the Archduke, went into Spain to Don John her Husband. The nuptials were celebrated with great solemnity and magnificence. But in a few months after, Don John died, leaving the Princess with Child, who was delivered of a still-born Infant.

Marriage of Isabella his Sister with the King of Portugal.

By the death of Don John, his Sister Isabella, Widow of Prince Alphonso of Portugal, became Heir-apparent of the Kingdoms of Castile and Arragon. Since the death of the Prince her Spouse, she had been contracted to Don Manuel new King of Portugal, who hearing of Don John's Sickness, so pressed his marriage that it was consummated before that Prince expired.

Affairs of France.

The last year, as was related, Charles VIII lost the Kingdom of Naples. Though the divisions among the Princes of Italy, seemed to invite him to this Conquest, he could never resolve, because he had turned all his thoughts to love and pleasure. He duly paid Henry twenty five thousand Livres every half year, as he was bound by the Treaty of Estaples, for fear of drawing upon himself new troubles from England.

Act. Pub. XII. XIII.

1498. After the Treaty of Estaples, there was neither War nor Difference between France and England during the rest of Henry VII's reign. Charles and Henry stood in awe of each other. Charles, who at first had formed vast projects, perceived, the King of England was the only Prince that could lay obstacles in his way. Afterwards, when he desisted from the War of Italy, and indulged his pleasures, he always feared that a War with Henry would disturb his tranquillity. Henry on his part dreaded all foreign Wars, and particularly with France, by reason of his domestick enemies. Thus the two Monarchs having the same interest, lived in Peace till Charles's death, on the 6th of April 1498. The Duke of Orleans, who succeeded him by the name of Lewis XII, was no less careful to preserve a good understanding with England (1). As he turned all his thoughts to Italy, it highly concerned him to keep fair with Henry, who would have it in his power to overthrow all his projects by a diversion in Picardy. As soon as Lewis was on the Throne, he caused his marriage with Jane Daughter of Lewis XI to be annulled, in order to espouse Ann of Bretagne his predecessor's Widow. Otherwise he would have run the risk of seeing Bretagne once more severed from France, and in the hands of a foreign House.

Fresh troubles in England.

Though Henry had nothing to fear from abroad, since he was in Peace with all the Princes of Europe, it was not the same with regard to his own Subjects. Before he could acquire that perfect tranquillity, he so earnestly longed for, he had a fresh attack to maintain from the Cornishmen. Perkin Warbeck himself, who having learnt to live like a Prince, could not resolve to return to his primitive state, embraced this opportunity to create him new troubles.

Insurrection in Cornwal. Stow. Hollingsh. Bacon.

The Cornish Rebels had been treated more gently than they had reason to expect, considering the nature of their crime, which Sovereigns never willingly pardon. Most of them had compounded for two or three shillings a Man, so miserable were they. These being returned home, publickly said, if the King had treated them with lenity, it was not from a motive of clemency, but because he was sensible if he punished all that were of their mind, he must hang up three parts in four of his Subjects. These discourses making their friends and neighbours believe, the whole Kingdom was ready to rise, they began to flock together, and shew they were not discouraged by the Battle of Black-Heath. At last some of the most fiery hearing Perkin Warbeck was in Ireland, proposed to send for him and set him at their head. The proposal meeting with applause, they sent to Warbeck, that if he would come among them, he should find no contemptible aid, and that with the assistance of other good Englishmen, they hoped to place him on the Throne. 1498.

The Rebels send for Perkin. Bacon.

Perkin being without any refuge in Ireland, and expecting nothing more either from Scotland, or France, or the Low-Countries, gladly accepted the invitation. He had with him for Counsellors, Hern a broken Mercer, Skelton a Taylor, and Astley a Scrivener, who persuaded him to take that course. They told him, he had committed a great error in relying on the Duchess of Burgundy, and the Kings of France and Scotland, who without regarding his, had only their own interests in view: That he had been ill advised when he landed in Kent, which was too near London; but if he had been so fortunate as to have been in Cornwal when the Cornishmen took arms, he had been crowned at Westminster before now: That the Scots were not proper instruments to place him on the Throne, by reason of the aversion the English had for them; but, he must wholly depend upon the People of England, who alone were capable of procuring him the Crown: That therefore they advised him to repair into Cornwal where he was expected.

He comes and lands them. Hall. Stow. Hollingsh. Bacon.

Pursuant to this advice, Perkin embarked for Cornwal, having with him about seventy Men (2) on four small Vessels, and arrived in September (3) at Whitsand-Bay. As soon as he had landed his little Troop, he came to Bodmin, the Farrier's Town, who was hanged after the Battle of Black-Heath. There assembling about three thousand Men, he issued out a Proclamation assuming the title of King of England, and the name of Richard IV. He was very free of his reproaches and invectives against Henry and his Government, with magnificent promises to such as should take arms to dethrone the Usurper. After publishing his Proclamation, he formed a design to become master of Exeter, as well to make it serve for a magazine, as a retreat in case of need. At first, he tried to bribe the Inhabitants, with promising them the preservation and augmentation of their privileges. But finding they would not hearken to him, he resolved to storm the City. As he had no Artillery, he was forced to scale the Walls, and at the same time attempted to fire one of the Gates. But the attempt miscarried, and he lost two hundred Men in the assault.

The King orders his Troops against them. Bacon. Hall. Hollingsh.

Henry hearing that Perkin had joined the Cornish Rebels, and was before Exeter, said merrily, he hoped now to have the honour to see him which he could never yet do. He intimated withal, he should receive with pleasure and thankfulness, the services the Nobility should do him upon this occasion. Whereupon, several Lords and Gentlemen of Devonshire, and the neighbouring parts, uncalled from Court, drew some forces together, and put themselves under arms (4). On the other hand, the King ordered the Lord d'Aubeney to march to the relief of Exeter, spreading a report of his following in person with a numerous Army.

Perkin flies to Sanctuary. Stow. Hollingsh.

Perkin, upon news of these preparations against him, raised the Siege of Exeter, and retired to Taunton (5), where he prepared all things as if he intended to fight. But that very night he fled to Bewley Monastery in the New Forest, where he and several of his company registred themselves Sanctuary-Men. The Lord d'Aubeney hearing, Perkin had forsaken his Army, detached three hundred Horse (6) to pursue him, and prevent his escaping by Sea. The pursuers arriving too late at Bewley, contented themselves with besetting the Sanctuary till further orders. Mean while, Perkin's Troops, which were increased to six thousand, being destitute of their head, submitted to the King's mercy, who pardoned them all except a few ring-leaders who were hanged for an example. Presently after he sent a detachment of Horse to St. Michael's Mount, to bring away Perkin's Wife who was retired thither, left, if she was with Child and escaped, the business should not end in the Person of Perkin. This virtuous Lady, who loved her Husband entirely though unworthy of her, so gained the King's favour by her modesty, that he gave her a very gracious reception. He comforted her himself in a very affectionate manner, had her conducted to the Queen, and assigned her an honorable allowance, which she enjoyed during the King's life and many years after. She was called the white Rose, as well on account of her beauty, as because of the name given by the Duchess of Burgundy to her Husband.

As he entered the City, he took his Sword from his side and gave it to the Mayor, to be always carried before him, honouring by that mark of distinction the zeal shewn by the Citizens for his service. On the morrow, he caused some of the Rebels to be hanged in sacrifice to the Inhabitants of Exeter, and as a sort of satisfaction for what they had suffered. For the rest who had submitted to his mercy, he gave them indeed their lives; but withal appointed Commissioners (1) to punish them by fines. He proceeded on this occasion, with excessive severity. One would have thought he repented of giving them their lives, and designed to starve the miserable wretches after freeing them from the Gallows.

Debates about Perkin. Hall. Stow. Hollingsh. Bacon.

This done, he advised with his Council, upon what should be done with Perkin, who was still invested in his Sanctuary. Some were for taking him out by force and putting him to death, not at all questioning, that after the execution, the King might easily agree with the Pope. Others on the contrary believed, that according to the License granted by Innocent VIII's Bull, it sufficed to have him narrowly watched, and that, without necessity, such an advantage should not be given to the Pope. Moreover, that the King ought carefully to avoid being deemed a violator of Sanctuaries, of which his Enemies would not fail to take the advantage. In short, some there were who plainly told the King, he would never satisfy the people, that Perkin Warbeck was an Impostor, unless Warbeck himself freely undeceived those that were seduced by his artifices: That therefore the best method that could be taken, was, to ingage him by a pardon to make himself a confession of his Crime. The King following this advice, sent to offer Perkin his Life, if he would voluntarily surrender himself. Perkin readily accepted the offer. He saw himself so strictly watched and guarded, that he despaired to make his escape. Besides, supposing he could have escaped, he was destitute of all hopes, after an unsuccessful Trial of so many different means.

He surrenders himself to the King. Hall. Hollingsh.

He is carried to London, and confined in the Tower.

Shortly after, the King ordered Perkin to be brought to Court, as if he was entirely at liberty, but however, attended by several persons who were commanded to guard him with all care, lest he made his escape. Every one might see and talk with him; but he could never obtain leave to throw himself at the King's Feet, though the King, to satisfy his curiosity, saw him without being seen. After that, Perkin was conducted to London. He was all the way exposed to the insults and derision of the people; but seemed to bear all with great courage and constancy. Never did he act the Prince better than upon this occasion, without affecting too great an Insensibility, or shewing too much dejection. When he was come to London, he was made to ride twice through the City, that people might have time and opportunity to view him well, after which, he was confined in the Tower (2). A few days after was executed one of his chief Confidents, who not caring to take Sanctuary with him in Bewley, chose rather to wander about the Country in a Hermit's dress (3). This execution being over, Perkin Warbeck was privately examined, and his Confession published, giving an exact account of all his actions, and the places where he had lived ever since he was born. But all were surprized to find no particulars of the Conspiracy or the Authors. The Duchess of Burgundy herself was not so much as named. Some took occasion from thence to confirm themselves in the belief, that the person called Perkin Warbeck was the true Duke of York. They were persuaded, that this affected Silence was not without mystery, and that the King durst not insert in Perkin's pretended Confession, any of the circumstances relating to foreign Princes, for fear of being publickly contradicted by persons who would not have for him the same regard as his own Subjects. As for what was published concerning Perkin's Life and Kindred, nothing, as they said, was easier than to invent such Stories. Some however believed the King was thus silent, out of complaisance to the King of France, the Emperor, Archduke, Duchess of Burgundy, and King of Scotland: And that there were even English Lords engaged in the plot, against whom he did not think fit to proceed.

As Henry was very fond of that Palace, he caused it, soon after, to be rebuilt from the ground, calling it Richmond, which name it retains to this day (4). 1498.

1499. Quarrel between the English and Scots. Bacon. Hall. Hollingsh.

The Truce between England and Scotland being concluded, as I said, to the satisfaction of both Kingdoms, the Scots conversed familiarly with their neighbours the English, particularly with the Inhabitants of Norham. This Town, which was fortified with a good Castle and a strong Garrison, is situated on the little River Tweed, which parts the two Kingdoms. It happened one day, some Scotchmen walking out of the Town, stood looking attentively upon the Castle, which breeding suspicion in the Soldiers of the Garrison, they sent to them to retire. The Scots taking it ill to be suspected, returned an angry answer, and in short, falling from words to blows, some of them were killed. The affair being brought before the Wardens of the Marches, was neglected, so that after many delays, the King of Scotland sent Ambassadors (5) into England to demand speedy satisfaction. Henry, who had no mind to quarrel with James, replied, that what had been done was a mere chance and without his privity: but however, he was ready to make all convenient satisfaction, and to that end would send Ambassadors to the King of Scotland. Buchanan, and the Lord Bacon, Henry the Seventh's Historian, affirm, the first overture of the Marriage between King James and the Princess Margaret was made during this Negotiation, and that James himself proposed it to Richard Fox Bishop of Durham. Whereas it appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that, above four years before, Henry had projected this Marriage, and probably, caused it, as I said, to be suggested to the King of Scotland, by some indirect means. As the Bishop of Durham could not be ignorant of the King's intention, since he had been twice commissioned to treat of this Marriage, he failed not to inspire King James with hopes, that the Business would be ended to his satisfaction. Shortly after, the Ambassadors of the two Kings (6) meeting at Sterling to decide the Norham affair, renewed the former Truce, adding certain Articles to prevent the like Accidents. After that, Henry appointed the Bishop of Durham to settle with the King of Scotland the Articles of the intended Marriage. This affair was not however finished till January 1502.

Perkin Warbeck, accustomed to live like a Prince, was heartily tired of the Tower, where doubtless he was not treated as such. Though according to appearance, the King had ordered him to be strictly guarded, he found means to escape, and take the road into Kent, where he hoped to meet with some Ship to carry him out of the Kingdom. But hearing that orders were every where sent to apprehend him, he thought proper to fly to the Monastery of Bethlehem (7), which enjoyed the Privilege of Sanctuary (8). It was difficult for the Prior to protect such a Person, and yet he could not resolve either to let him go elsewhere, or violate the Privilege of the House, in delivering him to the King. In this perplexity, he chose to wait upon the King, and acquainting him that Perkin Warbeck was in his hands, petitioned for his Life, leaving him otherwise to the King's discretion. The King readily saw, it would not be possible to draw Perkin out of the Monastery to put him to death, without making great noise. So, on pretence of his great respect for the Prior, who was a person very much reverenced, he granted the prisoner his Life, but ordered him to be set in the Stocks a whole day, in the Palace Court at Westminster, and next day at the Cross in Cheapside (9), from whence he was conveyed to the Tower (10). Perkin's and the Earl of Warwick's Plot diſcovered. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh. Bacon.

After he had remained ſome time in this ſtate, he found means to gain four Servants of Sir John Digby, Lieutenant of the Tower, with whom he plotted to kill their maſter, ſeize the Keys of the Tower, and eſcape with the Earl of Warwick, who had been alſo perſuaded to come into the plot, out of hopes of recovering his liberty, of which he had been ſo long unjuſtly debarred. But unhappily for them, the affair was diſcovered before it could be executed. It was ſcarce doubted, that the King himſelf was the contriver of this plot, and that his aim was to draw at once Perkin Warbeck and the Earl of Warwick into the ſnare, in order to put them both to death. Indeed ſeveral reaſons rendered it credible. Firſt, it was very ſurprizing, that Perkin was not more cloſely confined, after his attempt to make his eſcape. Secondly, it was not likely, that in his Circumſtances, unable to reward Sir John Digby's Servants, they ſhould expoſe themſelves to ſuch danger for his ſake. In the third place, Perkin was too cunning to join with the Earl of Warwick, who would have hurted him only, though they had been ſo happy as to eſcape. Laſtly, ſuppoſing they had killed the Governor without being diſcovered, and got the Keys of the Tower, how could they expect that the Guards would have opened the gate, or ſuffered it to be opened in the night, without examining the Perſons that went out, or without the Governor's expreſs order. But what farther confirms this ſuſpicion of the King, was, that about the ſame time a young Man, one Wilford a Shoemaker's Son, pretended to be the Earl of Warwick. He was accompanied, or rather guided and directed, by an Auguſtin Frier called Patrick, who had the boldneſs to preach publickly in ſome Town in Kent, that Wilford was the Earl of Warwick, and exhort the people to take arms in his favour. They were both apprehended, and Wilford was hanged, but the Frier pardoned (1). This gave occaſion to believe, Wilford had been ſeduced by the Frier, and by the King's particular direction, that it might be thought leſs ſtrange, that he put him to death, under colour of cauſing freſh troubles.

One pretending to be the Earl of Warwick is hanged. Hall. Bacon. Hollingſh.

However this be, it is certain the King was reſolved to free himſelf at once from all his uneaſineſſes occaſioned by Perkin Warbeck and the Earl of Warwick. Though it cannot poſitively be ſaid, that he laid a ſnare for them, at leaſt this Plot furniſhed him with a plauſible reaſon to deliver them over to Juſtice. Perkin was condemned (2) by Commiſſioners [of Oyer and Terminer] to be hanged, and was executed with the Mayor of Cork (3) and his Son, who had been his conſtant companions in all his adventures. Of eight others that were condemned with them, among whom were Sir John Digby's four Servants, there were but two executed. Such was the end of Perkin Warbeck, who had been acknowledged for lawful King in Ireland, France, Flanders, England, Scotland, and made Henry ſhake in his Throne. Perhaps he would have ſucceeded in his deſigns, had he been to deal with a leſs politick Prince. However, it is certain the King was not enough careful to undeceive the publick, and that the proofs produced to ſhew Perkin was an Impoſtor, being taken only from a private examination, ſeemed not ſufficiently evident.

Perkin is condemned to be hanged. Hall. Bacon.

The Earl of Warwick is condemned and beheaded. Hall. Bacon. Hollingſh.

In a few days after Perkin's death (4), the Earl of Warwick was brought before the Houſe of Peers, the Earl of Oxford exerciſing, by Commiſſion, the office of High-Steward. He was arraigned, not for attempting to eſcape, which could not be deemed High-Treaſon, ſince he was not impriſoned for any ſuch crime, nor even for any other, but for conſpiring the King's death jointly with Perkin Warbeck. The poor Prince confeſſing that he gave his conſent to the project laid by Perkin and Digby's Servants, was condemned to loſe his head, and the ſentence was executed on Tower-hill (5). He was the laſt Male-Heir of the Houſe of York, which in truth was the Crime that coſt him his life, the King chuſing rather to ſacrifice his own reputation, than be diſappointed of ſecuring the Crown both to himſelf and his Heirs. To leſſen in ſome meaſure People's horror of this Cruelty, the King cauſed it to be publiſhed, that King Ferdinand had poſitively declared, he would never conſent to marry his Daughter Catherine to Prince Arthur, ſo long as the Earl of Warwick was alive. Strange ſort of Apology tending to inſinuate, that the Marriage of the Princeſs of Spain was ſo neceſſary for England, that it muſt be purchaſed with Blood! But if this marriage was not requiſite for the State, it was at leaſt very beneficial to the King, who was to receive two hundred thouſand Crowns of Gold for Catherine's Dowry. This alone would have induced him to ſacrifice the Earl of Warwick, though he had no other advantage by his death. From a like motive he had beheaded the Lord Chamberlain. Mean while, very probably, what was publiſhed concerning King Ferdinand, was only a mere pretence to excuſe Henry, ſince Arthur's Marriage with Catherine was ſolemnized by Proxy the 19th of May this very year, before the Earl of Warwick's death (6). 1499. Act. Pub. XII. p. 754.

Lewis XII had ſolemnly ratified and ſworn the Peace of Eſtaples, a little after his acceſſion to the Crown. But being deſirous to ſhew Henry, he really intended to keep it, he cauſed it to be approved and ratified by the States General, aſſembled at Nantz in the beginning of the year. Then he ſent Ambaſſadors to the Pope, to pray him to confirm it by his authority. The Pope ſeeing no farther obſtacle from France, iſſued out a Bull of excommunication againſt whoever of the two Kings ſhould not obſerve the Treaty. The Peace of Eſtaples confirmed by the States of France. p. 706. p. 736.

Lewis XII becomes maſter of Milan.

It was not without reaſon that Lewis deſired to preſerve the Peace made by his predeceſſor with England. He had formed a deſign to ſeize the Duchy of Milan, and to that end made a league with the Venetians, who were to have for their ſhare all that part of the Milaneſe ſituate beyond the Adda. This ſame year the confederates attacked the Duchy of Milan, and Ludovico Sforza, the moſt perfidious of Men, being forſaken by all the World, was forced to fly to the Emperor, having loſt all his places, except the Caſtle of Milan. Genoa, of which he was poſſeſſed, followed the example of the Milaneſe, in voluntarily ſurrendering to the King of France.

The King of Naples is included in the Peace of Eſtaples. p. 720.

Frederick King of Naples, who had ſucceeded Ferdinand his Nephew, fearing the preparations in France were deſigned againſt him, gave Henry ſpeedy notice that he deſired to be included in the Peace he had lately renewed with France. But it was not with him that Lewis intended to deal this year. He reſerved the War of Naples after the Conqueſt of the Milaneſe.

A Jubilee furniſhes the Pope with means to raiſe Money. Hall. Bacon.

Alexander VI having publiſhed a Jubilee for the year 1500, the laſt of the Century, had granted by his Bull to all Chriſtians at a diſtance from Rome, the privilege of the Jubilee without being obliged to viſit the Churches of that City; but on condition of paying ſuch a ſum for the favour. This was an infallible way to draw money from all the States of Chriſtendom, where he had ſent Commiſſioners to levy it. The Commiſſioner appointed for England was Jaſper Pons a Spaniard, who wiſely diſcharged his Commiſſion without noiſe or ſcandal, and carried a good ſum of money to his maſter (7). 1500.

A Cruſade intended with the ſame view. The Pope's Project. Bacon. Act. Pub. XII. p. 747.

Beſides this affair, he was charged with another which ſeemed of great moment, but tended, like the firſt, only to fill the Pope's Coffers. He had orders to acquaint the King, that the Pope was reſolved to publiſh a Cruſade againſt the Turks: That therefore it was agreed with the Ambaſſadors of ſeveral Potentates, that the Hungarians, Polonians, and Bohemians ſhould make War upon the Turks in Thrace; the French and Spaniards in Greece; and himſelf, with the King of England, the Venetians, and Princes of Italy, who were moſt powerful at Sea, ſhould attack Conſtantinople: That in conſequence of this reſolution, he had ſent Nuncio's to all the Courts, to exhort the Sovereigns amicably to end their private quarrels, that all the Forces of Chriſtendom might be united together for ſo pious an undertaking. Alexander VI was too well known to be thought to act upon this occaſion from a motive of religion and zeal for the glory of God. Conſequently, it was eaſy to ſee that the ſole deſign of this Cruſade was to heap up money by voluntary contributions, as well from private Perſons as Sovereigns. However, as Henry was unwilling to ſhew his diſlike of this project, which probably would meet with obſtacles enough elſewhere, he told the Nuncio, "That no Prince in all Chriſtendom ſhould be more "zealous than himſelf, to promote this affair, to the "glory of God and the good of the Church: but as his The King's Anſwer. Bacon.

" Dominions

1500. "Dominions were ſo remote from Conſtantinople, as he "had no Galleys, and as his Mariners were not ſufficiently acquainted with the Mediterranean Sea, he judged "it more proper that the Kings of France and Spain "ſhould accompany his Holineſs by Sea; whereby, not "only all things would be ſooner ready, but the jealouſy "wiſely avoided, which would infallibly ariſe between "theſe two Monarchs, in caſe they ſhould march together "by land, without a Superior: That for his part, he "would freely contribute both Men and money towards "the undertaking. But if the Kings of France and Spain "ſhould refuſe to accompany the Pope, he would go himſelf and command under him, provided all differences "between the Chriſtian Princes were firſt appeaſed, "(which he ſhould not obſtruct, ſince he was in Peace "with all the World,) and ſome good Towns on the "Coaſt of Italy put into his hands, to ſerve for retreat in "caſe of neceſſity."

The Project comes to nothing.

The Pope eaſily perceived the meaning of this anſwer, and as probably the reſt of the Princes would return the like, the Cruſade vaniſhed into air. Mean while Henry, to diſplay his zeal, appointed Ambaſſadors to go to Rome to treat with the Pope concerning that affair. But I do not know whether theſe Ambaſſadors ever went from London. Henry's anſwer being made publick, the Knights of Rhodes elected him for Protector of their Order, imagining there was no Prince in Chriſtendom more zealous than himſelf for Religion.

Henry is choſen Protector of the Order of St. John. Act. Pub. XII. p. 747.

The Plague having for ſome time raged in England (1), the King, after frequent change of places, reſolved to go and make ſome ſtay at Calais with his Family, till the danger was over. Upon his arrival (2), the Archduke Philip ſent Ambaſſadors to welcome him into thoſe parts, and expreſs his deſire of paying him a viſit. But withal, prayed him to appoint for their interview, ſome place that was not a walled Town, not but that he had a perfect confidence in him, but becauſe he had already refuſed to confer with the King of France in a fortified place. Henry very civilly accepted this compliment, and appointed the place to be at St. Peter's Church without the Gates of Calais. Then he ſent Ambaſſadors to Philip to return his compliment, and tell him with what impatience he expected him. Some days after, being informed that the Archduke was near Calais, he rid out of the Town to receive him. When Philip ſaw him, he alighted and offered to hold the King's ſtirrup. But Henry not permitting him, they embraced, and withdrawing into the Church, had a long conference. The Archduke, willing to efface the impreſſion which his protection of Perkin might have made in the King's mind, ſhewed an ardent deſire to live in a good underſtanding with him, calling him his Patron and Father; as appears in the King's letter to the Mayor of London, acquainting him with what paſſed at the interview. It is ſaid alſo, that overtures were made of croſs marriages between Henry Duke of York the King's ſecond Son, and Margaret Siſter of Philip, and Widow of the Prince of Spain, and between Charles Son of Philip and Mary the King's ſecond Daughter. Charles was born the 24th of February this year, and by the death of Prince Michael of Portugal, about the ſame time, was become preſumptive Heir of the Crowns of Caſtile and Arragon.

Bull upon the Peace of Eſtaples. June 12. Act. Pub. XII. p. 763.

Diſpenſation for the Scotch Marriage. July 28. p. 765.

The Ambaſſadors of England and Scotland, being at length agreed upon the terms of the marriage between King James and Margaret, the Pope granted a diſpenſation. But as the Princeſs was only between ten and eleven years old, it was not conſummated till three years after.

The King enquires after Warbeck's Adherents. 766.

Henry was then in Peace with all the Princes of Europe, and there was no appearance of any troubles in his Kingdom. Conſequently he had no ſort of pretence to demand of his Parliament new Subſidies. This way of raiſing money, of which he was ſo greedy, failing him, other methods were to be deviſed. Perkin Warbeck's affair was a plentiful fountain, which was not yet exhauſted. The Commiſſion he had eſtabliſhed whilſt at Exeter, regarded properly ſuch only as had actually taken arms againſt him. But though that Commiſſion had brought him in very large ſums, he was not yet ſatisfied. Under colour, that thoſe who had any way adhered to Warbeck's party, were ſtill liable to the rigour of the Law, he was ready to grant them a pardon unasked; but it was on condition, they paid the fines laid upon them. For that purpoſe he appointed new Commiſſioners (3) to make inqueſt of thoſe that aſſiſted Michael the Farrier, author of the firſt Corniſh Rebellion, and Perkin Warbeck the impoſtor, with power to pardon them upon their paying fines at the Commiſſioners diſcretion. He ordered likewiſe the eſtates of ſuch as were dead to be ſeized and ſold, if the Heirs refuſed to make a reaſonable compoſition. It is eaſy to ſee from hence, that if the King had been favorable to the Rebels during the troubles, it was only out of fear of driving them to deſpair, whilſt they were yet heated, ſince he ſpared them not, as ſoon as he believed them to be no longer dangerous. 1500.

Death of Cardinal Morton. Hall. Stow.

Cardinal Morton Archbiſhop of Canterbury was accuſed of being the author of theſe oppreſſions. But it was afterwards perceived, they ſprung from the King himſelf. The Archbiſhop died the latter end of this, or the beginning of the next year (4), little regretted by the Engliſh, who were greatly prejudiced againſt him. Henry Dean Biſhop of Salisbury ſucceeded him, but had not poſſeſſion till the Auguſt following (5). Before we cloſe this year, it will be neceſſary briefly to mention what paſſed in Italy.

Lewis XII and Ferdinand ſhare the Kingdom of Naples. Mezerai.

After Lewis XII was become maſter of the Duchy of Milan, he turned his thoughts to the Conqueſt of Naples. Though, probably, he might alone have conquered that Kingdom, he made however an Alliance with the King of Arragon, whereby they agreed to join their Forces, and ſhare the conqueſt between them. Ferdinand was to have Apulia and Calabria, and Lewis the City of Naples, Abruzzo and Terra di Lavaro. This Treaty being ſigned, Ferdinand ſent an Army into Italy under the command of the famous Gonzalvo, commonly called the great Captain. Lewis gave the conduct of his Army to d'Aubigni, to the Earl of Gaiazzo and Cæſar Borgia the Pope's Baſtard, who having quitted the Cardinalate, was become Duke of Valentinois. The French Fleet was commanded by Philip of Cleves Lord of Ravenſtein. In a very ſhort ſpace, each of the two Kings became maſter of the portion aſſigned him by the Treaty, and the unfortunate Frederick King of Naples was forced to caſt himſelf upon the mercy of Lewis XII, who ſent him to live in France with a penſion of thirty thouſand Crowns.

The King of Naples gives himſelf up to Lewis.

1501. Henry having no war with any of his neighbours, lived in great Tranquillity, and the more, as he ſaw in England no Lord in condition to create him uneaſineſs. The ability he had ſhewn in ſeveral affairs, as well foreign as domeſtick, which had unexpectedly come upon him, kept his neighbours in awe, and his Subjects in obedience. So, which way ſoever he turned his eyes, he ſaw nothing capable of diſturbing his quiet. Mean while, when he leaſt expected it, he thought a new ſtorm was gathering againſt him, but he was more afraid than hurt. The Earl of Suffolk (6), Nephew of Edward IV, and Richard III, and Brother of the Earl of Lincoln, ſlain at Stokefield, quarrelling with a Man, had the misfortune to kill him. This accident might have given the King a pretence to free himſelf from the Earl, who could not but be odious to him, ſince he was, by his Mother, of the Houſe of York. However, whether the action in itſelf was not ill, or for ſome other reaſon, the King was pleaſed to forgive him, on condition he openly pleaded his pardon. The Earl, more offended at this Ignominy, than grateful for the favour granted him, retired ſhortly after into Flanders, to his Aunt the Ducheſs of Burgundy. Henry was ſtartled at his retreat, imagining he was gone into the Low-Countries, to contrive ſome plot againſt him. His conſtant uneaſineſs, with reſpect to his Crown, made him apprehenſive, that the leaſt beginnings would be attended with ſad conſequences. And therefore, not to give the Earl of Suffolk time to concert new Projects with the Ducheſs of Burgundy, he ſo wrought with him by Meſſages, that he returned into England, where he was very readily pardoned. The Ducheſs of Burgundy was grown old, and tired with ſo many fruitleſs attempts to dethrone Henry. Beſides, ſhe could expect no farther aſſiſtance from the Archduke, who was willing to live in a good underſtanding with him.

In fine, Catherine of Arragon, Daughter of Ferdinand and Iſabella, coming into England in October (1), her Marriage with Arthur Prince of Wales was ſolemnized the 14th of November. Though the Prince was but in the ſixteenth year of his Age (2), it was not queſtioned whether the Marriage was conſummated. The Prince himſelf next morning ſaid ſeveral things which left no room to doubt it. And yet, there were afterwards very warm diſputes upon it, Catherine, or her Council affirming, there was no Conſummation. But it is not yet time to ſpeak of this matter.

Diſpenſation granted to Thomas Wolſey. Act. Pub. XI. p. 783.

Thomas Wolſey, afterwards Archbiſhop of York, and Cardinal, who made ſo great a figure in England, was now Rector of the Pariſh-Church of Lymington in the Dioceſe of Bath and Wells. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that in November this year, the Pope, in conſideration of his diſtinguiſhed Merit, granted him a Diſpenſation to hold two Benefices that were inconſiſtent.

1502. The laſt agreements about Margaret's Marriage with James IV. p. 781. Hall. Bacon.

Though the Diſpenſation for the King of Scotland's Marriage was come, Henry made no great haſte to finiſh that affair, by reaſon of his Daughter's tender age. At length, the Princeſs being entered upon her thirteenth year the 29th of November 1501, James ſent Ambaſſadors to London, where every thing concerning the Marriage was ſettled, and the Contract drawn in form the 24th of January 1502. Henry gave with his Daughter thirty thouſand Angel Nobles of Gold (3), [each Noble worth twenty Groſſes, or Groats] payable in three years. James ſettled upon the Princeſs his Spouſe, a Jointure of two thouſand pounds Sterling a year in Land, of which however, he was to receive the Income during his Life, and allow her only a thouſand pounds a year at her own diſpoſal. It was farther agreed, that ſhe might have twenty four Engliſh Servants, and when one died, ſhe might appoint another in his room: That the Marriage ſhould be performed per verba de Præſenti, about the Feaſt of Purification; but the King of Scotland ſhould not think of having Margaret in his hands till September the 1ſt, 1503. That then Henry ſhould cauſe her to be conducted, at his expence, to the borders of the two Kingdoms. Before this Contract was ſigned, a Privy Counſellor repreſented to the King, that it was not impoſſible but this Marriage might one day give England a Scotch Sovereign (4). Whereupon the King replied, ſuppoſing that ſhould be, the ſtrongeſt would carry it from the weakeſt, and Scotland be annexed to England, and not England to Scotland, which fell out accordingly.

Death of Prince Arthur. Hall. Hollingſh. Henry his Brother made Prince of Wales. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 11.

Whilſt the Court was rejoycing for the Marriage of the Queen of Scotland, Prince Arthur her Brother was ſeized with a Diſtemper which laid him in his Grave. He died the 2d of April, about five months after his Marriage, and in the ſeventeenth year of his age (5). As the Princeſs his Widow might be with Child, the King delayed two or three months to create Henry his ſecond Son, Prince of Wales. The Lord Bacon ſays in his Hiſtory, that Henry was not made Prince of Wales till February 1503 (6). But we find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, Letters Patents of the 22d of June 1502, wherein he is ſtiled Prince of Wales, a clear Evidence that he was now inveſted with that Principality.

Henry makes the Emperor a preſent of Money. Ib. p. 3, 5, 9, 20.

Shortly after, Henry received an Embaſſy from the Emperor Maximilian, to propoſe a League againſt the Turks. This Embaſſy was properly only a pretence to demand of the King an aid of Money, which the Emperor promiſed punctually to repay. But the King knowing Maximilian to be always in want, choſe rather to make him a preſent of ten thouſand pounds, than to lend him the Sum he deſired. As for the League propoſed by the Emperor, Henry did not think fit to engage in it, contenting himſelf with ſtipulating, that the ten thouſand pounds ſhould be employed in the war againſt the Infidels. He concluded with him however a Treaty of Commerce, and another of Friendſhip and Alliance, which was to laſt one year after the death of the Survivor. Moreover it was agreed, that Maximilian, and his Son the Archduke, ſhould be admitted into the Order of the Garter, and Henry into that of the Golden Fleece. Purſuant to this agreement, Henry ſent Ambaſſadors (7) to Maximilian, with the Order of the Garter, and to ſee him ſwear to the Treaties.

Confirmation of the Treaty between England and Scotland. p. 30---43---76.

During the reſt of the year nothing extraordinary paſſed in England. James and Henry were entirely taken up with confirming and ratifying their three late Treaties, and ſwearing to obſerve them. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, the Ambaſſadors of the King of England (8) having delivered to King James a writing, containing the Oath he was to take, and he reading it as it was, inadvertently gave Henry the Title of King of France. But afterwards perceiving his error, he took publickly another Oath, wherein the words, and of France, were omitted, and made that his authentick act. He was afraid, no doubt, the King of France would be diſpleaſed with his giving Henry that Title, though it was of no great Importance.

1503. The Queen's Death. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

Elizabeth, Henry's Queen, died the 11th of February 1503, without being much lamented by the King, who never loved her (10). On the contrary, he had given her ſenſible mortifications. His hatred to the Houſe of York, was extended to his own Wife, eſpecially as he always deemed her a dangerous Rival. The concern he gave her by confining the Queen her Mother in a Convent, and confiſcating all her Eſtate, plainly ſhowed his little regard for her (11).

The King oppreſſes his Subjects by Empſon and Dudley. Hall. Bacon. Hollingſh.

At this time, the King's affairs were ſo proſperous, that he ſeemed to have all he could deſire. He was in peace with all the Princes of Europe, and without troubles at home, or the appearance of any thing to vex or embarraſs him. But his Subjects were not the happier. As his Avarice was inſatiable, he was continually ſeeking new ways to heap up Riches, which he wanted not, ſince it was not to uſe them, and ſince never Prince was a greater Oeconomiſt than himſelf. His Inſtruments for this purpoſe were two infamous Miniſters, Sir Richard Empſon and Edmund Dudley, who regardleſs of their own and the King's reputation, ſought only to gratify his humour, and deviſe new means to fill his Coffers. Dudley was of a good Family, well skilled in the Laws of the Land, and able to give a favorable turn to the moſt odious actions. Empſon was ſprung from the dregs of the people (12), impudent to the laſt degree, and ſo little aſhamed of the injuſtices he committed, that he uſed to glory in them. Theſe are ſome of the means they uſed to draw Money from the people, into the King's Treaſury, beſides numberleſs others too long to be recounted.

(9) About this time were brought to Court three Men taken in the new-found Iſlands by Sebaſtian Cabott. They were clothed in Beaſts Skins, and ſpoke a Language unknown. 1503. in danger. By this means the parties were forced at length to come to a Compoſition, which tore from them the beſt part of their Eſtates, and which the Miniſters termed however Mitigations, as if the King had done them a favour in allaying the too great rigour of the Law.

2. They came at laſt to that point, that they proceeded without obſerving any form of Juſtice. They ſent forth their Precepts to attach and cite people before themſelves, at their own private Houſes, in a Court of Commiſſion, and there, after a ſummary proceeding by examination, without proofs or witneſſes, paſſed Sentence, and condemned them in large Fines to the King's uſe. Thus without vouchſafing to make uſe of Juries, and the methods preſcribed by the Law, they aſſumed themſelves to deal as well in Controverſies Civil, as in Pleas of the Crown. One would have thought, all Criminal Cauſes had belonged to that kind of Juriſdiction, which having been very rare in the foregoing Reigns, was grown common in this.

3. They charged the Subjects Lands with Tenures in Capite, by finding falſe Offices (1), refuſing upon divers pretences and delays to admit people to traverſe thoſe falſe Offices according to Law. Hence they formed variety of Proceſſes, whereof they themſelves were the Judges, and which were always decided in favour of the Crown.

4. When the King's Wards had accompliſhed their full Age, they could never have Livery of their Lands without paying exceſſive Fines, contrary to the expreſs Tenor of Magna Charta (2).

5. When Men were out-lawed in perſonal actions, the Miniſters would not permit them to purchaſe their Charters of Pardon, unleſs they paid great and intolerable Sums; ſtanding upon the rigour of the Law, which upon Out-lawries gives forfeiture of Goods. Nay, contrary to all Law and Colour, they maintained, the King ought to have the half of Men's Lands and Rents during two whole years.

6. They would alſo threaten the Jurors, and force them to find as they ſhould direct; and if they refuſed to act ſo unjuſtly, they were cited, impriſoned, and fined (3).

It is needleſs to repeat any more of their courſes. Theſe I have mentioned are ſufficient to ſhow, that Men of this character ſcrupled not to commit the moſt enormous Injuſtices, provided it was for the King's advantage. Herein leſs blameable than the King himſelf, who ſuffered them to abuſe thus his Name and Authority.

Remarkable Inſtance of the King's Rigor. Bacon.

We do not find in the Life of this Monarch, that he ever exerciſed one act of Grace in point of Fines or Confiſcations. On the contrary, he was always inflexible, even with regard to his moſt faithful Servants. His Hiſtorian relates a very remarkable particular, which ſerves to diſcover plainly the Character of this Prince. Of all the Lords of the Kingdom, he had the moſt confidence in the Earl of Oxford, who had indeed done him the greateſt Services, as well in war as in peace. One day, the King went to viſit him at his Caſtle [at Henningham] and was entertained with all poſſible Magnificence. When the King was ready to depart, he ſaw a great number of men dreſſed in rich Liveries, and ranged on both Sides to make him a lane. The Earl it ſeems had forgot, that it was forbid by ſeveral Acts of Parliament, to give Liveries, as was obſerved, to any but menial Servants, but the King remembred it. Wherefore turning to the Earl, he ſaid, My Lord, I have heard much of your Magnificence and Hoſpitality; but I find they exceed all report. Theſe handſome Gentlemen and Yeomen I ſee on both Sides of me, are ſure your menial Servants. The Earl, not perceiving the King's aim, ſmiled and anſwered, he did not keep ſo many Domeſticks, but theſe people were only his Retainers, come to do him Service on ſuch extraordinary occaſions. The King ſtartled a little, and ſaid, By my Faith, my Lord, I thank you for your good Cheer; but I muſt not ſuffer to have my Laws broken before my face. My Attorney muſt talk with you. The Hiſtorian adds, this Treſpaſs coſt the Earl fifteen thouſand Marks (4).

The ſame Hiſtorian ſays, he had ſeen a Book of Accounts of Empſon's, with the King's hand almoſt to every leaf, by way of Signing, and was in ſome places poſtilled in the margin with the King's hand likewiſe, where among many others was this Memorandum:

Item, Received of ſuch a one, five Marks for the Pardon to be procured, and if the Pardon do not paſs, the Money to be repaid; except the party be ſome other ways ſatisfied. 1503. And over againſt this memorandum of the King's own hand, was written by him in the Margin, Otherways Satisfied. He was unwilling to pardon the Man, and yet could not reſolve to reſtore the five Marks. Hence it is plain he did not neglect ſmall profits.

The Earl of Suffolk's Conſpiracy. Hall. Bacon.

It is eaſy to gueſs, the King's and the Miniſtry's Conduct bred great diſcontent and murmurs among the people. The great Men themſelves meeting with no better quarter than the meaneſt, groaned under the oppreſſion of Empſon and Dudley, two Leaches, who ſpared neither friend nor foe. The Earl of Suffolk whom the King had lately pardoned, fancied, theſe diſcontents would raiſe in the end ſome violent ſtorm againſt the King, if the people could find a perſon of diſtinction to head them. As he was of the Houſe of York by his Mother, he imagined, the time was come to proſecute his Rights, and the people would not fail to declare for him. In this belief he perſwaded ſeveral Lords and Gentlemen to promiſe to ſupport him at a proper Seaſon, and then retired into Flanders, from whence he made his Friends expect a powerful aid by means of the Ducheſs of Burgundy (5).

He withdraws into Flanders.

Henry diſcovers his Secrets. Bacon.

The King, ſurprized at the Earl of Suffolk's retreat, did not queſtion that he had contrived ſome plot in England before his departure, and had his Accomplices. To be fully informed, he believed the beſt way was to recur to the ſame arts, he had uſed with reſpect to Perkin Warbeck. To that end, he ſent orders to Sir Robert Curſon Governor of the Caſtle of Hammes near Calais, whom he knew to be fit for his purpoſe, and entirely at his devotion. Purſuant to his Inſtructions, Curſon relinquiſhing his Government, under colour of ſome affront deſignedly put upon him by the King, came to the Earl of Suffolk with offers of his Service. He played his part ſo well, that the Earl imparted to him all his Secrets. By this means the King came to know, that William Courtney Earl of Devonſhire (6), married to Catherine, Edward the Fourth's Daughter, William de la Pole, Brother of the Earl of Suffolk, Sir James Tyrrel, Sir John Windham, and ſeveral other meaner perſons, were concerned in the plot. They were all apprehended in one day (7). But as probably, there was not ſufficient Evidence againſt the two firſt, the King was contented with detaining them in priſon. This gave occaſion to think they were not guilty, but that the King uſed this pretence to ſecure them, becauſe their relation to the Houſe of York made him uneaſy. As for Tyrrel, againſt whom the Blood of Edward V, and the Duke of York cried for vengeance, he was beheaded (8) with Windham his Accomplice. The reſt of inferior rank ſuffered the puniſhment of Traitors.

His Accomplices are apprehended. Hall. Stow. Bacon.

The King uſes an extraordinary method to deceive him. Hall. Bacon.

Mean while, Henry deſiring to be better informed of the Earl of Suffolk's Secrets, took care to preſerve Curſon's credit, by an extraordinary method. He cauſed Innocent VIII's Bull of Excommunication, to be publiſhed at Paul's-Croſs, againſt all perſons that ſhould diſturb him in the poſſeſſion of the Throne, and particularly againſt the Earl of Suffolk and Sir Robert Curſon. But when he had drawn from the Earl all his Secrets, he returned into England, where he was graciouſly received by the King, but the people looking upon him with horror, loaded him with curſes. The Earl of Suffolk being confounded by Curſon's flight, roved about for ſome time in Germany, and at length returned into Flanders, where the Archduke, notwithſtanding his Treaties with Henry, took him into his protection.

Hall. Stow.

Project of marriage between the Prince of Wales, and Prince Henry.

The King knowing the Earl had not in England a party capable to ſupport him, ſhowed no farther uneaſineſs. Another affair troubled him much more. He had now received a hundred thouſand Crowns of Gold, in part of the portion of the Princeſs of Wales his Daughter-in-law, Arthur's Widow. As that Prince died without Iſſue, he muſt either ſend back the Widow to Spain, and conſequently return the hundred thouſand Crowns, or if he kept her in England, give her the third part of the Principality of Wales (9), which was ſettled upon her. Both were equally grievous to a Prince of Henry's Temper. However, he could not diſpenſe with one or other, without breaking with Ferdinand, which did not agree with

1503. his preſent circumſtances. For indeed, the deference paid him by all the other Princes, and particularly by the King of France, was properly owing to his ſtrict Alliance with the Spaniſh Monarch. In this perplexity, he thought of a very proper expedient to preſerve the friendſhip of Ferdinand, with the Sum already received, and procure him the other hundred thouſand Crowns which remained to be paid. And that was to marry Catherine to his Son Henry, now Prince of Wales, by the death of his elder Brother. The propoſal being made to the King and Queen of Spain, they agreed to it, on condition the Pope's Diſpenſation was firſt obtained. This was the ſubject of an agreement between the two Crowns, the 23d of June, without a particular mention of the Articles of the intended Marriage. It muſt be obſerved, that in this agreement, it was alledged, as a neceſſary reaſon for demanding the Diſpenſation, not only that Arthur and Henry were Brothers, but moreover that Arthur's Marriage with Catherine was duly ſolemnized and conſummated.

Agreement between Henry and Ferdinand. June 23. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 76.

Alexander VI dying in the mean time, Pius III ſucceeded him. But as he out-lived not the 18th of October, it was to Julius II, elected the 1ſt of November, that the two Kings applied for the diſpenſation. The new Pope granted a Bull for that purpoſe, where he ſaid, that in the petition lately preſented to him, Henry and Catherine declared, that Catherine was married per verba de Præſenti, to the late Prince Arthur, and that the marriage was ſolemnized in form, and perhaps conſummated (1). Upon the word perhaps, it muſt be remarked, that, on this occaſion, it cannot be a Term denoting a Doubt, ſince it is not the Pope that ſpeaks in the Petition, but Catherine, who muſt know whether the Marriage was conſummated or not. It is only a term which gives more ſtrength to the diſpenſation, as obviating all the objections that might be made. This evidently appears in the ſequel of the Bull, where the Pope permits Henry and Catherine to remain in the ſtate of matrimony, though they were married before, publickly or privately, and had perhaps conſummated their marriage by carnal copulation. It is eaſy to ſee, the word perhaps, is inſerted only to give the more force to the diſpenſation, by preventing all caſes that might render it invalid. It was neceſſary to make theſe obſervations, by reaſon of the important conſequences of this affair in the following reign.

The King of Scotland's marriage was conſummated in September (2) according to agreement, Henry having conducted the Queen his Daughter to York, from whence ſhe purſued her journey into Scotland (3).

The Archduke returns to the Low-Countries. Mezerai.

The Archduke Philip returned this year into Flanders, having ſtaied about a year in Spain. As he paſſed through France, he endeavoured to adjuſt a difference between King Ferdinand his Father-in-law, and Lewis XII, concerning the Kingdom of Naples. He even took upon him to conclude in Ferdinand's name, a Treaty which was afterwards diſclaimed. Had he been concerned with a Prince of leſs goodneſs and equity than Lewis XII, that diſclaiming might have thrown him into great trouble. But Lewis was ſo generous as not to take the advantage. The occaſion, in ſhort, of the rupture between the two Monarchs was this:

Rupture between Lewis XII and Ferdinand.

They had, as I have obſerved, divided the Kingdom of Naples after conquering it. It was hardly poſſible that theſe two Princes ſhould long poſſeſs the portion fallen to each, without ſome occaſion of quarrel. Accordingly a diſpute aroſe concerning the Province of Capitanata, which each would have to be in his diviſion. Whereupon the French and Spaniards came to blows. At firſt the French had the advantage, but afterwards loſt two Battles, one near St. Severina in Calabria the 21ſt of April, the other on the 28th of the ſame month at Cerignoles, where the Duke of Nemours their General was ſlain. After theſe two victories Gonzolvo, who commanded Ferdinand's Troops, became maſter of the whole Kingdom of Naples. Lewis deſirous to repair his loſſes, ſent a powerful Army into Italy, which was by ſundry unexpected accidents rendered unſerviceable.

The French are driven out of Naples.

1504. Subſidy given the King for the Marriage of his Daughter. Hall.

The 16th of January 1504, the King aſſembled the Parliament on pretence of the neceſſity of reviving certain Statutes, and making ſome new ones. But the real motive was to demand a Subſidy for his eldeſt Daughter's Dowry. The Cuſtom of demanding money on ſuch occaſions was too advantagious to the King to ſuffer it to be aboliſhed. The Queen of Scotland's portion was but thirty thouſand Nobles (4), but this Subſidy granted by the Parliament may well be thought to be much more conſiderable, beſides a handſome preſent made him by the Clergy on the ſame account. So, inſtead of emptying his Coffers by the marriage of his Daughter, he filled them the fuller. Nothing ſhows more the almoſt abſolute power of the King, than the choice of Dudley for Speaker of the Houſe of Commons (5). He was the moſt generally hated perſon in the Kingdom, except Empſon his aſſociate, who was as odious as himſelf. Wherefore it muſt be that the fear of diſpleaſing the King, by rejecting the Perſon he recommended, led the Commons to that choice.

Bacon. Dudley Speaker of the Houſe of Commons. Stow.

Advantageous Statutes for the King. Bacon.

The Subſidy was not the only thing, the King politically turned to his advantage in this Parliament. He found means to obtain Acts which ſeemed to aim wholly at the good of the publick, but in reality tended only to procure him money. For inſtance, all Patents of Leaſe or Grant were diſannulled to ſuch as came not [upon lawful Summons] to ſerve the King againſt the Rebels (6). As the number of Delinquents in this reſpect was very great, this act was a fertile ſource of treaſure to the King, by reaſon they were obliged to renew their Leaſes and Grants, which could be done only upon very hard terms.

Another Statute made all ſorts of clipped or impaired Coins of Silver not to be current in payments, without ſuffering them even to paſs for the value of their weight. As there were ſcarce any other in the Kingdom, every one was forced to bring in his ready money to the Mint, in order to be new coined, by which the King was a very conſiderable gainer.

The Statute againſt giving Liveries to any but menial Servants, was alſo revived, from whence Empſon and Dudley had an opportunity to attack many Perſons (7).

Thus the King continually amaſſing without being obliged to any extraordinary charge, at a time when his ordinary expences were very moderate, and husbanded in the beſt manner poſſible, could not but be extremly rich in ready money. But then he doubly ruined his Subjects; firſt by draining their purſes; and ſecondly by hindering the coin, of which he had great quantities in his Coffers, from circulating in Trade. On the other hand, Empſon and Dudley continued their extortions without any reſerve, and with a rigor unexperienced by the Engliſh, under any of their former Kings.

The King thinks of canonizing Henry VI, but drops it. Bacon.

About this time Henry had thoughts of canonizing Henry VI, the laſt King of the Houſe of Lancaſter. But there were two grand obſtacles. The firſt, that the Miracles aſcribed to that Prince ſince his death were not well atteſted, and the actions of his life, which were oſtentatiouſly diſplayed, ſhowed rather his weakneſs than ſanctity. But the ſecond difficulty, that is the neceſſary charges of this canonization quite fruſtrated the project. As this is an act of grace and favour, the Pope generally proportions the expences not to the Perſon of the Saint himſelf, but to the riches of him that ſollicites the canonization. The King even perceived, that the Court of Rome's queſtioning Henry the Sixth's ſanctity, tended only to magnify the favour, and inhance the price accordingly. This was ſufficient to cauſe him to deſiſt from his intention. So avaricious a Prince could hardly reſolve to empty his Coffers for ſo needleſs a thing, and which, at moſt, would have procured him only the praiſes of the Lancaſtrians. He was contented therefore to obtain a Bull for the removal of Henry VI's Body to Weſtminſter among his Anceſtors (8). He was obſcurely buried at firſt in Chertſey Monaſtery near London, from whence he was removed to Windſor.

It is hard to judge whether he did this from a principle of equity, and with intent to ſatisfy thoſe he

That no Pewterers and Braſiers ſell, or change, any Pewter or Braſs, new or old, at any place within the Realm, but in open Fairs or Markets, or in their dwelling Houſes. What gave occaſion to this Law, was, that many Perſons went about the Kingdom privately, buying Pewter and Braſs, which encouraged wicked People to ſteal Diſhes, Plates, &c. knowing they had Receivers for them. 2. It was ordained, That no Bodies corporate make any Acts or Ordinances, but what are examined and approved by the Chancellor, Treaſurer of England, Chief Juſtices of either Benches, or Juſtices of Aſſize, upon pain of forfeiting forty Pounds. 3. That Perſons concerned in a Riot, ſhall forfeit twenty Pounds, and be impriſoned. 4. But it is difficult to believe that, whilst he suffered his Subjects to be oppressed by these Ministers, he really intended to do justice to all the World.

Death of the Queen of Castile. p. 112. Hall. Bacon. Hollingsh.

Isabella Queen of Castile dying the 26th of November, Ferdinand her Spouse writ the same day to Henry to give him notice thereof. He told him in his Letter, that the deceased Queen had appointed him in her Will Administrator of the Kingdom of Castile, for Jane their Daughter, Wife of the Archduke of Austria, and who by the death of the Queen her Mother was become Queen of Castile.

Dispute between Ferdinand and the Archduke his Son-in-law.

When the Archduke received the news of Isabella's death, he was employed in making War upon the Duke of Gueldres. This War preventing him from repairing into Spain so soon as he could have wished, he was obliged to leave to King Ferdinand his Father-in-law the Government of Castile, fully bent however to take it from him as soon as possible. On the other hand, Ferdinand improving Isabella's Will, pretended to keep the Administration of that Kingdom during his life, probably, because the deceased Queen had not limited the continuance.

Henry's uneasiness at it. Bacon.

This dispute bred some uneasiness in Henry, whose case was the same with Ferdinand's, in the opinion of many people. He was not ignorant that most of his Subjects' were perswaded, Elizabeth his Spouse had been of right the true Queen of England, and consequently the Crown was fallen after her decease to Henry her Son and lawful Successor. Though he affected to hold for certain, that the House of York had never any right to the Crown, he was however very uneasy, because in general the English were of another opinion. It is true, that besides his descent from the House of Lancaster, he founded his right upon two other titles; namely, Conquest, and the approbation of Parliament. But he perceived how weak these two foundations would prove, should the House of York, 1505. by some revolution come to gain ground. Upon this account, he was very attentive to what passed in Spain, looking upon the decision of this contest as a precedent for or against him. On the other hand, he was afraid that Philip, who had appeared for some time closely united with Lewis XII, would join in a League with that Monarch and the Emperour, to oblige Ferdinand to resign him Castile. In that case he foresaw, he should be forced either to abandon Ferdinand to these three potent enemies, or enter into a War with them to support him. Both were equally opposite to his interests. In fine, he had cast his eyes upon the Queen Dowager of Naples, Widow of King Ferdinand, for a Wife, in order to enjoy the large Dower assigned her in that Kingdom. Perhaps he hoped by marrying that Queen, to render himself umpire of the differences between Lewis XII and Ferdinand, concerning the Kingdom of Naples.

He projects to marry the Queen-Dowager of Naples. Bacon.

To be fully informed therefore of the disposition of the Castilians, and the qualities of the Queen of Naples, he sent three Persons into Italy and Spain, not as Ambassadors, but as travellers for their pleasure (1). However, to procure them access to the Queen of Naples and Ferdinand, he so ordered, that the Princess of Wales gave them Letters both for the King her Father and the young Queen. These Gentlemen's private instructions, with respect to the Queen, were very particular. The King wanted to be exactly informed of her age, complexion, stature, health, temper, inclinations, behaviour and estate. This shows he was not willing lightly to resolve. But the project vanished when the King heard from his Envoys, that indeed the Queen's jointure was very considerable; but had been changed by Ferdinand, since he was possessed of the Kingdom of Naples into a pension for life.

Affairs of Ferdinand and Philip.

When the Gentlemen arrived in Spain, the contest between Ferdinand and Philip his Son-in-law was still in the same state. They therefore acquainted the King, that Ferdinand continued to govern Castile as Administrator; and even hoped to persuade Philip to leave him the Administration freely during life, both by means of some of his Council whom he had gained, and by threatening him to marry again, and so give an Heir to the Kingdom of Arragon: That therefore, there was a project of marriage between Ferdinand and Germaine de Foix, 1505. which would be certainly accomplished, in case Philip molested the King his Father-in-law. They informed him moreover, that Ferdinand's Secretary had discovered to them, as a great secret, that the marriage of Prince Charles of Austria with Claude of France would not take effect, because Lewis XII, was resolved to give his Daughter to Francis Duke of Angoulême his presumptive Heir. That then, on supposition that Philip would remain in the Low-Countries with his Queen, Ferdinand intended to demand Mary the King's second Daughter for the young Prince of Austria. These informations containing nothing certain, Henry could take no measures, till he saw the course of the Spanish affairs.

Philip and Jane take the Title of King and Queen of Castile.

Whilst Ferdinand and Philip were in Treaty concerning their difference, Philip and Jane were proclaimed King and Queen of Castile at Brussels; which showed, they intended not to resign for ever the Administration of Castile to Ferdinand, as he had flattered himself. Mean while, the War of Gueldres, and Queen Jane's being near her time, hindered them from executing their resolution of going to Castile. They knew, the Castilians were not pleased with Ferdinand, and did not doubt that as soon as they appeared, all would declare for them. For the same reason, Ferdinand used all sorts of artifices to dissuade them from this Voyage,

Death of the Duke of Savoy.

In the mean while, Margaret of Austria, Philip's Sister, lost her Spouse the Duke of Savoy, who died the 10th of September. Some days after the new Queen of Castile was delivered of a Princess who was called Mary, and was afterwards Queen of Hungary.

Henry's Alliance with the Duke of Saxony. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 114, 120.

This year was very barren of remarkable events with regard to England. Besides what has been related, we find only a Treaty of Alliance between Henry and George Duke of Saxony, Hereditary Governour of Frise, to whom Henry had sent Ambassadors (2) ever since February. This Treaty was concluded the 30th of December.

1506. Philip and Jane set out for Spain. Hall.

The War of Gueldres being ended, and Queen Jane able to travel, Philip resolved to carry her into Castile, knowing it to be the only way to secure the Government of that Kingdom. Though they intended to go by Sea, they chose the Winter, it seems, to surprise Ferdinand, who probably, would not expect them at that Season. They departed the 10th of January under a strong Convoy prepared for that purpose. But before they got out of the Channel, a terrible storm (3) dispersed their Fleet, and the Ship on which they were, with much difficulty ran into Weymouth (4) in England, having been in great danger. The King and Queen were so fatigued and sick, that contrary to the opinion of their Council they would land to refresh their Spirits.

A Storm drives them into England. They land at Weymouth. Hall. Stow. Bacon. Hollingsh.

Mean while the People of the Country seeing a numerous Fleet, were very much alarmed. They immediately ran to their Arms, and Sir Thomas Trenchard at the head of some Troops marched to Weymouth (5), to concert measures with the Inhabitants in case of an Invasion. When he heard, the King and Queen of Castile were landed, he waited upon them, humbly inviting them to his House, till the King was informed of their arrival. Philip would have gladly re-imbarked, but perceived he should not be suffered till the King's orders were received, to whom an express was dispatched. So, without much intreaty he consented to stay till that time.

The King sends his Compliments to them. Hall.

As soon as Henry had notice of the King and Queen of Castile's arrival, he sent the Earl of Arundel (6) with his Compliments, and to tell them, he would make all possible haste to come and embrace them. The Earl withal assured them from the King, that they were as much master in his Dominions as himself. Philip finding there was no avoiding the King's visit, believed he should gain time by going to him. To that end, he posted to Windsor (7), whilst his Queen followed by easy Journeys. Henry received them both with all imaginable marks of Friendship, but however, ruminating all the while, how to reap some advantage from the accident which had thrown them into his Dominions (8).

Treaty of Commerce renewed in favour of the English. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 123, ---132.

Some days after, he insinuated to Philip, that as his condition was altered, it would be proper to renew their Treaty of Commerce, to which Philip agreed, though the reason alledged by Henry was of no force. For Philip, by being King of Castile, was not less Sovereign of

But Henry had his aim, and Philip plainly perceived, that being in his power, he ought carefully to avoid all occaſions of offending him, leſt he ſhould find ſome pretence to detain him in England. He was not ignorant of the ſtrict Union between Henry and Ferdinand, and was under ſome apprehenſions, that Henry would think of obſtructing his Voyage, to oblige his Father-in-law. However this be, the Treaty was renewed, but with ſome alterations to the advantage of the Engliſh. Amongſt other things, an Article of the old Treaty was ſuppreſſed, which permitted Philip's Subjects to fiſh on the Coaſts of England. This made the Inhabitants of the Low-Countries call it [Intercurſus Malus, or] the bad Treaty.

Henry's Marriage with the Dutcheſs of Savoy agreed upon.

This affair being finiſhed, Henry opened his mind to Philip concerning his deſign to marry Margaret his Siſter, Widow of the Duke of Savoy (1). Philip ſeemed very well pleaſed with the propoſal. And indeed, nothing could be more for his advantage than to make Henry his friend by this Alliance, leſt he ſhould openly eſpouſe the King of Arragon's quarrel. So, the Marriage was concluded at Windſor, the 20th of March (2). By the Articles ſigned by both, Philip promiſed to give the Ducheſs his Siſter, three hundred thouſand Crowns [of French Gold] (3), with a yearly penſion of three thouſand eight hundred and fifty. Mean while, Henry fearing Philip would go from his word, when he was out of his power, cauſed to be inſerted in the Treaty, that the principal Lords of the Low-Countries ſhould ſwear, they would uſe their utmoſt endeavours to procure the accompliſhment of this Mar- riage. The Oaths of ſeveral of the Lords, in purſuance of this Article, are to be ſeen in the Collection of the Publick Acts.

Henry demands of Philip the Earl of Suffolk. Philip denies him. Hall. Bacon. Hollingſh.

Henry had one thing more to obtain of Philip, without which he could not think of letting him go, though outwardly he continued to careſs him. And that was, to deliver to him the Earl of Suffolk, who was then in Flanders. But at the firſt overture, Philip told him plainly, he could not comply with his requeſt, being bound in honour not to ſacrifice a Lord whom he had taken under his protection; that beſides, it would be diſhonorable to himſelf, ſince the World would not fail to ſay, he was uſed as a priſoner. Henry, who little regarded what the World ſaid, provided he obtained his ends, replied, he would take all the diſhonour upon himſelf. This anſwer threw Philip into great Perplexity. He was unwilling to betray the Earl of Suffolk, after promiſe to protect him. But on the other hand, he perceived Henry was bent upon having that Lord at any rate, and had in his hands an infallible means to obtain him. Beſides, in the preſent poſture of his affairs, not being yet certain, whether he ſhould not be forced to go to war with his Father-in-law, it was eaſy to foreſee, he might ſtand in need of the King of England, and conſequently it would be very wrong to diſoblige him. Wherefore, he ſuddenly came to a reſolution, and with an air of Confidence ſpoke in this manner: Sir, ſince you are pleaſed to give Law to me, permit me to do the ſame by you. I will deliver the Earl, but you ſhall give me your honour not to touch his Life. Henry agreeing to this condition, Philip deſired the thing might be done in a manner honorable for both. I will ſo order it, added he, that the Earl ſhall come to England of his own accord, by which it will appear that I have ſollicited and obtained his Pardon, and that you were very ready to grant it. Henry approving the expedient, the Earl of Suffolk willingly accepted the offer made him (4). Mean while, Henry being deſirous to have the Earl in his power before Philip's departure, continued his entertainments and diverſions, on pretence of doing honour to the King and Queen of Caſtile, but in reality, to gain time till the Earl's arrival. He admitted Philip to the Order of the Garter, and Philip made the Prince of Wales, Knight of the Golden-Fleece. After that, Henry carried his Gueſts to London, where they were magnificently entertained. Shortly after, the Earl of Suffolk came from Flanders, and was conveyed to the Tower. Thus, Henry under colour of doing him honour, kept Philip in England above three months, till he had obtained his deſires (5). In all appearance, Philip ſaw plainly, through all the Careſſes he received, that it was not in his power to depart when he pleaſed. Elſe, it is not likely, as he intended to ſail into Spain in January, he would have willingly ſtaid in England till the end of April, or the beginning of May.

1506. When Philip and Jane were in Caſtile, the people ſhewed ſo great affection for them, that Ferdinand could eaſily ſee, his endeavours to keep the Government of the Kingdom would be vain. Accordingly, without inſiſting any more upon his Adminiſtratorſhip, which could take place only in the Queen his Daughter's abſence, he withdrew into his own Realm of Arragon. Afterwards, he made a Voyage to Naples, where Gonzolvo his General began to make him uneaſy, and thereby Philip and Jane remained, though not long, in poſſeſſion of Caſtile. Within a few months, Philip was ſeized with a Diſtemper, of which he died the 25th of September. He left the Guardianſhip of his Son Charles to Lewis XII, who appointed the Lord de Chievres for his Governor. This choice, which was generally approved, and was a clear evidence of Lewis's Sincerity and Diſintereſtedneſs, proved fatal to France, as the Governor made his Pupil more able than was neceſſary for the good of the Kingdom.

Philip's death. Hall. Bacon.

The death of Philip ſo affected his Queen, that ſhe loſt her reaſon, and became entirely uncapable of governing the State. Whereupon Ferdinand her Father reſumed the adminiſtration of affairs, which he had been deprived of but five months. He is ſaid to take no great care of the Queen's cure, leſt recovering her Senſes, ſhe ſhould ſend him back again to Arragon.

Jane loſes her Senſes, and Ferdinand returns to Caſtile. Bacon.

The diſintereſtedneſs ſhewn by Lewis XII, with reſpect to the young Archduke Prince of Spain, did not hold long. He had promiſed to give him Claude his eldeſt Daughter in Marriage, but thought it more proper to marry her to Francis Duke of Angoulême his preſumptive Succeſſor. Moreover, being apprehenſive of a League againſt him, between the Emperor, the Archduke, and Ferdinand, and that the King of England might come into it alſo, he endeavoured to embroil young Charles's affairs, by exciting the Duke of Gueldres to renew the war.

Lewis XII gives to the Duke of Angoulême his Daughter, promiſed to Charles of Auſtria. Hall. P. Daniel.

1507. The Archduke being too young to govern, the Flemings prayed the Emperor his Grandfather to take the Adminiſtration in his Grandſon's name. Maximilian granted their requeſt, and till he could come himſelf, ſent them Margaret his Daughter, Widow of the Duke of Savoy.

Margaret Ducheſs of Savoy governs the Low-Countries.

Upon that Princeſs's arrival at Bruſſels, ſhe concluded with Henry a proviſional Treaty of Commerce, till ſome differences cauſed by the late Treaty between the Merchants of both Nations could be adjuſted. This Treaty was ſigned at Bruges, the 5th of June.

Treaty of Commerce with the Low-Countries. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 168.

The ſame Ambaſſadors that were aſſembled at Calais, ſpent there the reſt of the year, in treating of the Marriage of Charles Archduke of Auſtria, Sovereign of the Low-Countries, and Prince of Caſtile, with Mary, Henry's ſecond Daughter (6). At length, on the 21ſt of December, they ſigned a Treaty, that Charles ſhould marry the Princeſs Mary, as ſoon as he was fourteen years old, and that her portion ſhould be two hundred and fifty thouſand Crowns of Gold (7). The young Prince ran the hazard of loſing the Kingdom of Arragon, Valencia, Granada, and the Principality of Catalonia, his Grandfather Ferdinand having married Germaine de Foix. But happily for him, they had no Children.

Marriage agreed upon between Mary the King's Daughter with Charles of Auſtria. p. 171—230. Bacon.

Though Henry's Coffers were full, he was not weary of heaping up Money. We have ſeen, that in the year 1504, the Parliament gave him a Subſidy for the Marriage of the Queen of Scotland his Daughter. But the year was not expired before he iſſued out a Proclamation to levy a Benevolence, by his own Authority, and without any apparent neceſſity; ſo that this Conduct could be aſcribed only to his inſatiable deſire of hoarding up Money (8). He was grown ſo abſolute in his Kingdom, that no Man durſt oppoſe his will, or even ſhew the leaſt diſcontent. Mean while, Empſon and Dudley continued their Extortions and Oppreſſions with all imaginable rigour. This very year 1507, they ſharply proſecuted the Mayor of London (9), for neglecting to bring to juſtice a 1507. Coiner of falſe Money, and becauſe he would not, or could not pay an exorbitant Fine, ſent him to the Tower. The Sheriffs, Aldermen, and all that had borne any office in the City, were queſtioned and proſecuted with the ſame rigour, and compelled to pay to the King Fines, proportioned not to their Abilities, but to the King's and his Miniſters rapaciouſneſs (1).

The King is ſeized with the Gout, which turns to a Ptiſick. Hall. Bacon.

Whilſt the King was wholly intent upon heaping up riches, he found himſelf frequently ſeized with the Gout. At firſt he diſregarded it, as not believing it dangerous. But by degrees the humour falling upon his Lungs, it turned to a Ptiſick, which made him perceive he had not long to live. He ſuffered however his two Miniſters to continue their exactions without any reſpect of perſons. He was ſo charmed to ſee his Coffers full of Gold and Silver, that he could not reſolve to put a ſtop to the ſhameful proceedings which daily brought him in freſh Sums. He is ſaid to have amaſſed eighteen hundred thouſand pounds Sterling. This Sum will appear prodigious, if 'tis conſidered that Money was then much ſcarcer in Europe than at preſent. He laid up his Treaſures under his own key and keeping, in ſecret places at Richmond (2).

He heaps up 1,800,000 l. Bacon.

As the Marriage of the Princeſs Mary with the Archduke was then the only conſiderable affair Henry was employed in, he ſpent the whole year 1508 in taking meaſures to ſecure its accompliſhment. The Acts of this year, in the Collection, ſcarce regard any other affair. At length, on the 17th of December, the Marriage was accompliſhed per verba de Præſenti, the Lord de Berghes being the young Prince's Proxy. As ſuch, he eſpouſed the Princeſs, gave her a Ring, and ſaluted her publickly in the name of the Prince her Spouſe (3).

Charles borrows of Henry 50,000 Crowns upon a Jewel. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 234 ——239.

About the ſame time, the Archduke pawned to the King a Jewel called the rich Flower-de-luce (4), for the Sum of fifty thouſand Crowns. The Emperor as Grandfather and Guardian of Charles, approved of the Marriage and Loan. In all likelihood, the Money was borrowed for him. He had occaſion for it to make a figure in the League of Cambray, which he had concluded this year, with the Pope and the King of France, againſt the Venetians, who were become formidable to all Italy.

Henry thinks no more of his own Marriage.

As to Henry's Marriage with Margaret of Auſtria, tho' it was concluded in 1506, it was no more thought of, after that Monarch, fallen into a Ptiſick, perceived he was fitter to think of death than a wife.

1509. A General Pardon. Hall. Stow.

The King finding he daily grew worſe was pleaſed to prepare for death, by granting a general Pardon. He diſcharged likewiſe, with his own Money, all Priſoners about London that lay for Fees or Debts, under forty Shillings.

He orders his Heir to make Reſtitution. Bacon.

Then he made his Will, ordering that his Heir ſhould make Reſtitution of whatever his Officers and Miniſters had unjuſtly taken from his Subjects. But this remorſe came too late. As he could not reſolve to make this reſtitution in his Life-time, the Prince his Son thought not proper to part with the Money amaſſed by the King his Father.

Death of Henry VII. Hall. Bacon.

He died at Richmond the 22d of April 1509, having lived two and fifty years, and reigned three and twenty and eight months. His death is ſaid to happen very ſeaſonably, for had he lived much longer, the Prince his Son, now in his ſeventeenth year, might not have had patience to wait till his Father's death put him in poſſeſſion of the Throne. In that caſe, he might have ſupported himſelf with the Queen his Mother's Title, Heireſs of the Houſe of York, and pretended that the King his Father reigned only in right of his Queen. This pretenſion would have been capable of reviving the old quarrel, and rekindling a Civil War in the Kingdom. But the King's death removed the fears of the Engliſh.

His Iſſue. Sandford.

Henry VII had three Sons (5) and four Daughters. Arthur his eldeſt, as was obſerved, died in his ſeventeenth year. Henry his ſecond, ſucceeded him, and Edmund his third died at the age of five years. Of his four Daughters, two died in their childhood (6), and the other two, Margaret and Mary, are ſufficiently known by what has been ſaid.

His Character. Bacon. Hall.

If the Hiſtory of this reign be read with never ſo little attention, it will eaſily be perceived, that Henry's views were but two. The firſt was to keep the Crown, acquired by extraordinary good fortune, and perhaps unthought of, before he was invited into England by the Duke of Buckingham. The other was, to accumulate riches. As he never ſuffered himſelf to be diverted by other thoughts, his whole application centered upon one ſingle object, namely, upon thoroughly examining every thing that could have any relation to the two ends he had propoſed. Ambition, Honour, Glory, Love, Pleaſures, and all the other paſſions which generally diſquiet the hearts of Princes, made but little Impreſſion upon his. Content with enjoying his Crown, he thought neither of new acquiſitions, nor of rendering his name illuſtrious by great actions. All his thoughts were confined to prevent or defeat the deſigns of his domeſtick Enemies, or to well fill his Coffers. He had a wonderful Sagacity, to diſcover in the affairs that occurred, the ſide from whence ſome advantage could be drawn. This is what he plainly ſhewed in the affair of Bretagne, in his pretended wars with France and Scotland, and even in his domeſtick troubles, which by his addreſs, turned all to his profit (7). 1509.

Though he was ſometimes forced to take arms, never Prince loved peace more than he (8). As he had no ambition, he ſaw no advantage for him in War. On the contrary, he conſidered that all the events of a War, whether foreign or domeſtick, were againſt him. The former could at moſt but procure him ſome glory and acquiſitions abroad, of which he was not very fond; and by the latter he might be a great loſer. Beſides, a time of commotions afforded no opportunities to accumulate riches. So, laying down this fixed principle of his policy, not to engage in any War without an abſolute neceſſity, he never ſwerved from it. It is this that made him unconcernedly behold the loſs of Bretagne, and without reſentment ſuffer the inſults of the King of Scotland, becauſe it was not from the War that he intended to reap any advantage, but only from the preparations that were to be made to ſupport it. However, this policy would have been unſeaſonable when he was attacked by domeſtick enemies, whoſe aim was to rob him of his Crown. As his all was then at ſtake, he chearfully faced the danger, though with all the precautions poſſible not to run any hazard. He won two Battles upon the Rebels, one at Stoke, the other at Black-Heath. But in both he was very ſuperior in number of Troops, and fought againſt Perſons ill-armed and unſkilled in the art of War. So, it cannot be ſaid what he would have done, had he been oppoſed with equal Forces. It is no leſs difficult to know, whether it was owing to his courage that he headed his Armies in Perſon, or to his diſtruſt of thoſe that ſerved him. However this be, he was always fortunate in his domeſtick Wars, and thereby gained ſo great a reputation, that all the Princes of Europe earneſtly courted his Alliance. On the other hand, the eſteem Foreigners expreſſed for him, did not a little contribute to render him formidable to his Subjects. I ſay, formidable, for it is certain, he was never beloved. In a word, his method of governing, which approached to arbitrary power, eſpecially towards the end of his reign, his inſatiable avarice, his haughtineſs, his pride, and his dark and reſerved temper, were no proper qualities to win the affection of his People.

He never opened his mind to any man, except perhaps to one or two of his Miniſters. As for the reſt, he ſet them to work without their knowing themſelves the motives of their own proceedings. The World was ſo perſuaded, he had always ſome hidden deſign even in his moſt indifferent actions, that what was only a pure effect of chance, was often aſcribed to his policy.

His Spies in foreign Courts gave him an extenſive knowledge of all that paſſed there. On the other hand, his Ambaſſadors were always charged to inform themſelves by all ſorts of ways, of the ſecrets of the Princes to whom they were ſent. Very often this was the principal article of their inſtructions. By this means he made ſuch diſcoveries as enabled him to convince the foreign Miniſters reſiding at his Court, of his great inſight into their Maſter's affairs. Hence he reaped many conſiderable advantages, chiefly in that the Princes of Europe fearing his abilities, were very forward to live in good underſtanding with him. His ſtrict friendſhip with Ferdinand King of 1509. Arragon, a Prince of much the ſame character, was extremely uſeful to him. Probably, it hindered the Court of France from interpoſing more in the affairs of England, and was one of the principal cauſes of his conſtant Peace with his Neighbours.

Inſtead of increaſing the credit of the Nobility, he took all poſſible care to leſſen it. His Council was almoſt wholly compoſed of Churchmen and Lawyers, who being devoted to him, and aiming only to pleaſe him, never oppoſed his Will. This unlimited compliance of his Council, was the cauſe of his entirely addicting himſelf to his natural paſſion of heaping up money, there being no Perſon about him, that had boldneſs or conſcience enough to give him good advice upon that head. This conduct drew upon him the hatred of the Engliſh, which at firſt made him ſomething uneaſy, but when he had ſurmounted all his troubles, he regarded it not. On the contrary, he affected to rule with an abſolute power, making of his Council a Court of Juſtice, where all the Pleas of the Crown were decided, which had never been ſeen before.

He has been extremely praiſed for the good Laws made in his reign, as if he had been the ſole Legiſlator, and his Parliament no ways concerned. Hence perhaps was given him the glorious name of the Solomon of England, though he much more reſembled that Prince in the heavy yoke he laid on his People. But if theſe Laws are carefully examined, it will doubtleſs be found that the King's intereſt was the true motive, tho' in appearance they ſeemed to be made for the good of the People. Thus did William the Conqueror formerly act, whom our Henry reſembled in ſo many things, that they may be very juſtly compared. In ſhort, Henry's moſt diſtinguiſhing character was, that he lived entirely for himſelf, conſidered things only with reſpect to his own private intereſt, and regarded not any affairs where that was not concerned. Indeed, ſuch a character is not uncommon among Princes. But he had this in particular, that whereas the intereſt of other Princes is uſually divided into ſeveral branches, Henry's was in a manner contained in one ſingle branch, namely, to have always full Coffers.

He was extremely ſuſpicious, as are generally thoſe who act by ſecret ways, becauſe they think all the World like themſelves. The Houſe of York's title, and the People's opinion concerning it, filled his mind with fears and ſuſpicions, with which he was continually racked. It is true he took great care to conceal his uneaſineſs. But his conduct and precautions plainly demonſtrated, his mind was not as he would have had it thought to be, at reſt. This perpetual diſtruſt led him inceſſantly to ſeek means to prevent the dangers, in which he was not always ſucceſsful. Witneſs the report he cauſed to be ſpread that the Duke of York was alive, which had a quite contrary effect to what he expected. His genius was but mean. He ſaw better near than at a diſtance, and his wiſdom conſiſted more in extricating himſelf out of difficulties, than in finding means to avoid them. The chief troubles of his reign may be ſaid to happen by his fault. However, he acquired, by a long experience, qualities which by nature he had not.

It is not ſurprizing that a Prince always intent upon preventing the Rebellion of his Subjects, and continually employed in heaping up money, ſhould have performed nothing glorious for himſelf or the Kingdom. Conquerors do not always make the greateſt Kings. On the contrary, Peace would have been very advantageous to the Engliſh, had it rendered them happy. But it was ſtill more fatal to them than War it ſelf, ſince the King's inſatiable avarice inceſſantly carried him to deviſe means to accumulate riches, which could be done only at their expence. There are Princes that heap up money ſolely to diſperſe it; but Henry kept it carefully in his Coffers, without any communication. Liberality was a virtue he did not pretend to. If he made any preſents, it was only to Spies or Informers. 1509.

As for his Religion and Morals, nothing certain can be affirmed, by reaſon of the contrarieties which met in him. He was chaſte, temperate, an enemy to open and ſcandalous vices, conſtant in the exerciſes of devotion, and obſerving ſtrict juſtice where his intereſt was not concerned. But on the other hand, his extreme avarice made him commit many injuſtices, and the fear of loſing his Crown, cauſed him to conſider as lawful, all means which could free him from that danger, how unjuſt ſoever they might be in other reſpects. The Earl of Warwick's death will be an everlaſting ſtain to his memory. His making a jeſt of Religion, in cauſing a ſolemn proceſſion to be made on purpoſe to ſhew that Prince to the People, and the Excommunications he ordered to be pronounced againſt his own Spies, are clear evidences that his Religion was not proof againſt his intereſt.

In general, it cannot be denied, this Prince had great abilities. But as theſe abilities centered only in himſelf, they would have been more valuable in a private Perſon than a great Monarch. Though all his projects were crowned with ſucceſs, his reign cannot be ſaid to be happy, either for himſelf or for England. He lived under continual fears and ſuſpicions, and his Subjects were always expoſed either to domeſtick troubles or oppreſſion. One thing rendered this reign remarkable, namely, that by Henry's abilities, the Civil Wars, which had ſo long afflicted England, were at length happily ended. I ſay happily, ſince it was very indifferent, with reſpect to the welfare of the Engliſh, whether the Kingdom was governed by a Prince of the Houſe of Lancaſter, or a Prince of the Houſe of York.

Henry VII was of a ſerious temper, ever thoughtful and intent upon his affairs, without being diverted by his pleaſures, to which he was little addicted. He had a Book wherein he marked down with his own hand, the qualities and characters of the Perſons he knew, in order to employ them upon occaſion. A Monkey (1) that he kept in his Chamber, having one day tore this Note-Book all to pieces, he appeared grieved as at ſome very great loſs.

He was of ſtature taller than the common ſort. His face was long, thin, and lean, like the reſt of his Body, but withal very grave, which made people ſpeak to him with fear. He could however be affable when his affairs required it. He was rather ſtudious than learned. What he read in his leiſure hours was generally in French, tho' he underſtood Latin too.

He founded a Chapel at Windſor, for which he obtained of the Pope privileges and indulgences. He turned into an Hoſpital the Palace of the Savoy, built [by Peter Earl of Savoy] in the reign of Henry III. He founded likewiſe ſeveral Convents of Dominicans and Franciſcans (2). But of all his Structures, that which did and ſtill does him the greateſt honour, is his Chapel in Weſtminſter-Abbey, which gives not place in any reſpect to the moſt ſtately Chapels in Chriſtendom (3). There he was buried (4), and there the Bodies of his Succeſſors lie with his (5). Act. Pub. XII. p. 565, 591, 644, 672. XIII. p. 60. Stow. Hollingſh. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 100, 102.

The STATE of the CHURCH of the Fifteenth Century.

State of the Affairs of the Church in the XVth Century.

THE Chriſtian Church had never been in ſo deplorable a ſtate as in the XVth Century. God's Juſtice and Mercy, and Chriſt's meritorious death, were ſcarce any more the object of a Chriſtian's Faith. Moſt people's religion conſiſted in Pilgrimages, and the worſhip of the bleſſed Virgin, Saints and Relicts. As for the Clergy, their whole care was confined to the ſupporting themſelves in that height of Grandeur and Power they had enjoyed for ſeveral Centuries, and to the ſeeing that no Man preſumed to diſpute their Immunities. Diſcipline was never more remiſs. The Clergy ſeemed to look upon their Spiritual Power and Juriſdiction, only as a means to prevent the violation of their Temporal Privileges. Provided their rights were untouched, every one might do what ſeemed good in his own eyes. The authority of the Church was become the capital point of Religion.

The Papal power had ſtrangely increaſed every Century, each Pope having made it his buſineſs to enlarge it as much as poſſible. They were come at length to diſpoſe of all the Church-Preferments in Chriſtendom, and to be the ſupreme Judges in all Cauſes Eccleſiaſtical. National Synods were no longer held. And indeed, of what uſe would they have been, ſince the Court of Rome claimed the Cognizance of all Church-matters? In a word, the Pope was become the Centre of Religion, to which every thing was to tend. The privileges of Churches, the prerogatives of Sovereigns, were all annulled by the Non-obſtante Clauſe, uſually inſerted in every Bull. But it was not only over Spirituals that the Popes had ſtretched their authority; they pretended alſo to extend it over Temporals, under colour that Religion was concerned in all affairs. Kings themſelves were not out of their reach. In all the Marriages of Princes there was occaſion for the Pope's Diſpenſation: Neither Peace nor Truce of any moment was concluded without the Pope's mediation or guaranty. Some Popes were ſeen to carry their pretenſions ſo far, as to enjoin Peaces or Truces without the conſent of the parties. In ſhort, it is extremely probable, they would have wholly engroſſed the Temporal Power as well as the Spiritual, if the Schiſms of the XVth Century had not cauſed them to loſe ground. The Revolutions of the following Century made them loſe ſtill more. However this be, the Popes were become real Sovereigns, not only with reſpect to the power they had aſſumed, but alſo with regard to the immenſe riches, which through numberleſs Channels flowed into the vaſt Ocean of the Apoſtolick Chamber. Tenths, Firſt-fruits, Taxes for the ſervice of the Chamber, Diſpenſations for all ſorts of Caſes, as well contrary to the Law of God, as to the Canons of the Church, Subſidies exacted from time to time from the Clergy, for the occaſions of the Holy See, Cruſades, Benefices which are ſeldom beſtowed without a previous bargain with the Apoſtolick Chamber; in a word, Simony openly practiſed by many Popes, ſome of whom were accuſed and convicted, were inexhauſtible Fountains which maintained the Affluence and Luxury of the Court of Rome. It was almoſt impoſſible, that purity of Life and true religious Principles ſhould be preſerved undefiled, amidſt ſo much Grandeur and Riches. On the contrary, the Popes were the more liable to make an ill uſe of their power, as moſt of them were not born for ſo high a Station. Accordingly we find in Hiſtory, that Rome and Avignon were the Centre of Pride, Avarice, Luxury, Senſuality, and all the moſt ſcandalous Vices. The Popes were neither learned nor religious. Hardly was there one to be found that might paſs for an honeſt Man, even according to the maxims of the world. And yet, all the preambles of their Bulls were only expreſſions of their Zeal, their Charity, their Humility, their Juſtice; whilſt for the moſt part what they enjoined was an authentick proof of their Pride and Tyranny. This is no aggravation, for the Authors who writ before the Reformation, have ſaid a hundred times more. Nay, it has even been publickly preached before the Councils.

It may be eaſily imagined, that ſuch Popes did not take much care to fill, what they called the ſacred College, with perſons truly pious and devout. It is true, during this Century, there were Cardinals of great repute, and eminent for their Wit, their Eloquence, their political Virtues, and their capacity for temporal Affairs. But theſe, for the moſt part, were men governed by the maxims of the world, and who conſidered Religion but as a means to eſtabliſh their fortune. The Legates, ſent to the ſeveral States of Chriſtendom, were ſo many Incendiaries, who ſought only to ſow diſcord and diviſion among Princes, or excite them to ſhed the blood of their own Subjects. In a word, they regarded only the Intereſt of their maſter and the Roman See, making no Conſcience to violate all the rules of Religion and Equity, to accompliſh their ends.

The reſt of the Clergy in general were not better. Moſt of the Biſhops were promoted to the Epiſcopacy, purely for having rendered themſelves commendable by their attachment to the Intereſts of the Court of Rome, or for their ſervices to Princes in their temporal concerns. They were perſons educated at Court, and inſtructed in the maxims of the world. Cruelty, Injuſtice, Diſhoneſty, were but too common among them. Nay, they were conſidered as ſo many Virtues, when employed in the perſecution of ſuch as were termed Hereticks, eſpecially of thoſe that dared to conteſt any of the Pope's or the Clergy's pretended rights.

As for real Learning, it was ſcarce heard of in this Century. School-Divinity, and the knowledge of the Canon-Law made the whole merit of the Eccleſiaſticks. It was the only thing by which they could hope to arrive at Church-Dignities. On the other hand, the Monks, who were crept into moſt of the Profeſſorſhips in the Univerſities, had overwhelmed Divinity and Philoſophy with ſuch a heap of Jargon, as ſerved only to give their Diſciples falſe notions of Learning, and teach them to wrangle.

Such was in general the ſtate of the Church in the Century we are ſpeaking of. As for the Civil Affairs of Europe, they were in this and the following Centuries, as in the foregoing. The Sovereigns divided among themſelves by their different Intereſts, thought only of ſupplanting one another, and making their neighbour's loſs turn to their own gain. This drew them into bloody wars, which rendered their people miſerable, and ſuffered neither Princes nor Subjects to attend to the breaches in the Church, or think of means to heal them. Corruption was ſo great in the world, and in the Church, that God ſeemed to have abandoned Men to a reprobate Senſe, ſo blind and inſenſible were they grown. We may add, for the farther repreſentation of the ſad eſtate of the Church, the great progreſs of the Turks in Europe, during this unfortunate Century. The Greek Empire entirely deſtroyed, and ſeveral other Chriſtian States over-run by the Infidels, were plain tokens of the divine wrath againſt Chriſtians, to move them to ſearch after the Cauſe. But inſtead of ſeeking the Lord, they perſecuted with fire

Pennies, Half-pence, and Farthings. Thoſe old Pennies that bore divers Spurs, or the Mullet betwixt the Bars of the Croſs, were to go only for Half-pennies. To avoid clipping for the future, the King cauſed new Groats and Two-pences to be coined, having a circle round the outer part; and ordered, that the Gold hereafter to be coined, ſhould have the whole Scripture, or Inſcription, about every Piece. See Statut. 19 Hen. VII. c. 5. He was the firſt that after Henry III added the Number to his Name. He left off the Roſe that uſed to ſurround the King's Head, and inſtead thereof, gives his Head with a Side-Face, which was uſed before only on the Coins of William Rufus; but was continued by all his Succeſſors, except on the bad Money of Henry VIII, and beſt of Edward VI, and likewiſe crowned with an arched Crown; having this Inſcription, HENRIC. VII. DI. GRA. REX. ANG. Z. FR. leaving out on the ſmaller Monies the Title of France. On the Reverſe, inſtead of the inner Circle with the place of Coinage and the Pellets, he placed the Arms of France and England quartered, which he the firſt of our Engliſh Monarchs uſed conſtantly, but retained the outer Circle and Motto, POSVI DEV. ADIVTORE MEV. except on the ſmall Coins, whereon ſometimes is the Place of Coinage. Of theſe, the Pennies exhibit the King in his Robes upon the Throne, with Crown, Sceptre, and Ball: Reverſe, the Keys, which diſcover it to be of the Archbiſhop's coining. Theſe are the only Pieces that have not the Number, and are inſcribed HENRIC. DI. GRA. REX. ANG. In his 20th year, there were ſome few Shillings coined, and they, (being only forty in a Pound of Silver) were fair and large Pieces, a full third heavier than ours at this day. They are now choice Rarities in the Cabinets of the Curious. He is likewiſe ſaid to have coined ſmall Pieces, called Dandy-Prats, but of what Metal, Value, or Faſhion, is unknown. *Num. Brit. and ſword ſuch as ſought God alone, and refuſed to pay divine worſhip to Creatures.

To accompliſh a Reformation in the Church, which was ſo much wanted, all, or at leaſt the chief Princes of Europe, ſhould have joined their endeavours to promote ſuch a project. But how was it poſſible, that ſo many Sovereigns who had Religion ſo little at heart, ſhould ſacrifice their paſſions to ſo great a good? Or how could ſo many different Intereſts be reconciled? All Europe paſſionately wiſhed that the Church were reformed. Several Biſhops appeared to have the ſame deſire. Nothing was talked of in the Councils, but the Neceſſity of executing ſo noble a deſign. Nay, it ſeemed, that the Councils of Conſtance and Baſil intended to ſet about it effectually. But the well-inclined had neither prudence nor reſolution enough, to oppoſe the artifices and violence of the contrary party. We ſhall ſee hereafter, that it was the Popes, the Cardinals, and the principal Clergy who oppoſed, to their utmoſt, the projected Reformation, becauſe they were ſenſible it would prove prejudicial to their temporal Intereſts. On the other hand, when 'tis conſidered, with what eagerneſs and animoſity they laboured to root out the pretended Hereſies, which combated the temporal Grandeur of the Clergy, no other Inference can be made, than that they themſelves perceived the neceſſity of a Reformation which they would not admit, and that the Fountain of Corruption was in the principal Members of the Clergy, from whence it had but too great an Influence upon the reſt.

To repreſent to the Life the ſtate of the Church of the XVth Century, and ſet it in its true Light, it would be neceſſary to give a particular account of what paſſed at the Councils of Conſtance and Baſil. But this detail would lead me too far. Beſides, the Hiſtory of the firſt of theſe Councils is lately publiſhed, and writ with that plainneſs, circumſpection, and impartiality, that there is no room to ſuſpect that the Author (1) has ſuffered himſelf to be biaſſed by paſſion or prejudice. The Hiſtory of the Council of Baſil by the ſame hand, is ſoon to appear (2). So, referring the Reader to theſe two Hiſtories, I ſhall only relate in few words, the moſt remarkable paſſages of theſe Councils. This knowledge will be of uſe to underſtand the ſtate of the Church of England, which I ſhall preſently ſpeak of.

A brief account of the Council of Conſtance. L'Enfant.

The Schiſm, begun in 1378 by Urban VI, and Clement VII, was continued to the beginning of the xvth Century, by Boniface IX, and Benedict XIII, their Succeſſors. Boniface ſucceeding Urban VI, reſided at Rome, and Benedict, Succeſſor of Clement VII, remained at Avignon, where he was kept by the King of France, for fear he ſhould eſcape before the Schiſm was ended.

The Univerſity of Paris had propoſed a method to end this Schiſm, namely, that the two Popes ſhould reſign the Pontificate, which was called the method of Ceſſion. Boniface IX, and Benedict XIII, pretended both to be willing to take this method, for reſtoring Peace to the Church. But withal, they uſed ſo many evaſions, that it was eaſy to ſee, they had no ſuch deſire. And therefore the King of France had thought fit to ſecure the perſon of Benedict. This Monarch's illneſs afterwards placing the Duke of Orleans his Brother at the head of affairs, the young Prince was a great favourer of Benedict XIII, and in 1404, gave him an opportunity to make his eſcape. This ſame year Boniface IX died, and the Cardinals of his party choſe Innocent VII, who behaved like his Predeceſſor, with reſpect to the Ceſſion. To Innocent, who ſat in the Papal Chair but two years, ſucceeded Angelo Corario, who aſſumed the name of Gregory XII. Thus the Schiſm ſtill continued between Gregory and Benedict. Theſe two Popes pretending a deſire to end it by the method of Ceſſion, long amuſed the world with their diſſimulation and artifices. In ſhort, the Schiſm having now laſted thirty years, without any appearance that the two Popes would perform their promiſe, Gregory XII ſaw himſelf deſerted on a ſudden by his Cardinals, who retired to Piſa. There remained but four with him. On the other ſide, France, which was the principal ſupport of Benedict XIII, being tired with his evaſions, withdrew from his obedience, and the Pope having loſt that protection, went and reſided in Spain. But his Cardinals, refuſing to follow him, choſe to join Gregory's. Preſently after, the Cardinals of both parties, with one conſent, called a General Council at Piſa, to which moſt of the Princes of Europe ſent their Ambaſſadors and Prelates.

This Council, held in 1409, depoſed the two Popes, and gave the Cardinals leave to chooſe a new one, who aſſumed the name of Alexander V. But as Gregory and Benedict did not think themſelves lawfully depoſed, it happened, that inſtead of the two Popes before the Council, there were now three.

Alexander V dying in 1410, John XXIII was elected in his room, who called a General Council to meet at Conſtance in November 1414 (3). This Council found no better way to end the Schiſm, than by removing the three Popes. John XXIII and Benedict XIII were depoſed, and Gregory XII voluntarily reſigned the Pontificate. After that, the Council elected Cardinal Odo Colonna, who took the name of Martin V. John XXIII, who was committed to the Cuſtody of the Emperor Sigiſmund, having made his eſcape, ſubmitted to Martin V, who honoured him with a Cardinalſhip. As for Benedict XIII, he ſtill kept the title of Pope, and retiring to the Caſtle of Reniſcola, belonging to the Kingdom of Valencia, was ſuffered by the King of Arragon to live there in quiet. After his death, which happened not till 1424, his Cardinals choſe a Canon of Barcelona, who took the name of Clement VIII. But in 1429 he quitted his Dignity in favour of Martin V. Thus ended the Schiſm at length, after a one and fifty years continuance.

This abſtract, though ſhort, will enable us to judge of the character of the Popes, who governed the Church during theſe fifty years. They were Men who ſacrificed the peace and tranquillity of the Church to their own private intereſts, and damned without mercy, as far as lay in their power, all that were not of their party. They would without ſcruple have ingaged all Chriſtendom in a bloody War for their intereſts, if the Sovereign Princes had not been wiſer than they. Surely, one cannot but form a very melancholy idea of the State of the Church of thoſe days, when it is conſidered that the Chriſtians of both ſides acknowledged for Chriſt's Vicars, Popes whom they abhorred, and who indeed were ſo little worthy of the ſtation they enjoyed, that ſeveral were depoſed for Hereſy, Simony, and Perjury.

But I have ſtill one important reflection to make upon the conduct of the Council of Conſtance, the motive whereof is at firſt hard to be conceived. If the Council of Piſa was general and lawful, as that of Conſtance could not forbear owning, why were her deciſions not obſerved? Why was Gregory XII's reſignation accepted, a reſignation which ſuppoſed him ſtill to be Pope notwithſtanding his being depoſed? Why were terms offered him to induce him to quit the Pontificate? Why was Benedict XIII once more depoſed, when he had been already depoſed by a general Council? In ſhort, why was John XXIII deprived of his dignity, for not keeping his promiſe to reſign the Papacy, ſince it could not be queſtioned that he was really Pope and his miſſion lawful? Was not the authority of the Council of Piſa ſacrificed by theſe proceedings?

Let it not be objected that John XXIII was not depoſed for any defect in his miſſion, but for his crimes. It is certain, when his promiſe to reſign the Pontificate was required, it was ſolely with a view to put an end to the Schiſm. Had he reſigned with a good grace, he would never have been accuſed, much leſs condemned for the crime for which he was afterwards depoſed. It will be ſaid perhaps, that this inconvenience was not ſo great as that of perpetuating the Schiſm. But ſhould the ſtriking at the authority of a general Council be deemed a ſlight inconvenience? Did not the Council of Conſtance give occaſion to have her own authority diſputed? For, there is no reaſon why the depoſing of Benedict XIII and of John XXIII by the Council of Conſtance ſhould be more valid, than the depoſing the ſame Benedict XIII and Gregory XII, by the Council of Piſa.

However, through all this intricacy, the motive of the Council of Conſtance's proceedings is diſcoverable. The Schiſm manifeſtly tended to the diſſolution of the Papal dignity, which ſerved for baſis and foundation to moſt of the Clergy's privileges, and to the Hierarchy itſelf. Caſtile, Arragon, Navarre, Portugal, had been neutral ſome years, without owning any of the contending Popes. France had withdrawn her obedience from Benedict XIII, without transferring it to Gregory XII. In a word, the whole World in general began to contemn their excommunications, which they ſo viſibly abuſed. There was danger therefore that by degrees a Pope would be thought uſeleſs, and thereby the foundation of the Hierarchy would

(3) The Deputies to this Council from England were, firſt the Biſhops of Saliſbury, Bath, and Hereford, the Abbot of Weſtminſter, and Prior of Worceſter. But upon the death of the Biſhops of Saliſbury and Hereford, the Engliſh Prelates underſtanding that other Churches were repreſented by a more numerous Delegation, ſent Clifford Biſhop of London, the Chancellors of both Univerſities, with twelve Doctors, to this Council. Walſingham, p. 387. ——The Deputies mentioned in Rymer's Fœdera are theſe, Nicolas Biſhop of Bath and Wells, Robert of Sarum, John of St. Davids; William Abbot of Weſtminſter, John Prior of Worceſter, Thomas Spofford, Abbot of St. Mary's at York; Richard Earl of Warwick, Henry Fitz-hugh Lord Chamberlain, Sir Walter Hungerford, Sir Ralph Rocheford, John Honyngham, Doctor of Laws. have been undermined, and perhaps a new form of Government introduced into the Church. The Cardinals and Prelates of whom the Council of Conſtance was compoſed, were ſo highly concerned to avoid this inconvenience, that their ſacrificing all to that end, is not ſurprizing. This is the true reaſon of their conduct. But they took care to proceed very differently with regard to the pretended Hereticks, who openly conteſted the privileges of the Clergy. To extirpate a Hereſy ſo prejudicial to them, they made uſe of Fire and Sword, rather than ſacrifice the leaſt of their intereſts. This is what we are going to ſee in the manner they went to work in this reſpect.

All the World knows that John Huſs and Jerome of Prague were burnt alive at Conſtance. But every one has not been at the pains to examine, for what errors they ſuffered that rigorous puniſhment. They were then, and ſtill are to this day, charged with maintaining impious, horrible, and damnable Tenets. They were condemned as ſeditious, obſtinate, and incorrigible followers and defenders of Wickliff; hardened, crafty, malicious, and convicted Hereticks. Had there been yet ſtronger terms to expreſs the abhorrence of theſe Hereſies, they would have been uſed without ſcruple. But, wherein conſiſted theſe Hereſies? In their being Diſciples of Wickliff? If the authors who ſpeak of their ſentence be conſulted, ſcarce one will be found that ſays more. John Huſs and Jerome of Prague were followers of Wickliff, and conſequently abominable wretches, deſerving to be burnt. In the opinions of Wickliff then we are to ſearch for their errors. Now herein is an ambiguity, which has been conſtantly uſed to juſtify the condemnation of theſe two Doctors. It is hardly to be queſtioned, that the Council of Conſtance had that ſame ambiguity in view, when ſhe cauſed the errors and memory of Wickliff to be firſt ſtigmatized, before John Huſs and Jerome of Prague were brought upon their Trial.

Wickliff's opinions were of two kinds. Some concerned the principal Doctrines of Faith. Others related to the Hierarchy, the Clergy, their Juriſdiction, Power, and Riches. Wickliff did not believe Tranſubſtantiation. He rejected the invocation of Saints, the adoration of the Croſs and Images, Pilgrimages, and Relicks. On the other hand, he thought the Hierarchy had no foundation in Scripture. From whence he drew ſeveral concluſions againſt the exceſſive authority uſurped by the Popes, the Cardinals, the Biſhops. Moreover, he taxed the Clergy with leading very immoral and diſſolute lives, and maintained that the revenues of the Church were greatly miſapplied. From theſe principles his enemies inferred numberleſs conſequences, ſome whereof had never perhaps entered into his thoughts. There were at laſt found in his writings two hundred and ſixty capital errors. His followers added many more which he had never taught, and the whole was imputed to him, as if he had maintained them all in expreſs terms.

However it be, John Huſs embraced Wickliff's opinions, but it was only in what concerned the Hierarchy and Clergy. It is certain, he believed Tranſubſtantiation, and died in that belief. As for Images, his opinion was that a man might honour them, kneel to them, light up Wax-tapers before them, kiſs them, becauſe the intention referred that worſhip to the originals. So, it is a thing out of doubt, that he was not burnt for maintaining errors in the principal Doctrines of Faith, but for opinions which combated the exorbitant power and riches of the Church, that is to ſay, of the Clergy. All poſſible endeavours were uſed to make him confeſs, he believed not Tranſubſtantiation; but he could never be brought to ſuch a confeſſion. And yet, by the advice of the Cardinal of Florence, the Council condemned him upon the depoſition of the Witneſſes, who accuſed him of rejecting that Doctrine, without regarding his own expreſs declaration to the contrary. It is not very difficult to conceive the Council's aim, in cauſing that Article to be inſerted in Huſs's ſentence. The Council was ſenſible, it muſt have appeared very ſtrange, that a Perſon ſhould be burnt, whoſe Principles tended to a reformation, in the head and in the members of the Church, which all Chriſtendom required, and which the Council it ſelf feigned to believe neceſſary. It was requiſite therefore to juſtify the ſentence, by rendering this Man odious, as rejecting a fundamental Article of Faith. For this reaſon, without diſtinguiſhing Wickliff's errors, John Huſs and Jerome of Prague were condemned as followers of that Arch-Heretick. It was thereby inſinuated, that they embraced all the opinions of their maſter.

But to ſhew, by an unexceptionable teſtimony, that theſe two Men were burnt for their opinions concerning the Clergy, I need only quote what Æneas Sylvius, alias Pope Pius II, ſays in his Hiſtory of Bohemia. The Deputies of the Council having admoniſhed the accuſed to forſake their errors, and conform to the Church's ſentiments, they anſwered, That they were indeed lovers of the Holy Goſpel, and true Diſciples of Chriſt; That the Church of Rome, and all the other Churches in the World were far ſwerved from the Apoſtolical Traditions: That the Clergy ran after pleaſures and riches: That they lorded it over the People, affected the higheſt ſeats at entertainments, and bred Horſes and Dogs: That the revenues of the Church, which belonged to the poor Members of Chriſt, were conſumed in vanity and wantonneſs: That the Prieſts were ignorant of the Commandments of God, or if they did know them, lightly regarded them.

The Fathers of the Council, continues the Hiſtorian, perceiving and knowing the invincible obſtinacy of theſe People, judged that the corrupted Members of the Church that were incurable, ought to be cut off, leſt they ſhould infect the reſt of the Body. Accordingly ſentence was paſſed upon them, all the Fathers unanimouſly agreeing, that Perſons who rejected ſound Doctrine, approved by the Church, deſerved to be burnt.

This account moſt evidently ſhews, wherein conſiſted the Hereſy of John Huſs and Jerome of Prague; namely, in their accuſing the Clergy of Corruption. It was therefore, to deſtroy theſe enemies of the Clergy, that the Council made no ſcruple to violate the Safe-conduct given by the Emperor Sigiſmund to John Huſs, or at leaſt to allow him to violate it himſelf. Moreover the Council had no regard to the promiſe they had publickly given to Jerome of Prague, in order to draw him to Conſtance. It is true, the Council had inſerted theſe words in their engagement, Without prejudice to juſtice, and as far as the Catholick Faith requires it, a captious Clauſe, if ever there was one. For was not the Catholick Faith the very point in queſtion; and of what uſe could the Council's promiſe be to Jerome of Prague, unleſs againſt juſtice? Did he run any hazard, or ſtand in need of ſuch a promiſe, if he had not held the Tenets he was charged with?

Let us proceed now to the decree of this Council, againſt Communion in both kinds. We ſhall ſee in this, as well as in the foregoing Article, that the authority of the Church or the Clergy was the ſole point in queſtion. The Fathers of Conſtance condemned not Communion in both kinds as ſinful in itſelf. On the contrary, they owned, it was practiſed in the primitive Church, and that the Church had power to grant it to the Laity, if ſhe thought proper. But they anathematized ſuch as maintained, the Church had not a right to aboliſh this practice. What did they mean then by the Church? Did they not mean the Councils compoſed of the ſeveral Members of the Clergy? It is ſo true, that, in this decree, the Council's ſole view was to ſupport the authority of the Church Repreſentative, that, ſome years after, another General Council made no ſcruple to allow the Huſſites the liberty of communicating in both kinds, without any apprehenſion that the Faith was therein concerned, when they were willing to receive that liberty as a favour from the Church.

As to other opinions which appeared at the ſame time, but which attacked not the Clergy, the Council of Conſtance behaved with an aſtoniſhing coldneſs. John Petit, advocate of the Duke of Burgundy, maintained, it was lawful for any private Perſon to kill a Tyrant, even by ſurprize. This Tenet being brought before the Council, how did they proceed? After much ſollicitation, they declared it erroneous, without naming the Author, or coming upon his Perſon, though they had ordered Wickliff's Bones to be dug up thirty years after his burial. The Sect of the Scourgers (1) broached ſeveral capital errors. But the Council was content with the bare propoſal of finding ſome gentle means to reſtore them to the unity of the Church.

What reformation could be expected from a Council, which ſo rigorouſly proſecuted ſuch as conteſted the privileges of the Pope, the Cardinals and the Clergy? The reformation muſt have begun with the ſuppreſſion of moſt of theſe Prerogatives. Indeed, before Martin V's election, the reforming of the Court of Rome was talked of in the Council; and a liſt of the abuſes to be redreſſed, was drawn up. But by the artifices of ſome, and particularly of the Cardinals, this noble deſign came to nothing. A Pope was elected, and the Pope elect found means to have this Article deferred to a more convenient Seaſon.

(1) Otherwiſe called Flagellantes. This Sect firſt appeared at Perouſa in 1260, having for its Author a Hermit named Rainerus. They carried a Croſs in their hands, wore a Cowl on their heads, and went naked to the waſte. Twice a day, and once in the night, they laſhed themſelves with knotted Cords ſtuck with Points or Pins, which gave occaſion to their name. They affirmed, That their Blood united in ſuch a manner with Chriſt's, that it had the ſame virtue. They perſuaded the People, that the Goſpel had ceaſed, and ſuffered all ſort of Perjuries.

This

This is the ſum of the moſt remarkable Tranſactions in the Council of Conſtance. A very full account of theſe things will be found in the fore-mentioned new Hiſtory, to which the Reader is referred. Let us ſee now what the Council of Baſil acted with reſpect to the Huſſites, and the quarrel of Pope Eugenius IV, with the ſame Council. Nothing is more proper to ſhew the State of the Church of thoſe days.

Hiſtory of the Council of Baſil.

The Bohemians, who for the moſt part had embraced the opinions of John Huſs, highly reſented the uſage he had met with. This ſeverity ſerving only to confirm them in their Tenets, they reſolved to maintain them in ſpite of the Council's decrees. Communion in both kinds was the principal Doctrine. This occaſioned terrible commotions in Bohemia, which Martin V greatly inflamed by his haughty treatment of the Huſſites. In the midſt of theſe troubles, Wenceſlaus King of Bohemia dying, Sigiſmund his Brother, who was Emperor, pretended to the ſucceſſion. But the Bohemians rejected him, becauſe he would not conſent, they ſhould live in the Faith they profeſſed. Martin V ſupporting Sigiſmund, publiſhed a Cruſade againſt the Huſſites, and thereby obliged them to arm in defence of their lives. It is needleſs to inquire here, whether Sigiſmund had any right to mount the Throne of Bohemia without the conſent of the States. This is a query which would lead me too far. However that be, Ziska a Bohemian, heading the Huſſites, defeated Sigiſmund ſeveral times, and made him as well as the Pope deſpair of extirpating theſe pretended Hereticks by arms. This War laſted till the Council of Baſil, without Sigiſmund's being able to take peaceable poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Bohemia.

The Council of Baſil, which met in 1431, finding that the Arms of Sigiſmund and the Croiſés had not the ſucceſs that was expected, reſolved to make Peace with the Huſſites. Probably, their aim was to ſet Sigiſmund at any rate on the Throne of Bohemia, in order to inable him the better to take proper meaſures to extirpate theſe People. For that purpoſe, they ſent Deputies into Bohemia, to invite the Huſſites to come and produce their reaſons before the Council. They agreed to it, and their Deputies being arrived at Baſil, required theſe four things, for which they offered to be reconciled to the Church.

Firſt, That Communion in both kinds ſhould be adminiſtred to the Bohemian Laity.

Secondly, That offenders ſhould be puniſhed according to the Law of God, and by thoſe whoſe proper buſineſs it was.

Thirdly, That the word of God ſhould be preached by able Prieſts.

Fourthly, That the Clergy ſhould have no Temporal Juriſdiction.

Theſe were the ſentiments of the Huſſites, for which ſo bloody a War had been made upon them, even to the exciting all Europe againſt them. But it was not ſo much for their Doctrines that they were thus cruelly perſecuted, but for their obſtinate refuſal to ſubmit to the deciſions of the Church, and for their contempt of the Clergy. The Council uſed all poſſible endeavours to perſuade the Bohemian Deputies to an unconditional ſubmiſſion to the Church. But at laſt, perceiving they inſiſted upon the four Articles, the Council thought fit to grant them upon this condition, that they ſhould be firſt explained, becauſe being couched in general terms they might give occaſion to freſh diſputes. The Huſſites conſenting, the Council explained the four Articles as they judged convenient. After that, an agreement was drawn conformable to the four Articles and their explication.

This affair being thus ſettled, Sigiſmund demanded to be received for King of Bohemia, and was ſo accordingly, after ſigning certain conditions; namely, the approbation of the agreement, and ſome others relating thereto. It ſeemed that the perſecution againſt the Huſſites was thereby to ceaſe. But Sigiſmund was no ſooner on the Throne of Bohemia, but he diſappointed them. On the other hand, the Pope pretending, they obſerved not the conditions on which the four Articles were granted, poſitively refuſed to approve of the agreement. This occaſioned in Bohemia freſh troubles, which were always fomented by the Court of Rome, and which properly ended not till the middle of the laſt Century, in the utter ruin of the Huſſites.

Before we leave this ſubject, let us make one reflection. Let the Huſſites be inveighed againſt as much as you pleaſe: Let them be accuſed of holding impious and deteſtable errors, yet theſe ſame errors muſt be reduced to the four Articles exhibited by themſelves to the Council of Baſil. For this, Cruſades were publiſhed againſt them, and John Huſs, and Jerome of Prague were burnt. But a general Council, owned by all the world, when the agreement was granted them, judged, theſe Articles might be ſuffered without prejudice to the Catholick Faith. It follows therefore, that war was made upon them ſolely for the ſupport of the Church's authority. That was the main point of Religion. But why were they perſecuted afterwards? It was becauſe the Popes would never ſtand to the agreement, though the Huſſites frequently offered to ſubmit to the Church upon that condition. It is therefore evident, that the War from the beginning to the end, was wholly founded upon this Principle, That the Church has a deſpotick power, and that it is unlawful to bind her to any conditions. But what Church is this, inveſted with ſo high a Prerogative? It cannot be a General Council, ſince ſuch a Council has not judged that Article unqueſtionable. It is therefore the Pope alone which muſt be meant by the Church. It will be ſaid, perhaps, that the authority of the Council of Baſil is not acknowledged by a great part of the Church; but this will be groundleſs. For, the agreement with the Huſſites was made before the Council was removed to Ferrara, and the Council of Baſil is owned by all the world for lawful before that removal.

We are now going to ſee a quarrel of another nature, not of the Church with her heretical enemies, but of the Church with herſelf, of the Members with the Head. Till the Council of Baſil, the Popes and the Councils were very well agreed to improve the Church's authority, and cauſe it to be abſolutely obeyed. By the help of the equivocal word Church, an entire ſubmiſſion was required of Chriſtians, ſometimes to the Pope as the head, ſometimes to the Councils as repreſentatives of the Body, according as occaſion offered to improve that Term, for the benefit of either. As for the Chriſtian Laity, they had been long excluded out of the meaning of the word Church. However, though in confining the ſignification of the word Church to the Clergy alone, there ſtill remained ſome ambiguity, it had not yet been removed, by deciding whether the authority of the Church was lodged in the body of the Clergy, or in the Pope as head. The Councils of Piſa and Conſtance had taken ſome ſteps towards aſſuming this Authority, in depoſing the Popes themſelves. But Martin V, after his Election, had artfully evaded the deciſion of this important Point, either by breaking up the Council, or by confirming whatever was done with regard to the Doctrines, without meddling with any of the other Articles. He knew, it would be very prejudicial for him, if the queſtion was decided by the Council, as it would be for the Council the moment they broke up. At length, the Council of Baſil had occaſion to take this Queſtion into conſideration.

The Council had been called by Martin V, who had now appointed Cardinal Julian Cæſarini to preſide as Legate. Martin dying in 1431, before the Council was aſſembled, Eugenius IV was choſen in his room. The new Pope oppoſed not the opening of the Council, but intended it ſhould not continue long. For ſome time, the neceſſity of reforming the Church both in the Head and Members, had been every where talked of. Now as ſuch a Reformation muſt have been made by a General Council, ſuch a Council could not but terrify a Pope, who had not yet had time to taſte the ſweets of the Pontificate. The Council of Baſil was no ſooner aſſembled, but Eugenius fought means to diſſolve it. He found a pretence in the Council's Invitation of the Huſſites to Baſil, during the firſt Seſſion. He affirmed, theſe Hereticks having been condemned in the Council of Conſtance, ought not to be allowed a re-hearing. Upon this frivolous pretence he publiſhed a Bull for diſſolving the Council.

Inſtead of ſubmitting to the Pope's pleaſure, the Council reſolved to continue their Seſſions. Hence ſprung a quarrel, which produced a real Schiſm, ſome maintaining the authority of the Council, and others remaining attached to the Pope. The Council made ſeveral Decrees, which placed the authority of a General Council above that of the Pope, and the Pope annulled theſe Decrees, affirming, the body could act but by the directions of the head. The Emperor, the King of France, and moſt of the other Princes declaring immediately for the Council, Eugenius ſaw himſelf under a neceſſity to approve the Council, and conſent that the Seſſions ſhould be continued. But having ſent other Legates to preſide in his name, the Council refuſed to receive them as Preſidents. This was a freſh occaſion of diſſenſion. The Pope threatened to diſſolve the Council, and the Council threatened to ſuſpend the Pope. Accordingly, they made ſome advances to accompliſh it. Whereupon Eugenius finding himſelf the weakeſt, was obliged once more to approve and confirm the Council.

The forced compliance of the Pope appeaſed the quarrel for ſome time. But in 1435, the Council having ſhewn, they would ſeriouſly endeavour a reformation of the Church in the Head and Members, and made, for that purpoſe, Decrees to aboliſh the Firſt-fruits, and ſettle the rights of the Apoſtolick Chamber, the Pope ſaw himſelf ruined, unleſs he found ſome way to ſtop their proceedings. On the other hand, the Cardinals eaſily perceived, that ſince the Pope was begun with, their turn would ſoon come. There were Biſhops too, who were ſorry to ſee a Reformation going forward, which would be to their prejudice in many things, tho' they might hope to be gainers by it in ſome reſpects. This occaſioned the forming of two oppoſite parties in the Council; but however, the reformers had the majority. Mean while, the Pope continued to gain ground, ſince the Cardinals, and ſeveral Biſhops thought it for their Intereſt to ſupport him.

Another thing helped likewiſe to ſet the Pope's affairs upon a good foot. Some time ſince, [John Emanuel Palæologus] Emperor of Conſtantinople, had been vigorouſly attacked by the Turks. As he wanted aſſiſtance, he imagined, if he could unite the Greek Church with the Latin, the Pope and Princes of Europe would aſſiſt him with all their Forces, in defence of his Empire. This affair had been already propoſed to Martin V, and it was chiefly with deſign to accompliſh this Union, that Pope Martin had called the Council of Baſil, where the Greek Emperor was to come in perſon, with the Biſhops of his Church. Eugenius IV failed not to improve this opportunity to ſtrengthen his party. He ſent Nuntio's to this Emperor, to acquaint him, that the time was come to perform his promiſe; but, as it might be inconvenient for him and his Attendants to repair to Baſil, he promiſed to remove the Council to ſome good Town in Italy, provided he would ingage to be preſent. On the other hand, the Council ſent likewiſe Ambaſſadors to Conſtantinople, to diſſuade the Emperor from coming to any other place than Baſil. But the Emperor had already reſolved to repair wherever the Pope ſhould appoint. The Fathers of Baſil plainly perceiving, the Pope intended to remove the Council elſewhere, made haſte and paſſed ſeveral Decrees, which very much leſſened the Papal Authority, and at length cited the Pope before them.

Eugenius little regarded the proceedings againſt him at Baſil. When he heard the Greeks were arrived at Venice, he publiſhed a Bull for tranſlating the Council of Baſil to Ferrara. The Council refuſed to comply with the Bull, and by a majority of Votes ſuſpended the Pope till he ſhould come in perſon and make his defence. Mean while, Cardinal Julian Preſident of the Council, and the reſt of the Cardinals, except one, left Baſil, carrying with them a good number of Biſhops, and repaired to Ferrara, where the Pope opened his Council the 10th of February 1438. Thus aroſe a new ſort of Schiſm between the Councils, which both called themſelves General, and mutually condemned each other. But the Pope's had ſoon a conſiderable advantage of the other, by the arrival of the Greek Emperor at Ferrara, with a great many Prelates of his Nation. The next year Eugenius tranſlated the Council to Florence, were a ſort of Union was made between the Greeks and Latins, which laſted not long (1).

Mean time, the Council of Baſil ſtill continuing their proceedings againſt Eugenius IV, came at laſt to depoſe him, and elect another Pope in his room, namely, Amedeus Duke of Savoy, who having reſigned the Government of his Dominions, was retired to the ſolitudes of Ripaille. The new Pope aſſumed the name of Felix V. Hence was formed in the Church a double Schiſm, between two General Councils, and two Popes, who thundered their Anathema's againſt one another, to the great ſcandal of Chriſtendom. It was no ſmall embarraſſment to moſt people, to ſee thus two Popes and two Councils condemning one another, and each excommunicating the Adherents of the other party, without ſparing even thoſe who thought to eſcape by ſtanding neutral.

Charles VII, who then reigned in France, cauſed a Synod to be held on this occaſion, in which it was reſolved, that France ſhould own the Council of Baſil for lawful, but ſhould remain however in the obedience of Pope Eugenius. Another embarraſſment to the French. Indeed, it is pretty hard to conceive, how two ſuch oppoſite things could be reconciled.

In 1441 was held in Germany another ſuch Aſſembly, where no better expedient was found, than the calling a new Council ſomewhere elſe than at Baſil and Florence; and that Germany ſhould remain neuter till this new Council was aſſembled. A Diet held at Francfort, in 1442, approved of this expedient, and the Council of Baſil conſented to it, though with reluctance. But obſtacles occurred, that prevented the execution of this deſign.

Mean while, Felix V, not being pleaſed with the Council of Baſil for taking ſo much upon them, reſolved to withdraw to Lauſanne, on pretence that Baſil Air did not agree with him. On the other hand, Eugenius tranſlated the Council of Florence to Rome, in the Church of St. John of Lateran, where they began their Seſſions in 1444.

At length, in 1446, the Princes of Germany, aſſembled at Francfort, unanimouſly reſolved, that if Eugenius would not redreſs the Grievances complained of, they would all recognize Pope Felix. Eugenius demurred at firſt. But the Emperor telling him, he muſt comply, or reſolve to loſe all Germany, he granted whatever the Germans deſired, whereupon an Agreement was made.

This was a terrible blow to the Council of Baſil, who had now loſt Italy, Arragon, and ſeveral other States. As for France, they could not much rely upon her, ſince ſhe ſtill continued in obedience to Pope Eugenius. England had likewiſe ſo far declared for that Pope, as that we find, in the Collection of the Publick Acts, Henry VI ſent an Embaſſy to make a league with him.

Eugenius IV died whilſt theſe things were tranſacting, and had for Succeſſor Nicholas V.

The Council of Baſil loſing great part of their Authority, and Felix V having but very few friends, the King of France held a Synod at Lyons, to ſeek means to put an end to the Schiſm. Felix V ſending Legates thither, it was reſolved, with his conſent, that if Nicholas V would grant him certain conditions, he would reſign the Pontificate. This was the ſubject of a Negotiation, which laſted the whole year 1448. Mean while, the Council of Baſil, finding themſelves forſaken by almoſt all the world, and deſpairing of farther protection at Baſil, ſince the Emperor and Germany had declared for Eugenius, reſolved to remove to Lauſanne.

At laſt, Felix having obtained moſt of his deſires, reſigned the Papal Dignity in 1449. But it was with the conſent of his Council, who found means to preſerve ſtill ſome remains of Authority. By their laſt Decree, they approved of Felix's reſignation, created him Cardinal and Legate a latere (2) in Savoy and the Tarentaiſe, and allowed him to wear the papal Habit all his Life. Nicholas V confirmed this Decree according to Agreement. Thus ended at length the Schiſm, in which there was a complication of three Schiſms: Firſt, between Eugenius IV, and the Council of Baſil; then between two General Councils; and laſtly, between two Popes. The firſt may be ſaid not to be yet ended, ſince the diſpute which occaſioned it, ſtill ſubſiſts. The Court of Rome's Adherents perpetually inveigh againſt the Council of Baſil, for decreeing, that a General Council is above the Pope. On the other hand, their oppoſers reſt upon the Decrees of this Council to ſupport their opinion. Very probably, this queſtion will remain long undecided.

I have a little enlarged upon what paſſed in the two famous Councils of Conſtance and Baſil, becauſe nothing, in my opinion, is more proper to diſcover the wretched ſtate of the Church of thoſe days. From the cloſe of the laſt Schiſm, to the end of the XVth Century, the papal Chair was filled with Popes cruelly bent upon the deſtruction of the Huſſites, contrary to the Faith of the Agreement, or wholly employed in maintaining the exorbitant power uſurped by their Predeceſſors, and generally to have an opportunity to ſatisfy their Avarice.

Calixtus III, Succeſſor of Nicholas V, ſo oppreſſed the Germans, that they were forced at length to break the Concordat (3) made with Eugenius IV, plainly perceiving it was entirely uſeleſs. 1455. Characters of the Popes of the XVth Century.

Pius II, lately canonized, was ſo far from conſenting to a reformation in the Head of the Church, that he excommunicated by a Bull, all perſons that ſhould dare to appeal from the Pope to a General Council. 1458.

Paul II was no ſooner choſen, than he broke the Oath taken before his Election, concerning the redreſs of certain abuſes, which himſelf, with the reſt of the Cardinals, had deemed neceſſary. Never were the Gratiæ Expectativæ [or Bulls for Church-Preferments before they become void] more frequent, than whilſt he ſat in the 1464.

(1) The Emperor, in order to compaſs his ends, compelled the Greek Fathers to aſſent to the four Articles: 1. That there is a Purgatory. 2. That the Pope is Head of the Church. 3. That the Holy Ghoſt proceeds from the Father and the Son. 4. That unleavened Bread may be uſed in the Euchariſt. But when they came home, they declaimed againſt the Council, and recanted their Subſcriptions.

(2) Legates a latere are properly the Pope's extraordinary Ambaſſadors to Emperors and Kings.

(3) Or Agreement. Whereby the Pope reſerved to himſelf the Collation of all Benefices in Rome, and two days Journey from it: The Confirmation of Metropolitans, Biſhops, &c. The Diſpoſal of certain Benefices; and the Annates.

Papal Chair. He ſpent the whole time of his Pontificate in ſtriving to aboliſh the pragmatick Sanction (1) in France, which debarred him of the liberty of doing there whatever he pleaſed.

1471. Sixtus IV, raiſed, by one of his Bulls, the Hierarchy to the higheſt degree it could be carried, at a time when the exceſſive power uſurped by the Clergy was generally complained of.

1484. Innocent VIII, quarrelled with Ferdinand of Arragon, King of Naples, and by his Sollicitations inclined Charles VIII, to carry his Arms into Italy.

1492. Mezerai. Alexander VI, was one of the moſt corrupt Men of his age. 'Tis of him a famous Roman Catholick writer gives this fine Character, that he would have been the wickedeſt Man in the world, if his Baſtard Son (2) had not been more wicked than himſelf.

I paſs over in ſilence the cruel eagerneſs of all theſe Popes, to perſecute the Bohemians, contrary to the Faith of their Concordat. The Cruſades againſt the Turks, in which they would have engaged all the Princes of Europe, appeared very ſpecious; but Sovereigns were ſo well ſatisfied, that in publiſhing Cruſades, the Popes had only their own private Intereſt in view, that they could never confide in them.

Such in general was the ſtate of the Chriſtian Church in the xvth Century, upon which I ſhall make but one ſingle remark, leaving my Readers at liberty to add as many as they pleaſe. What I would obſerve is, that the abſtract I have given, evidently ſhows, how trifling their opinion is, who ſay, it is not the buſineſs of private perſons to endeavour a reformation of the Church, but it muſt be left to the care of the Church herſelf. What then is this Church, from which we are to expect this happy Reformation? Doubtleſs, this is not what is meant by the word Church. It is the Pope with his Cardinals? But theſe are the very Men who have all along hindered it, and very probably, will, to the utmoſt of their power hinder it for ever. Shall a General Council undertake this Reformation? But what has hitherto paſſed in theſe Aſſemblies, affords no room to expect ſo great a benefit. Beſides, who ſhall call this General Council? of whom ſhall it be compoſed? who ſhall preſide? Can the Pope be perſwaded to convene a General Council to reform the Church? will he give the Precedency to another, that himſelf and Court may be with more freedom reformed? In a word, will it not be the Pope, the Cardinals, the Prelates, that will have the deliberative vote in this Council? but theſe are ſo many perſons concerned to leave things as they are.

Will it be ſaid with ſome, that the Church has no need of reformation? that ſhe is innocent and pure, without ſpot or wrinkle, or any thing like it? that all the Prerogatives enjoyed by the Popes, the Cardinals, the Biſhops, belong to them by divine Right? that the Pope exerciſes only the power committed to him by Chriſt? that his deciſions are infallible, as well in point of fact, as of right; and the ſame obedience muſt be paid to his Decrees, as to thoſe of God himſelf? but if, purſuant to this principle, the Popes ſhould unhappily enlarge their Phylacteries, and every day form new pretenſions, as it has but too frequently happened, how ſhall they be ſtopped, if 'tis confeſſed, the Church has no need of reformation, or muſt be left to reform herſelf?

State of the Church of England. After viewing the ſtate of the Church in general, it is time to proceed to that of the Church of England in particular. England, with regard to Religion, was in the ſame condition with the reſt of Europe. The people paſſionately wiſhed for a reformation of ſundry abuſes crept into the Church. The Clergy ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, as every change would be to their prejudice. As for the Kings, they made Religion ſubſervient to their Intereſt. When they imagined they wanted the Clergy, they found ways enough to evade the people's deſires. But when the Parliament's favour was requiſite, they aſſented to the Statutes, by which the Incroachments of the Pope and Clergy were reſtrained.

In the beginning of the Century, Henry IV, whoſe chief aim was to fix himſelf in the Throne, and who thought he could not effect it without the Clergy, ſeemed throughout his whole Reign to have a great deference for them. Hence proceeded all the Statutes paſſed in thoſe days againſt the Lollards. Henry V, ſhowed at firſt great inclination to ſtrip the Clergy of their riches, according to the Parliament's deſire; but afterwards, turning his thoughts to the Conqueſt of France, carefully avoided that Religion ſhould cauſe any troubles in his Kingdom. It was highly neceſſary, in order to execute his grand projects, that his Subjects ſhould be ready to aſſiſt him with their purſes. But on the other hand, he was no leſs concerned to live in a good underſtanding with the Court of Rome, leaſt ſhe ſhould hinder his enterprize. He knew what ſhe was capable of, when ſhe thought herſelf injured. So, artfully managing both the Pope and his Subjects, he prevented the firſt from abuſing his power too much, without depriving him, however, of what he poſſeſſed. By this prudent conduct, he made his Reign peaceable, with reſpect to Religion. We muſt except, however, what he did in the beginning againſt the Lollards. He had ſuffered himſelf to be prepoſſeſſed, that they had conſpired againſt his life; and that belief made him at firſt a little ſevere. But as he was endowed with an excellent judgement, he ſoon diſcerned the intereſts of the Clergy from thoſe of Religion, and put a ſtop to the perſecutions of the unhappy Lollards. Henry VI, was a weak Man, ever ready to receive the impreſſions that were given him. Had he held the reigns of the Government himſelf, very probably the Clergy would have gained much ground in his Reign. But the directors of his affairs, as well during his minority, as after, were Men of a very different character. Beſides, the French War, the diſturbances at Court after the King's marriage, and the Civil Wars which quickly followed, gave thoſe at the Helm no time to think much of Religious affairs. For the ſame reaſon, the Reign of Edward IV, was not diſturbed either by the Lollards, or their adverſaries. It is true, Edward ſhowed a great condeſcenſion for the Clergy, in granting them a favour conſtantly denied by the former Kings. But his complaiſance did not go ſo far as to indulge perſecution. The Reigns of Edward V, and Richard III, were wholly ſpent in domeſtick troubles, which had no influence upon the affairs of the Church. As for Henry VII, he made it a rule, to keep the Church upon the ſame foot he found it when he mounted the Throne. He ever avoided, as a Rock, all innovations which might obſtruct the execution of his two ſole deſigns; namely, to ſecure the Crown to himſelf and his Heirs, and to heap up Money. Such was, with regard to Religion, the diſpoſition of the Kings that reigned in England during the Fifteenth Century.

As for the Engliſh Nation, it is certain, it was generally Wickliffite in ſome reſpects. Wickliff's opinions manifeſtly tended to theſe two principal ends: Firſt, to reform the Government of the Church, and to ſet bounds to the power of the Pope and Clergy. Secondly, to alter the Church's Creed concerning ſome Doctrines long ſince received, and which he thought contrary to Scripture. Now as he found it almoſt impoſſible, that Chriſtians ſhould return to what he believed the antient Faith of the Church, becauſe the Clergy were concerned to maintain the eſtabliſhed errors, he ſtrongly inſiſted upon the firſt point, as being abſolutely neceſſary to the attainment of the ſecond. It is certain, that with reſpect to his general aim, in the firſt of theſe two Articles, not only his profeſſed Followers, but all the reſt of the People did, as it were, join with him. For many Ages the Engliſh had felt the oppreſſion wherein the Pope and Clergy had kept them. In all Chriſtendom no Nation had more experienced the rigour of this Dominion. The Hiſtory of England ſhows it ſo manifeſtly, that a Man would be blind not to ſee it. But though the Hiſtory were ſuſpected, the Statutes of Proviſors and Præmunire, ſo frequently revived, leave no room to queſtion, that the Engliſh thought themſelves oppreſſed. So, it may be ſaid, that in general the Engliſh Nation was Wickliffite as to the firſt point, though many believed, Wickliff would have carried the reformation a little too far, and, to correct the abuſes of the Hierarchy, had run into the contrary extreme. But the nation was not generally Wickliffite, with reſpect to the ſecond Article; namely, the alteration of belief concerning the Doctrines. Indeed, Wickliff had in this reſpect many Followers, but they were not the Majority. Thus the name of Wickliffite, or Lollard, was an equivocal term, capable of being underſtood in two different ſenſes. Sometimes it ſignified a Man, who ſeparating from the Church, embraced all Wickliff's opinions. It might likewiſe be underſtood of one, who remaining in the Church, as it was then, and adhering to the received Doctrines, was, however, of Wickliff's opinion concerning the temporal and ſpiritual Juriſdiction of the Clergy. In this laſt ſenſe there were more Lollards in England than can be imagined. This diſtinction may ſerve to account for divers proceedings of the Parliaments in the beginning of the XVth Century, which ſeem to be contrary one to another. Sometimes they were ſeen to ſpeak and act like Lollards, earneſtly demanding, that the Clergy ſhould be ſtript of their riches, and ſometimes to condemn theſe ſame Lollards to the flames, when they conſidered them in the firſt ſenſe before-mentioned. The Clergy knew how to take advantage of the ambiguity of that term. When a Man was ſo hardy as to ſhow that it were to be wiſhed, ſome alteration were made in the Government of the Church, he was infallibly accuſed of being a Lollard, and charged with all Wickliff's opinions. Hence he became odious, becauſe the true Lollards maintained Doctrines repugnant to the Faith of thoſe days. The firſt Parliament which petitioned Henry IV, to ſeize the Church-Lands, could not eſcape that imputation, which made a deep impreſſion in the King's mind. Thus it often happened, that People did not dare openly to approve Wickliff's firſt opinions, for fear of being taxed alſo with holding the others, and expoſed to ſuffer for Tenets they received not, as it happened to John Huſs and Jerome of Prague. It was not without cauſe that the Clergy proſecuted the Lollards with ſuch animoſity, ſince their Principles tended to no leſs than to deprive them of all their Prerogatives. At this very day, the Church of England, though embracing Wickliff's opinions, concerning the Doctrines, cannot forbear expreſſing very little eſteem for that Doctor, becauſe he has combated the Hierarchy, which ſhe has thought proper to retain.

(1) This is an Edict paſſed in the Council of Bourges in the Reign of Charles VII. It was levelled againſt Papal Proviſions, the payment of Firſt-Fruits, and other incroachments of the Court of Rome. In a word, it contains the Privileges of the Gallican Church, and was taken out of the Acts of the Councils of Conſtance and Baſil.

The Lollards were perſecuted, ſometimes more, ſometimes leſs, according to the character of the Kings, the Archbiſhops, and the reſt of the Prelates, but chiefly according to the circumſtances of affairs. In general, the beginning of the XVth Century was much more ſevere for them, than the middle or the end. The reaſon is evident. For as their number continually increaſed, their enemies found much leſs ſupport, and themſelves more protection. In the beginning of the XVth Century, which was the moſt troubleſome time for them, there were, however, but very few burnt; of which three principal reaſons may be given: Firſt, as the Statutes did not enact that all in general ſhould be burnt, who held the Tenets of Wickliff, but only ſuch as preached or taught them publickly, the number of the guilty was not very great. Theſe Statutes were not obſerved after the manner of the Inquiſition, but agreeably to the liberties and privileges of the Engliſh Nation. In the next place, the Idea which the Clergy were pleaſed to give of the Lollards, was, that they entirely ſubverted Religion. But often, in the examination of the parties accuſed as ſuch, it appeared that they only believed, the Pope and Clergy abuſed their power too much, which was the general opinion of the Kingdom. It was well known, the Parliament had not that in view, in their Statute againſt the Lollards. Laſtly, the Judges themſelves ſometimes happened to be of the Sect, and this was the occaſion of the Statute in the Reign of Henry V, obliging all Magiſtrates, at their entrance into Office, to ſwear to the execution of the Laws againſt the Lollards. But I do not know whether that Statute was ever punctually obſerved. If we believe Walſingham the Monk, the Judges and ſeveral Biſhops themſelves were very remiſs in the proſecution of the Lollards. This he aſcribes to the general corruption which reigned in England. But this corruption was nothing elſe but the inclination of the Engliſh for Wickliff's opinions; or, at leaſt, their ſcruple to put People to death on account of Religion. The moſt remarkable thing in England, concerning the Lollards, is the trial and puniſhment of Sir John Oldcaſtle, otherwiſe called Lord Cobham, of whom I have ſpoken in the Reign of Henry V. We muſt now proceed to another Subject; namely, the conteſts which England had with the Court of Rome during the XVth Century.

Diſputes between England and the Popes.

Notwithſtanding all the complaints frequently carried to the Court of Rome, concerning her continual incroachments, and the precautions taken by ſeveral Parliaments to ſcreen themſelves from the ſame, the Popes did not abate their pretenſions. The Acts of Parliament were to them but like Thunders without execution, which reached not their rights. Upon every occaſion, they made no ſcruple to act contrary to theſe Statutes, as if they had not been made; and aſſert their Apoſtolick power, without troubling themſelves whether they prejudiced the King or his Subjects. The Parliament, willing to remedy the abuſes flowing from the continual diſpenſations granted by the Pope without hearing the cauſe, paſſed in 1400 an Act, That all Perſons who purchaſed or executed any Bulls to be diſcharged from the payment of Tythes, ſhould incur the penalties contained in the Statute of Proviſors. It was enacted by another Statute paſſed at the ſame time, That if any Perſon ſhould procure a Proviſion to be exempt of the Juriſdiction of the Biſhops, he ſhould incur the ſame Penalties. Theſe Acts being made chiefly with a view to the Monks, were not capable of producing the intended effect, becauſe the Pope, by the fulneſs of his Apoſtolick authority, exempted the Monks from the obſervance of theſe Parliamentary Statutes. The Biſhops, whom this affair chiefly concerned, not daring to diſpute the power aſſumed by the Pope, it was the Parliament's buſineſs to defend their cauſe, as well as their own. To that purpoſe, the Statutes upon this Subject were revived, with an additional Clauſe, prohibiting the Monks in particular, to purchaſe or execute any ſuch exemptions, upon the penalty compriſed in the Statute of Præmunire.

This Statute, which I have mentioned upon ſeveral occaſions, was a terrible fence againſt the Court of Rome's Uſurpations. Indeed, it did not directly attack the Pope, ſince the Parliament had no Juriſdiction over him. But as it hindered the Engliſh from applying to the Court of Rome for things contrary to the Prerogatives of the Crown, and the Laws of the Realm, it abridged the Pope of good part of the advantages which he pretended to reap from his Apoſtolick power. It will perhaps be thought ſtrange that the Popes ſhould be ſilent, when, and long after, this Statute was paſſed. But it is eaſy to diſcover the reaſon. The Schiſm which began in 1378, and laſted till 1409, hindered them from ſtirring. The Popes received by England, took care to give no offence at ſuch a juncture. It is true, there was an interval of ſome years, during which Alexander V, and John XXIII, might have made ſome attempt againſt that Law. But Alexander's Pontificate was very ſhort, and John was employed in affairs, as he thought, of more importance. Martin V conſidered not this affair with the ſame indifference. In 1426, he writ a thundering Letter to Chicheley Archbiſhop of Canterbury, upbraiding him for his remiſſneſs, and enjoining him to exert his utmoſt that this Statute might be repealed. Henry VI, who then reigned, not being above five years old, the Pope thought it a favorable juncture to compaſs his ends. It will not be perhaps unacceptable, to inſert part of this Letter, which ſhows the Pope's ſentiments concerning the pretended privileges of his See.

MARTIN,

SERVANT of the SERVANTS of GOD,

To his Reverend Brother, the Archbiſhop of CANTERBURY, Greeting, and Apoſtolical Benediction.

Martin V's Letter to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. Burnet's Hiſt. Ref. T. I. Col. p. 95.

" HAD you conſidered what a ſtrict account you muſt give to Almighty God for the Flock committed to your care: Had you called to mind the obligations of your Office, and how much you are bound to maintain the rights and honour of the Roman Church, of whom you hold your Dignity: Had you, I ſay, duly recollected theſe things, you would never have ſuffered your ſelf to be ſeized with ſuch a lethargy and negligence. No, you would have done your duty long ſince; you would have endeavoured to ſet right the miſled, and oppoſed with all your power thoſe who had ſacrilegiouſly invaded the privileges granted by our Saviour to the Church. Was the authority of your Character beſtowed upon you only to enrich your ſelf, and give you opportunity of ſeeking your own, and not the things which are Jeſus Chriſt's? If this be your opinion, you greatly miſtake the inſtructions of our bleſſed Saviour, who, when he committed his Sheep to St. Peter's care, only commanded him to feed them; neither received he this command, till he had given his Maſter repeated aſſurances of his love. Is this then your manner of ſhewing your love to Chriſt? Is this feeding and taking care of the Flock? Will ſuch conduct as this diſcharge your duty to the Holy See? Alas! your Flock are running down a precipice before your eyes, and you are regardleſs of their danger, and make no attempt to ſave them: You ſuffer them to feed in dangerous paſtures without warning them; and, which is horrible, you ſeem to put poiſon in their mouths with your own hands: You ſee the Wolves ſcatter and tear them in pieces, and like a dumb Dog, vouchſafe not ſo much as to bark. You can behold the authority of our Bleſſed Saviour and the Holy See deſpiſed and trampled on, without dropping one word of Remonſtrance. One would have thought, you might at leaſt, have whiſpered your diſlike, though you had been ſo very prudent as not to have declared it publickly. Are you not ſenſible, you muſt one day account to the utmoſt Farthing for all omiſſions and prevarications of this kind? Do not you think, if any of your Flock are loſt by your neglect, (and, alas! there are a great many,) their " blood

" blood will be required at your hands? Conſider and " tremble what vengeance God denounces by his Pro-
Ezek. xxxiii 6, 7. " phet Ezekiel: Son of man, I have ſet thee a watchman " unto the houſe of Iſrael; if thou ſeeſt the ſword come, and " doſt not blow the trumpet, and any perſon is taken away, " his blood will I require at thy hands.'

To ſee this beginning, would not one think the point in queſtion was ſome new Hereſy, tending to ſubvert the foundations of Religion? At leaſt, one ſhould believe, the Pope had the Wickliffites in view. But it was not ſo: We ſhall ſee in the ſequel of the Letter what the affair was; namely, the Statute of Præmunire, which the Archbiſhop had not cauſed to be repealed, the Pope groundleſsly ſuppoſing, it was in that Prelate's Power to annul the Laws of the Realm. He continued in this manner:

" I leave it to your ſelf to conſider, what abomina- " ble violence has been committed upon your Province. " Pray read that Royal Law, if there's any thing in it " that is either Law or Royal. For how can that be " called a Statute, which repeals the Laws of God and " the Church? Or how can it deſerve the name of " Royal, when it deſtroys the antient cuſtoms of the " Realm; and it is ſo contrary to theſe words of Scrip- " ture, The King loveth judgment? Tell me then, Re- " verend Brother, whether you, who are a Catholick " Biſhop, can think it reaſonable ſuch an Act as this " ſhould be in force in a Chriſtian Country?

" In the firſt place, under colour of this execrable " Statute, the King of England graſps at the Spiritual " Juriſdiction, and governs ſo abſolutely in Eccleſiaſtical " matters, as if our Saviour had appointed him his Vicar. " He makes Laws for the Church and Clergy. In " ſhort, he makes ſo many Proviſions about Clerks, Be- " nefices, and the concerns of the Hierarchy, that one " would think the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven were " put into his hands, and the Superintendency of theſe " affairs had been intruſted with him, and not with St. " Peter.

" Beſides theſe hideous Uſurpations, he has enacted " ſeveral penalties againſt the Clergy. Such a rigor is " the more unjuſtifiable, as the Engliſh Government does " not treat Turks and Jews with ſo great ſeverity. Peo- " ple of all Countries and Perſuaſions have the liberty " of coming into England. Only thoſe who have Cures " beſtowed upon them by Chriſt's Vicar are excluded: " Only thoſe, I ſay, are baniſhed, ſeized, impriſoned, " ſtripped of their fortunes. If any eccleſiaſtical Per- " ſon, charged with the execution of the Mandates and " Cenſures of the Holy See, happens to ſet foot on " Engliſh ground, and proceed in the buſineſs of his " Commiſſion, he is treated like an enemy, thrown out " of the King's protection, and expoſed moreover to " ſtill greater hardſhips. Was ever ſuch Iniquity as this " paſſed into a Law? Pray conſider whether ſuch Sta- " tutes as theſe are for the honour of the Kingdom; and " whether it becomes you to be ſilent under all this " outrage. Is this an inſtance of filial Obedience? Is " this the Engliſh People's way of ſhowing their regards " to their Mother Church and the Holy See? Can that " be called a Catholick Kingdom, where ſuch profane " Laws are practiſed; where application to Chriſt's Vi- " car is prohibited; where St. Peter's Succeſſor is not " allowed to execute our Saviour's Commiſſion? Chriſt " ſaid to St. Peter, and in him to his Succeſſors, feed " my Sheep. But this Statute will not ſuffer him to feed " them, but transfers that office upon the King, and pre- " tends in ſeveral caſes to give him Apoſtolical Autho- " rity. Chriſt built his Church upon St. Peter; but " this Act of Parliament hinders the effect of this diſ- " poſition, not permitting St. Peter's See to proceed in " the functions of Government, or to make Proviſions " ſuitable to the neceſſities of the Church. Our Lord " has ordered, that whatever his High-Prieſt ſhall bind " or looſe in Earth, ſhall be bound or looſed in Heaven: " But this Statute over-rules the divine command: For " if the immediate repreſentative of our Saviour thinks " fit to delegate any Prieſt to execute the Power of the " Keys, contrary to the intent of the Statute, he is re- " fuſed admittance, forced out of the Kingdom, ſtript of " his Effects, and made liable to farther Penalties. If " any Diſcipline, if any Apoſtolick Cenſure, appear a- " gainſt this uſage, it is puniſhed as a capital offence.

" And what does your prudence think of all this? " Is this a Catholick Statute? Can it be ſuffered with- " out diſhonour to our Saviour, without a breach upon " the Laws of the Goſpel, and the ruin of people's Souls?
Isaiah lviii. 1. " Why therefore did you not cry aloud? Why did you " not lift up your voice like a Trumpet? ſhow your peo- " ple their Tranſgreſſion, and the Houſe of Jacob their " Sins, that their blood may not be required at your hands? " If all perſons who have the cure of Souls, are bound " to this duty, how much more are you, who have both " the Prieſts and People committed to your care by the Holy " See, by whoſe favour you enjoy the privilege of Pri- " mate and Legate for the Church of England, and have " the honour of being Succeſſor to that glorious Martyr " St. Thomas, who, to remove the oppreſſion of ſuch Sta- " tutes, ſcrupled not to ſacrifice himſelf for the Intereſt " of the Church.

" Theſe things conſidered, you, who ought to have " ſet up the Church's Standard, been moſt forward in " the defence of Religion, and animated your fellow Bi- " ſhops to a noble Conteſt, are the firſt that turn your " back, and decline the ſervice. Thus, either by your " great cowardice, or, as it is generally believed, by your " downright prevarication, you diſcourage thoſe who offer " to make a ſtand. If therefore the Church complain of " your conduct; if the whole be laid to your charge, be " not ſurprized, but troubled at the Imputation. Let " this reproach ſerve to put you upon reforming your " conduct, and make you boldly perform the duties of " your Office; which, were you but inclined to make " the moſt of your power, would not be very difficult. " Exert therefore your Character among the Laity; in- " form their underſtandings in this point, and endea- " vour to reclaim them. Shew them what a ſnare this " Statute will prove, and how much guilt it will draw " upon their Conſciences. Let your Admonitions be " preſſing and ſharp, and then the crooked will be made " ſtrait, and the rough ways ſmooth."

After ſo ſevere a reprimand, the Pope continues to tell the Archbiſhop, that he thought himſelf bound in Conſcience to deal thus plainly with him. Then he charges him, upon pain of Excommunication, to go immediately to the Privy-Council, and make what Intereſt he could, for repealing the Statute of Præmunire, to apply to both Houſes of Parliament for the ſame purpoſe, and let them know, that all thoſe who obey that Statute were under Excommunication. Moreover, he orders him to enjoin all the Clergy to preach publickly, and every where, the ſame Doctrine; to take with him two grave perſons to atteſt his diligence, and to certify him of the reſult of the affair.

Reaſons of the Pope's Conduct.

If it be inquired what made Martin V, ſo very angry with Chicheley, who was not concerned in the Statute of Præmunire, paſſed long before he was Archbiſhop, and who had not the power to procure a repeal, the reaſon is this. Chicheley had oppoſed to his utmoſt, the Papal Exemptions. He had diſſuaded Henry V, from conſenting, that Henry Beaufort his Uncle ſhould be made Cardinal, Legate a latere for Life, and hold the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter in Commendam. Moreover, he had ſaid publickly, that all the Pope's proceedings tended only to drain England continually.

The Archbiſhop willing to juſtify himſelf, did not do it to the Pope's Satisfaction. On the contrary, he drew upon himſelf a ſtill more thundering Letter, and after that a third, directed to the two Archbiſhops, wherein, to mortify Canterbury, York is named firſt. Chicheley fearing the Pope's threats, got ſome Biſhops to write in his behalf, but nothing was capable of pacifying him. At length, he ſent him a Letter himſelf, telling him, he heard by common report, that his Holineſs had proceeded to a Sentence againſt him, which had never happened to any Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſince the days of St. Auguſtin. That however, he was not certain of the thing, becauſe he was commanded by the King to bring all the Inſtruments, received from Rome, with the Seals whole, and lodge them in the Paper-Office till the Parliament ſate.

Burnet's Hiſt. Ref. Vol. p. 111.

Mean while, Martin V, reſolving to puſh this affair, writ to the King and Parliament in a more haughty ſtrain than had ever been uſed by any Pope. He admoniſhes, or rather commands them to repeal the Statute of Præmunire, otherwiſe he aſſures them they cannot be ſaved.

At laſt, the Archbiſhop, ſeeing the Pope thus obſtinate, and not daring any longer to diſobey him, went with ſeveral other Biſhops to the Houſe of Commons, where he made a long Speech, tending to perſwade the Houſe to repeal the Statute, and put them in mind of the danger of an Interdict upon the whole Kingdom. But neither his arguments nor threats, were capable of inducing the Commons to repeal, or even explain the Act. On the contrary, they addreſſed the King to take the Archbiſhop into his protection, and to write to the Pope in his behalf.

Pope Martin's Letter, and his extraordinary endeavours for repealing the Statute of Præmunire, afford matter for three remarks. The firſt is, this Letter is a demonſtration, that the main of Religion was then made to conſiſt in the Pope's Prerogatives, and the Clergy's Immunities. Hence it alſo appears, how averſe Martin was to conſent to the leaſt diminution of his pretended Rights, and conſequently to a reformation in the Head and Members of the Church, demanded with ſo much earneſtneſs at the Council of Conſtance, where he was preſent himſelf.

The ſecond remark is, that at all times the Popes, in their Conteſts with the ſeveral States of Chriſtendom, have always had great advantages. Theſe advantages conſiſted, in that, by the threats of Excommunication and Interdict, they puſhed matters ſo far, that there was need of great reſolution not to be over-awed, and loſe ground, either by agreement, or otherwiſe. But if this reſolution was proof againſt all attempts, and the circumſtances of affairs were not favorable to the Court of Rome, ſhe had the power to ſtop when ſhe pleaſed, in expectation of a better opportunity. They who had the misfortune to contend with her, always reckoned it a great Victory not to be vanquiſhed, being ſatisfied if ſhe would but ſuffer them to live in peace.

Conjecture upon this Matter.

The third remark, is a Conjecture which I ſhall leave to the Reader's Judgment. Though Henry VI, was then but five years old, and his minority ſeemed to countenance the Pope's deſign, it is certain however, England had never been in a more proſperous condition. The Engliſh were quiet, and pleaſed with the Government, and the Victories of Crevant and Verneuil had put their affairs in France upon a very good foot. On the other hand, the affairs of Charles VII, were in ſuch diſorder, that there was no appearance of their being ever reſtored; and therefore Martin V, could not deem it a proper time for him. Beſides, the King's two Uncles were not diſpoſed to ſuffer the Prerogatives Royal, and the People's Rights, to be trampled upon, when their affairs were in ſo flouriſhing a condition. It is therefore ſomething probable, that Martin V, who was much more inclined to France than to England, made then all that ſtir, only to excite troubles in England, which would be of ſervice to King Charles, and give him time to breathe. If the Archbiſhop had punctually obeyed him, and the Clergy every were preached againſt the Statute of Præmunire, purſuant to the Pope's expreſs orders, the Parliament would have been forced to ſupport their Act, and puniſh the Clergy's preſumption. Then the Pope would have had a pretence to put the Kingdom under an Interdict, which would have greatly embroiled the affairs of the Engliſh in France. But Chicheley's prudence prevented the miſchief which might have ſprung from Martin's haughty proceedings. In ſhort, Martin perceiving, he was ſupported neither by the King's Council, nor the Clergy, nor the People, dropped the affair, not thinking proper to expoſe his authority any farther. This conjecture is built upon Martin's continual partiality to France, whether out of Inclination, or becauſe, indeed, it was not for the Intereſt of the Court of Rome, that France ſhould be ſubject to England.

Before I leave the Præmunire, it will not be improper to obſerve, that this Statute had two principal Clauſes. The firſt, containing the Statute of Proviſors, made in the reign of Edward I, prohibiting to ſollicite and procure Benefices from the Court of Rome by way of Proviſion, contrary to the rights of the Crown or the Patrons. The ſecond forbid to carry to the Court of Rome, or elſewhere, Cauſes belonging to the King's Courts. The Clergy complained that by theſe words, or elſewhere, the King's Judges pretended to deprive the Eccleſiaſtical Courts of numberleſs Cauſes, which before they had the Cognizance of. They maintained, that theſe words, or elſewhere, inſerted in the Act, had no relation to the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, but only to the ſeveral places where the Pope might reſide. That nevertheleſs the Judges underſtood them in the firſt ſenſe, and if there was in a proceſs the leaſt point belonging to the royal Juriſdiction, took occaſion, from theſe two words, to remove it from the Eccleſiaſtical Court, as well as from the Court of Rome. In 1439, the Convocation complained to the King of the explanation of theſe terms by the Lay Judges, pretending it was contrary to the intent of the Law, for ſeveral reaſons alledged in their addreſs. For that time, the Clergy had no anſwer, or, if they had, it was not to their mind. But in the Reign of Edward IV, they obtained the King's Charter, prohibiting his Judges to meddle with criminal matters where the Clergy were concerned. I do not know whether Edward granted this Charter out of policy, to gain the Clergy's protection, or was convinced that the words, or elſewhere, were explained contrary to the Parliament's intention.

Pat. 2. Edw. IV. p. 2. m. 3.

Other Conteſts between the Parliament and Pope.

Beſides the conteſts occaſioned by the Statute of Præmunire between England and the Court of Rome, there were alſo others which I ſhall but juſt mention. In 1403, in the Reign of Henry IV, the Parliament paſſed an Act, forbidding all Perſons that ſhould have Proviſion of any Benefice, to pay into the Apoſtolick Chamber more than was paid in old time. The penalty for offenders was, that they ſhould forfeit to the King the ſame ſum they paid the Pope. The occaſion of this Statute was a Grievance introduced ſome time before by the Court of Rome: Which was, that no Perſon ſhould have Proviſion of any Benefice that was void, till he had compounded with the Apoſtolick Chamber, as well for the Firſt-Fruits, as for other leſſer ſervices in that Court, and paid, beforehand, the ſum agreed upon.

But the greateſt diſpute between England and the Popes, was concerning the collation of the Biſhopricks. Though the Popes, when the firſt Anglo-Saxons were converted, had ſent Italian or other foreign Biſhops into England, it is certain that towards the latter-end of the Saxon Monarchy, the Biſhops were choſen by the Chapters. The ſame privilege was continued to them after the Norman Conqueſt, and confirmed by King John's Charter. Mean while, the Popes having gradually extended their authority, aſſumed the power of beſtowing Archbiſhopricks and Biſhopricks, by way of Proviſion, ſometimes on one, ſometimes on another pretence. This is what I have had frequent occaſion to remark. They would have at once eſtabliſhed this rule, that the diſpoſal of all the Biſhopricks belonged to them by Divine Right; but meeting with obſtacles, bethought themſelves of another expedient; and that was, to get poſſeſſion by degrees, in order afterwards to plead preſcription. Thus being content at firſt with maintaining, that on certain occaſions they had a power to fill the vacant Sees, they afterwards framed theſe occaſions whenever they pleaſed. In ſhort, they multiplied them ſo very faſt, that hardly was there a vacant Biſhoprick but what they filled by way of Proviſion. Time and favorable junctures confirming them in this Prerogative, there was no poſſibility to wreſt it from them. Thus the Privilege of the Chapters was entirely deſtroyed.

Arundel, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, dying in 1413, the Monks of St. Auguſtin choſe Henry Chicheley, Biſhop of St. David's. But Pope John XXIII, annulled the election, declaring, that, for this turn, he had reſolved to diſpoſe of the Archbiſhoprick by way of Proviſion. However, to avoid diſputes, he made choice of the ſame Chicheley; preſerving thereby his pretended right, without detriment to the Perſon elected.

But Martin V, dealt not ſo gently with England. He was no ſooner ſeated in the Papal Chair, than he boldly diſpoſed of all the vacant Sees, without any regard to the privilege of the Chapters. In two years only he filled, by way of Proviſion, thirteen Biſhopricks in the Province of Canterbury. It was not only with reſpect to the Sees that England had cauſe to complain of the Pope; he diſpoſed likewiſe of all the other Benefices of the Kingdom, without troubling himſelf about the right of the Patrons, or the inſtruction of the People. The beſt preferments were generally conferred upon Foreigners, who underſtood not a word of Engliſh, or reſided not in England, and ſometimes even upon Children. For inſtance, he made Proſper Colonna, his Nephew, who was but fourteen years old, Archdeacon of Canterbury. Henry V, a high-ſpirited Prince, ſent Ambaſſadors to Rome to complain both of theſe, and other grievances. But Martin V, delayed his anſwer ſo long, that the Ambaſſadors told him, the King their maſter, purely out of reſpect to the Holy See, had proceeded by way of requeſt, to which he was not obliged; but for the future, he would uſe his Prerogative: That accordingly they had inſtructions to make a ſolemn proteſtation before himſelf and the Conclave, if his Holineſs would not give them immediate ſatisfaction. I know not what anſwer the Pope returned; but not long after Martin having tranſlated the Biſhop of Lincoln to the See of York, by way of Proviſion, the Chapter refuſed to admit him, and the Pope was forced to revoke his Bull.

In 1438, the Univerſity of Oxford complained, that Church-Preferments were beſtowed without any regard to learning or merit: That the Colleges were thereby become empty, becauſe there was no need of ſtudy or learning, to be qualified for a Benefice. Whereupon the Convocation, to whom this complaint was addreſſed, paſſed a Canon, That none but Graduates in the Univerſities ſhould be capable of Benefices. But this was a weak fence againſt the Papal power.

See Spelman Conc. T. II. p. 675-677.

Mean while, though the Court of Rome made the Apoſtolick authority ſound very high, the Popes now and then met with mortifications. For example, in the Reign of Henry IV, the Parliament ordered, that the Peter-Pence ſhould be depoſited in the King's hands till the Schiſm was cloſed.

In the Reign of Henry V, the Alien Priories were ſuppreſſed without asking the Pope's conſent.

Under Henry VI, Pope Nicholas V, demanding an extraordinary Subſidy of the Clergy of England, for the occaſions of the Holy See, the King forbid the Clergy to grant it.

The like demand, made ſome years after by Vicentini, a Nuntio, was ſharply denied by the Clergy. The Papal power, formerly ſo dreadful to the whole Church, and particularly to England, began to be leſs feared. The Schiſms did the Pope irreparable damage.

Councils. Spelman Conc. T. II. p. 662, 672, 712.

During the whole XVth Century, it does not appear that any National Councils were held in England, but only Convocations of the Clergy, in the two Eccleſiaſtical Provinces of Canterbury and York. The condemnation of the Lollards was almoſt the ſole buſineſs of theſe Convocations. As for National Synods, they were become uſeleſs, ſince the Popes had engroſſed the Cognizance of all Eccleſiaſtical Affairs. Beſides, the leaſt appeal to the Pope was ſufficient to annul all the Canons of a Council. On the other hand, the Popes had ſo managed, that no National Synods could be held without their Licence. Now, as in theſe Synods there was but too frequent occaſion to inquire into the extent of the Papal authority, they were grown ſo odious to the Court of Rome, that the uſe of them was inſenſibly laid aſide. At this very day, in the States which have not yet received the Reformation, National Councils are no more talked of, or, at leaſt, ſo very rarely, that it is plain the Popes allow them with reluctance and very great difficulties. Of this we have in France a late remarkable inſtance, in the tranſactions concerning the famous Conſtitution Unigenitus of Clement XI. King Lewis XIV, though powerful and formidable, could never obtain the Pope's leave to call a National Council, except on ſuch terms as rendered the thing impracticable, though that Monarch's ſole Aim was to cauſe the Conſtitution to be approved.

The Article of the eminent Men, who flouriſhed in the Church of England during this Century, will not long detain us. Indeed, there were Cardinals, Archbiſhops, Biſhops, and other Clergymen, very famous, but it was neither for their piety nor learning. Their poſts at Court, their Embaſſies, intrigues of the Cabinet, and ſhare in the Revolutions in the Court and Kingdom, were the only things by which they were diſtinguiſhed. Henry Chicheley, Archbiſhop of Canterbury was one of the beſt. For which reaſon he obtained not the honour of the Cardinalate, laviſhly beſtowed upon Henry Beaufort, Biſhop of Wincheſter, upon Kemp, Bourchier, Morton, who were leſs worthy of it than he, if true merit had been regarded. But Chicheley wanted one indiſpenſable quality of a Cardinal; namely, to be entirely devoted to the Holy See (1).

If there were any learned Men beſides, they were ſo with reſpect to the time they lived in, when true learning was not much in vogue. And therefore it would be very needleſs to ſpeak of each in particular, ſince their fame hardly out-lived them. Some were noted for their great animoſity againſt the Lollards, and amongſt the reſt, Arundel Archbiſhop of Canterbury. This Prelate, in his Funeral Sermon for Ann of Luxemburgh, Richard the ſecond's Queen, highly commends her for ſpending her time in reading the Holy Scriptures in the vulgar tongue: And yet, ſome years after, in the Reign of Henry IV, he condemned in Convocation the tranſlations of the Bible, as very pernicious (2).

(1) In 1439, he ordained, That Vicarages ſhould not be endowed with a leſs Sum than twelve Marks a year. Spelman Conc. Tom. II. p. 689.

(2) As there was a ſcarcity of Perſons eminent in other parts of Learning in this rude and illiterate Century, ſo was there likewiſe of Hiſtorians. The moſt noted were:

Sir JOHN FROISSART, who wrote a General Hiſtory of the Affairs of France, Spain, &c. but chiefly of England. He was a Frenchman born, but was brought up in his Youth in the Court of Edward III, and familiarly converſant in that of Richard II. He wrote in his own Tongue, which was then the Court Language of England. In the Engliſh Edition, publiſhed by Sir John Bourchier, at the command of Henry VIII, the miſtakes that had crept into the French Copies are corrected. His account of matters ſeems to be plain and honeſt; and perhaps none gives a better of the affairs of Edward III and Richard II. Rapin has made good uſe of him.

ENGUERRAND DE MONSTRELET, and PHILIP DE COMMINES, may not improperly be called Froiſſart's Continuators. They give a faithful and complete account of the Affairs of England, as far as they are intermixed with, or have any relation to thoſe of France, Burgundy, &c.

THOMAS WALSINGHAM, a Benedictine Monk of St. Albans. His Hiſtoria Brevis [or ſhort Hiſtory] begins at the Concluſion of Henry III's Reign, where Matthew Paris ended his. The account he gives is well enough; and we are indebted to him for many things not taken notice of by any other Writer of thoſe times. His Ypodigma Neuſtriæ (as he calls it) gives an account of Normandy, from the time it came firſt into the hands of Rollo and his Danes, down to the ſixth year of Henry V, wherein the Readers will find many occurrences not elſewhere to be met with. Both theſe Works were publiſhed by Archbiſhop Parker, in 1574, and reprinted at Francfort in 1603.

JOHN HARDING comes next, a northern Engliſhman, and an inveterate Enemy to the Scots. He collected whatever might tend to the Proof of the ancient Vaſſalage of Scotland to the Crown of England; and hearing of an old Record in that Kingdom which put the Matter paſt diſpute, he went in diſguiſe, with much ado brought it away, and ſhewed it to Henry V, Henry VI, and Edward IV. To the laſt of theſe he dedicated his two Books of Chronicles in Engliſh Rhime. Printed at London, 1543.

WILLIAM CAXTON was a menial Servant for thirty years together to Margaret, Ducheſs of Burgundy, (Siſter to Edward IV.) in Flanders. Finding, as he ſays, after his return to England, an imperfect Hiſtory, he continued it in Engliſh, under the Latin Title of Fructus Temporum. It begins with the firſt inhabiting of this Iſland, and ends (the laſt year of Edward IV.) 1483. Folio, printed 1515.

JOHN ROSSE, or ROUS, travelled over the greateſt part of England; and having made large Collections out of the Libraries where he came, he writ the Hiſtory of our Kings, which is ſtill extant in MS in the Cottonian Library. He died in 1491.

The Reign of HENRY VIII; Containing the Space of Thirty Seven Years and Nine Months.

20. HENRY VIII.

HENRY VIII. 1509.

HENRY VIII, Son and Succeſſor of Henry VII, came to the Crown at the age of eighteen years, wanting a few months (1). The Lord Herbert, his Hiſtorian, ſays, the King his Father deſigned him at firſt for the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, becauſe having an elder Son, there was no likelihood that This would aſcend the Throne. And therefore, continues he, care was taken to inſtruct him in all the parts of Learning neceſſary for a Prince that was one day to be a Churchman. He would have ſpoken more juſtly, if he had only ſaid, that Henry VII had ſuch a deſign when he firſt put him upon his Studies. But as the young Prince was become his Heir-apparent at the age of eleven years, it could not be with the ſame view, that he cauſed him to purſue the Study of ſuch parts of Learning as were proper for a Clergyman. It is more likely therefore, that the King his Father kept him to his Studies, for fear his active and fiery Spirit ſhould carry him to more dangerous employments. He was only Son of Queen Elizabeth, Heireſs of the Houſe of York. Conſequently he might have given the King his Father ſome trouble, had he thought of aſſerting his right as Heir to his Mother. However this be, Henry having taken a reliſh for Learning in his younger years, preſerved it ever after. He always delighted in peruſing good Books, and converſing with the Learned, even when the multitude of his affairs ſeemed to divert him from ſuch kind of employments. By this means he made advances in the Sciences very uncommon to great Princes. Francis I, his Cotemporary, ſtiled by the French Hiſtorians, the Father of the Muſes, was in learning much his inferior. He ſpoke French and Latin very well and readily. He was perfectly skilled in Muſick, as two entire Maſſes compoſed by himſelf, and often ſung in his Chapel, do abundantly witneſs. He was exerciſed in the moſt abſtruſe points of the Ariſtotelian Philoſophy, which alone was in vogue in thoſe days. But he applied himſelf chiefly to the ſtudy of Divinity, as it was then taught in the Univerſities, all ſtuffed with uſeleſs queſtions. Thomas Aquinas's Summary was his favorite book. 1509.

His Education. Herbert. Hollingſh.

This knowledge, which was conſidered as a great accompliſhment, even in ordinary Perſons, had upon the young Prince an effect which is not unuſual. It gave him a good opinion of himſelf, which had but too much influence upon all the actions of his Life. The exceſſive commendations beſtowed upon him by all, helped to confirm him in this conceit. When he was yet unexperienced in the affairs of the State, he fancied himſelf very able; and this preſumption was the cauſe of his being often the Dupe of thoſe Princes with whom he was concerned, as will more amply appear in the ſequel of his Reign.

Henry has good Conceit of himſelf. He is often impoſed upon.

But in remarking that this Prince had a great deal of ſelf-conceit, I don't pretend to rob him of, or any ways leſſen the noble qualities he had from Nature or Education. In his youth he was very handſome, and expert in all bodily exerciſes, as much as, or more than any Prince of his time. Accordingly, he was paſſionately fond of all thoſe diverſions which gave him an opportunity to ſhew his activity. He was couragious without Oſtentation, of a free and open Temper, an enemy to Fraud and Inſincerity, ſcorning to uſe indirect means to compaſs his ends. His Liberality perhaps was as much too great, as the King his Father's Avarice. Henry VII ſeemed to have been ſollicitous to accumulate riches, only to afford his Son the pleaſure to ſquander them away without any diſcretion.

His good Qualities.

As Henry VIII, when he mounted the Throne, was little experienced in the affairs of the Government, he made uſe at firſt of the King his Father's Miniſters and Counſellors. The principal were, William Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury, [and Lord Chancellor of England] of whom honorable mention is made by Eraſmus (2) ſomewhere in Henry VII's Funeral. Hall. Hollingſh. Stow. Herbert.

Henry VII's Funeral was celebrated with great magnificence a few days after his death. His body was interred at Weſtminſter in the Chapel built by himſelf, and for the adorning whereof he had ſpared no coſt. This Chapel paſſed then for one of the ſtatelieſt in Chriſtendom. Henry VII, covetous as he was, laid out fourteen thouſand, ſome ſay, twenty thouſand pounds Sterling, a very conſiderable Sum in thoſe days, when Money was much ſcarcer in Europe that at preſent (2).

While the obſequies were preparing, the new King privately retired from his Palace of Richmond, to the Tower of London (3), under colour of withdrawing on account of the King his Father's death. But it was rather to ſettle with his Miniſters ſome affairs which would not admit of delay. Whilſt he was thought in his retirement to be employed in devotion, he ordered Henry Lord Staffford, Brother of the Duke of Buckingham, to be apprehended, probably, upon ſome groundleſs Suſpicion, which ſoon vaniſhed, ſince, ſhortly after, he was created Earl of Wiltſhire.

General Pardon. Proclamation to encourage the People to complain. Stow. Hollingſh. Herbert. Pol. Virg.

A few days after (5), the King confirmed his Father's General Pardon granted before his death (6). But all offenders had not the benefit thereof. A Proclamation quickly appeared, wherein the King ſaid, that being informed, his good Subjects had been oppreſſed under the ſpecious pretence of preſerving the Prerogatives of the Crown, he gave them leave to bring their Complaints, and promiſed them ſatisfaction. The deſign of this Proclamation, was not to reſtore to his Subjects the Sums unjuſtly extorted by the late King, but only to encourage them to exhibit their Complaints againſt Empſon and Dudley, the Inſtruments made uſe of by Henry VII, and to give them ſome ſort of ſatisfaction, by puniſhing theſe two Miniſters.

When this Proclamation was publiſhed, numberleſs Petitions were preſented againſt them. This was what the Court wanted, not only becauſe theſe Men were odious to the whole Nation, but moreover to ſhew the people, the new King intended to rule in a very different manner from the King his Father. Upon all theſe Petitions, Empſon and Dudley were called before the Council, where they were briefly told the principal Articles alledged againſt them (7). Empſon anſwered for both, "That the Accuſation was of a very new and ſtrange nature: That "uſually Men were proſecuted for acting againſt the "Laws, or diſobeying their Sovereign; but for their "part, they were accuſed by the people of executing the "Laws of which they themſelves were the Authors: "That on the other hand, the King called them to an "account for obeying his Father's expreſs orders, unheard "of Crime, the puniſhment whereof would be apt to "throw all his Subjects into rebellion: That if they "muſt be puniſhed for ſuch offences, he deſired it "might not be divulged to foreign Nations, leſt they "ſhould infer, that the final diſſolution of the Engliſh "Government was approaching." To this it was briefly replied, "That he had ſpoke with great freedom; but "his Eloquence was fruitleſs and unſeaſonable: That "they were not accuſed of executing the Laws, or of "obeying the King, but of ſtretching the Laws beyond "their due bounds, and exceeding their Sovereign's "Commiſſion, which Accuſations they had reaſon to fear "were too well proved." Then they were both committed to the Tower (8). The King was reſolved to make them an example, in order to content the people who were extremely incenſed againſt them. Thus their condemnation was reſolved before their appearance, though it was not yet known on what to ground their proceſs. In any other Country, an act of Sovereignty to ſend theſe two Men to the Gallows, would have been ſeen with joy. But it is not the ſame in England, where the greateſt Criminals have privileges of which they cannot be debarred, without giving the people occaſion to think, the Court is forming deſigns againſt Liberty. It was neceſſary therefore to ſearch for ſome expreſs Law to condemn them. But upon examining the Accuſation already brought againſt them great difficulties occurred. It appeared, that though they were accuſed of numberleſs offences, nothing could be proved but their mercileſs execution of the Laws. But notwithſtanding they had ſtretched theſe ſame Laws as far as the words would bear, it could not be charged to them as a Crime, ſince they had the King's Warrant, in whom the execution of the Laws is lodged. It is true, Henry VII, contrary to the Cuſtom of his Predeceſſors, had acted according to the utmoſt rigour of the Statutes. But he might do it, and if the former Kings had done otherwiſe, it was more out of Condeſcenſion than Juſtice. Theſe two Miniſters therefore could not be tried for obeying him. Beſides, to condemn them for executing their maſter's orders, was publickly to diſhonour that Prince's memory, and renew the remembrance of his Severities upon his Subjects. It was reſolved therefore to put them to death upon a falſe Accuſation, of intending to withdraw their Allegiance from the King ſince his Acceſſion to the Throne. It is evident, this Accuſation was entirely groundleſs. For how could two perſons ſo odious to the whole Nation, and deprived of all Credit by the death of Henry VII, think of ſuch a deſign, and ſtill leſs put it in execution (9). Mean while, it was not ſcrupled to take away their Lives for a forged Crime, becauſe they were believed worthy of death, though not condemned by the Letter of the Law. Upon this frivolous Accuſation, they were brought before their proper Judges, and found guilty, whether falſe Witneſſes were ſuborned againſt them, or by a mental reſervation hitherto unknown in England, in Judgments of this nature. Dudley was tried at London the 16th of July, but Empſon was not condemned till the 14th of October (9) at Northampton. Henry, either out of ſcruple, or ſome other motive, ſuſpended their execution till the next year (11).

Whilſt means were contriving to diſpatch theſe two Miniſters, the King and his Council had a much more important affair to take into conſideration. We have ſeen, in the former reign, Prince Arthur's Marriage with Catherine of Arragon; that Prince's death without Iſſue; the reaſons inducing King Henry VII to deſire, that Prince Henry, become his Heir Apparent, ſhould marry his Brother's Widow; the conſent of Ferdinand and Iſabella, Father and Mother of the Princeſs; and Pope Julius's Diſpenſation for the Marriage. The true reaſon why Henry VII propoſed this match, was, his unwillingneſs to reſtore the hundred thouſand Crowns received in part of Catherine's Dower. He was alſo afraid of loſing the other half, which remained to be paid. In ſhort, he foreſaw, that after the receipt of the whole, the Princeſs his Daughter-in-law would indiſpenſably enjoy her Settlement of the third part of the Revenues of the Principality of Wales, and the County of Cornwal. However, as it was not decent to urge ſuch a motive to the Pope, to obtain a Diſpenſation for ſo ſtrange a Marriage, which could not but be deemed ſcandalous, it was pretended to be neceſſary to preſerve the Peace between Henry VII and the King and Queen of Spain. Hall. Herbert. In conſequence of the Pope's Diſpenſation, Henry and Catherine were ſolemnly affianced. Nevertheleſs, whether Henry VII intended only to deceive Ferdinand, and get the remaining hundred thouſand Crowns, or was moved by the Remonſtrances of Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury concerning this Marriage, he ſo ordered it, that the Prince his Son on the very day he was fourteen years of age, made in the preſence of certain Witneſſes, a Proteſtation in form againſt the conſent he had given. But this Proteſtation was kept ſo ſecret, that it came not to the knowledge of the publick till it was neceſſary, many years after, to divulge it. Upon the news of Henry VII's death, Ferdinand ſent to the Earl of Fuenſalida his Ambaſſador in England, a very ample power to renew the Treaty of Alliance made with the deceaſed King, ordering him withal, to demand the Confirmation and Execution of that which was concluded for Catherine's ſecond Marriage with Prince Henry, now become King of England.

Difficulties about the Marriage. Burnet.

The Spaniſh Ambaſſador having preſented a Memorial upon this occaſion, it was deliberated in Council, whether the King ſhould conſummate his Marriage with Catherine. This affair was debated with great attention. Againſt the Marriage it was alledged, that for a Man to marry his Brother's Widow was a thing unheard of among Chriſtians: That ſuch a Marriage was contrary to the Law of God, and therefore it was a queſtion, whether the Pope had power to diſpenſe with it. This was the Archbiſhop of Canterbury's opinion, who could not forbear conſidering the Marriage as really inceſtuous. But Richard Fox Biſhop of Wincheſter was of another mind. He ſtrenuouſly inſiſted upon the Pope's Diſpenſation, and the unlimited power of Chriſt's Vicar. He affirmed, "That "the Pope's granting a Diſpenſation, was a certain proof "that he had the power, and was ſufficient to ſatisfy "the King's Conſcience: That no perſon upon earth "could limit, or ſo much as inquire into the Papal Au- "thority; and though ſuch a power ſhould be aſcribed "to a General Council, at leaſt the Council of England "could not pretend to it." To theſe Arguments concerning Conſcience, the Biſhop added others drawn from reaſons of State, and the King's particular Intereſt. He ſaid, "That probably, the King would have, during the "courſe of his reign, many diſputes with France, Eng- "land's old Enemy, and whether he would attack, or "only defend, the Alliance with Spain was abſolutely ne- "ceſſary: That in ſending back the Princeſs Catherine "after having affianced her, he would affront King Fer- "dinand, which he would certainly revenge by leaguing "with France, and ſuch a League could not but endanger "England, or at leaſt be extremely expenſive to the "Nation: That moreover, if the King refuſed to con- "ſummate his Marriage with Catherine, he muſt reſolve "either to reſtore her Dower, or ſuffer her to enjoy her "Settlement: But by marrying her he would ſave the "hundred thouſand Crowns received by the King his Fa- "ther, gain another hundred thouſand, which the King "of Arragon was to pay, and avoid the great charge "he ſhould be at, in marrying another Princeſs, and "conducting her into England. In fine, he inlarged upon "the ſweet and virtuous Temper of the Princeſs of Wales, "capable of making a Husband perfectly happy." Adding, "there was no room to doubt, that the Princeſs was "ſtill a Virgin, ſince ſhe herſelf affirmed it, offering even "to be tried by Matrons, to ſhew that ſhe ſpoke the "truth."

Henry reſolves to marry Catherine.

All theſe arguments, except the firſt concerning the diſpenſation, were very ſtrong. As to that, it was ſo dangerous for a Churchman to diſpute the Pope's authority, eſpecially ſuch a Pope's as Julius II, who was ſtill in his vigour, that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury durſt not perſiſt openly in his opinion. So, the King cloſing with the Biſhop of Wincheſter's and almoſt the whole Council's ſentiments, it was reſolved he ſhould conſummate his Marriage. But firſt he required of the Princeſs that ſhe ſhould renounce by a ſolemn Act her Dower of two hundred thouſand Crowns, and conſent that the ſum ſhould belong to the King her Spouſe, to be claimed again neither by herſelf nor Heirs, nor by King Ferdinand her Father, nor Queen Joan her Siſter, nor any Perſon living, on any pretence whatſoever. Two days after, the Earl of Fuenſalida made the like renunciation in the name of King Ferdinand and Queen Joan. Catherine's Letters Patents, wherein ſhe ſtiles herſelf only Princeſs of Wales, bearing date June the 7th, it is evident, the King married her not on the third of that month, as Hiſtorians affirm, nor ſooner than the day theſe Letters were ſigned. Their Coronation was ſolemnized on the 24th of the ſame month, and five days after died Margaret Counteſs of Richmond and Derby, the King's Grandmother (1).

Death of the Counteſs of Richmond. Hall. Stow.

In the beginning of his Reign, Henry willingly left to his Council and Miniſters the care and management of his affairs. As he was in Peace with all his Neighbours, what paſſed in the Kingdom, could not keep him much employed. He thought only of ſuch pleaſures and diverſions, as were more ſuitable to his years, than application to buſineſs. But as he was naturally liberal, his entertainments at Court were very expenſive. The ancient Biſhop of Wincheſter, Henry VII's old Miniſter, could not help murmuring to ſee the Money laviſhed away without any neceſſity, which his deceaſed Maſter had amaſſed with ſo much care, pains and injuſtice, in which he had himſelf been employed. He threw all the blame upon the Earl of Surrey, Lord Treaſurer, who was his rival in favour under the late King, and continued to be ſo ſtill under the preſent, by gaining the affection of his new Maſter by a blind compliance to his Will. During Henry VII's life he was more cloſe, and harder to part with Money than the King himſelf. How expreſs ſoever the Orders were for payments, he always found difficulties, and by that means made his Court admirably to his Maſter. Being continued in his poſt in the preſent Reign, he became quite another Man. He not only paid, without examination, whatever was ordered, but alſo put the King upon ſpending extravagantly. This gained him the favour of the young Prince, who was naturally addicted to prodigality. The Biſhop of Wincheſter openly blamed this conduct, as highly prejudicial to the King's intereſt. But he was little regarded, in a Court where every one was ſtriving to make an advantage of the Sovereign's liberal temper. Mean while, his diſcourſes exaſperated more and more the Earl of Surrey and the young Courtiers againſt him, who never ceaſed to do him ill Offices with the King. Thus the Biſhop who was in ſo great credit in the late Reign, gradually loſt it in this. His diſgrace, which ſat heavy upon his mind, threw him upon deviſing means to ſupplant his rival, by introducing at Court Thomas Wolſey, whoſe qualifications he was no ſtranger to. Wolſey was a Clergyman, already eminent for his merit, though he was but a Butcher's Son of Ipſwich. The Biſhop of Wincheſter eaſily foreſaw, the King would ſoon be in want of Perſons about him, fit and able to eaſe him; and as he knew Wolſey's genius, did not queſtion that when he was at Court, he would render himſelf neceſſary to the King. To that end, he procured him the place of Almoner. We ſhall ſee preſently that the Biſhop was not miſtaken in his Judgment, or rather that his foreſight was far ſhort of Wolſey's fortune (2).

land,

1509. land, during the first eight months of the Reign of Henry VIII. They were for the most part domestick affairs of little importance, except the King's Marriage, which was attended with very great consequences. But there passed abroad matters of great moment, which became as it were the source of the troubles wherewith almost all Christendom was agitated for above fifty years, and wherein England was but too much ingaged. For some time, the affairs of Europe had begun to have a new face, and what happened this year in Italy put them upon such a foot, as obliged almost every Sovereign to be concerned therein. Henry VIII unhappily intangled himself in the troubles of that Country, which seem to have had no relation to him. This makes the knowledge of the affairs of Italy so absolutely necessary, that without it neither the events of this Reign can be understood, nor the King's character fully known. It will therefore be proper to inlarge upon this Subject, which concerns not only the History of England, but also those of France, Spain, Germany, Switzerland; the principal events whereof, for a long space of time, flowed properly from the affairs of Italy. It is true, most of the authors who have writ the Histories of these States, supposed their readers to be acquainted with what passed in Italy at the same time. They have thereby much shortened their Works; but withal rendered them very obscure to those who were not so fully instructed as they have supposed. For my part I intend another course. Since the affairs of Italy are the foundation of most of the occurrences in Europe, and particularly in England, during almost one half of the sixteenth Century, I think they ought to be spoken of something largely, which alone can clear the particular Histories proceeding from thence. But to avoid tedious digressions which would be indispensable in the sequel, it is necessary to give first a distinct idea of the state of Italy, as well as of the character and interests of the several Princes.

State of Italy, Milan, and Naples.

I have already related in the foregoing Reign how Lewis XII, assisted by the Venetians, conquered the Duchy of Milan upon Ludovico Sforza, pretending a right to it as Grandson to Valentina Visconti, Daughter of John Galeazzo I, Duke of Milan. I have likewise had occasion to speak of the Conquest of Naples by the united arms of Lewis XII and Ferdinand, and of the means used by the last to remain sole Master of that Kingdom. It will suffice therefore to add here, that though Lewis XII lost his portion of that Conquest, he desisted not from his pretensions, but was waiting for a favorable opportunity to assert them. I must now briefly speak of the other States of Italy, and first of the Ecclesiastical State.

Ecclesiastical State.

Before the Kings of France and Spain had set foot in Italy, the Popes were as Sovereign arbiters of that Country. But it was not so much by their Temporal arms as their Spiritual, of which they made frequent use. For some Centuries past they had lost great part of the Demesns formerly belonging to the Church. About the end of the Reign of Otho I, the Ecclesiastical State consisted of the City of Rome and its Territory, with Tuscany, the Marquisate of Ancona, the Duchy of Spoleto, Ravenna, all La Romagna, and the whole Country in general comprized formerly under the Exarchate (1). But afterwards, during the Wars of the Guelphs and Gibelins (2), the Emperors wrested from the Popes all Tuscany and several Towns in other parts. Some of these Towns had thought fit to withdraw their obedience from the Church, and the Popes themselves had been forced to grant others in Fee to Lords who served them, or from whom they expected assistance. At length, the Emperor Rodolphus I, having sold liberty to as many Cities of Italy as would purchase it, there were several formerly belonging to the Church that embraced the opportunity, to shake off, at the same time both the Emperor's and the Pope's yoke (3). Hence there were quickly in Italy almost as many Sovereignties as Cities. The strongest subdued the weakest, and fell at last themselves under the Dominion, or rather the Tyranny of some of their own Citizens, who found means to seize the whole power. In this manner were formed in Italy several petty States, out of the ruins of what the antient Kings of Italy, the Emperors, and the Popes had formerly possessed.

In the Pontificate of Alexander VI, the Ecclesiastical State was reduced within narrower bounds than before, though the Popes had preserved the Sovereignty of several Cities, of which they were no longer Proprietors. Of this number were Ravenna, Bologna, Ferrara, Urbino, Faenza, Rimini, Pezzaro, Imola, Cesena, Perusa. Notwithstanding all these losses, they were still very powerful; 1509. because their spiritual arms gave them great advantages over their Neighbours. Moreover, besides the revenues of the Ecclesiastical State, they had very considerable incomes from all Christendom.

But when Lewis XII took possession of the Duchy of Milan, and Ferdinand of the Kingdom of Naples, the affairs of Italy had quite another face. Then the temporal power of the Popes was nothing in comparison of that of these two Monarchs, who besides their Dominions in Italy, had moreover at their command the Forces of two large Kingdoms. On the other hand, the Roman Pontiffs met with much more opposition, when they had a mind to brandish their spiritual weapons, whose force was in proportion to the weakness of those against whom they were darted. For this reason they sought all sorts of means to drive the Foreigners out of Italy. But as they could not by their own strength execute such a design, they were forced to make use of one of these Kings to destroy the other, in which their policy was often deceived. For, they could not humble one, without giving the other a superiority more destructive of their interests, than the equality which was between them before. This for many years was the occasion of all the Pope's intrigues, and withal an incumbrance they could never get clear of. Sometimes they joined with one to pull down the other; sometimes setting them at variance, they remained bare Spectators of the Battle; and sometimes they called in Foreigners to make the ballance incline to the side they intended to favour. But whatever was the success of these Wars, the Conqueror ever became very formidable to the Pope and all Italy. It is certain therefore that the Conquests of Naples and Milan gave a mortal wound to the temporal power of the Popes, and were also very prejudicial to their spiritual authority. As the Popes from thenceforward had frequent occasions of quarrel with the Kings of France, now become their Neighbours, they sometimes made use of their spiritual arms, but not with the same success as formerly against the Sovereigns of Italy. As they had to deal with Princes who did not easily bend, they only gave them occasion to examine the grounds of the Papal authority; and this inquiry was not to the advantage of the Popes.

Besides the interest of their See, the Roman Pontiffs had also that of their Family, of which they were no less mindful. Every one of them seeking to raise his Nephews or other Relations; all the Cities formerly belonging to the Church were so many objects that inflamed their desires. Alexander VI, who of all the Popes his Predecessors was the least scrupulous, had formed the design of making Cæsar Borgia his Bastard a great Prince, by erecting him a State out of several Cities or States of la Romagna, which still owned the Pope's Sovereignty, and were under his protection. To execute this design it was that Cæsar Borgia, either by fraud or force, became master of Perusa, Urbino, Imola, Faenza, Rimini, Pezzaro, Cesena, under colour that the Possessors had not been punctual in paying the tribute or annual relief to the Holy See. But Alexander VI dying before his Son was well settled in his Conquests, it happened, during the short Pontificate of Pius III, and the interval between his death and the election of Julius II, that the former owners of these Cities found means to recover them. This was chiefly by the assistance of the Venetians, who, for their pains, kept Faenza and Rimini.

Character and Design of Julius II's Guicciard.

Julius II, who succeeded Pius III, formed for the House of la Rovere, of which he was, the same projects as Alexander VI had formed for that of Borgia. He was no sooner in the Papal Chair, but he begun the execution of his designs, with imperiously acquainting the Venetians, that his intention was to re-annex to the Church whatever had been alienated, and therefore they must restore Faenza and Rimini. Upon their refusal, he demanded aid of the Emperor Maximilian. This was properly the first rise of the League of Cambray, mentioned in the foregoing Reign, and of which I shall be obliged to speak more fully hereafter.

The Republick of Venice. Paruta. Dogleni Sabellico Bembo, &c.

The Senate of Venice had long passed for the wisest and most politick assembly in the World. By their prudence and abilities they had by degrees formed in Terra firma (4), a State, which, being supported by a very strong naval Force, was inferior to none in Italy. This State consisted of Friuli, Treviso, Verona, Vicenza, Padua, Bergamo, Brescia, Crema, Cremona, Rovigo, and the whole Polesin, Ravenna, Faenza, Rimini. Most of these Cities with their Territories were formerly part of the King-

(1) So was this District formerly called, because it was governed by the Emperor of Constantinople's General in the West, named his Exarch, who resided at Ravenna. The first Exarch was under Justin the young, in 567, after Belisarius and Narses had driven the Barbarians out of Italy: The last was Eutychius, defeated by Astolphus King of the Lombards in 751. Pepin, King of France, turned him out of the Exarchate, and made a Present of it to the Pope.

1509. dom of Italy. After that, they fell under the Dominion of the German Emperors, who governed them by their Vicars. At length, either these Vicars were become Sovereigns, or, being expelled, the Cities had recovered their liberty, to fall again afterwards under the Tyranny of some private Persons, who had usurped an absolute power. Of these the Venetians had acquired them, either by Money or force of arms. But however it be, when they had made these acquisitions, it is certain, the authority of the Emperors was seldom acknowledged. Mean while the Emperors still preserved their pretensions to all these Cities, as having been formerly parts of the Empire, or rather of the Kingdom of Italy, injoyed by some of their predecessors. Friuli was conquered upon the Church of Aquileia, to whom it was presented by Otho I; Ravenna, Faenza, Rimini, formerly belonged to the See of Rome. Rovigo and the Polesin were conquered upon the Duke of Ferrara. Cremona, and Gierradadda, appertained to the Duchy of Milan, having been resigned by Lewis XII. Brescia was taken from the Dukes of Milan, and Crema freely given up by Duke Francis Sforza. They had still in the Kingdom of Naples five Maritime places, mortgaged to them by one of the Kings.

Bologna. Ghirard. Alberti.

Bologna (1) was a rich and powerful City; but not so considerable as formerly. Civil discords had at length compelled her upon certain terms to submit to the Church. After that, the City was governed by the Pope's Legates, sent thither from time to time. But their Dominion suffered frequent interruptions. The Legates oppressing the People, forced them often to shake off their yoke and expel them the City. But it was only to fall again under the Tyranny of the heads of Faction, who by their oppressions forced them to have recourse to the Pope and receive his Legates again. This is what happened several times. In the year 1440, Hannibal Bentivoglio became so powerful, that he was little less than a Sovereign. From that time to 1506 some one of the Family of Bentivoglio held the Government, though the Pope's Legates were still admitted and honoured, but without having any real power. At last Julius II, not content with this shadow of authority, demanded in 1506, aid of Lewis XII, to make himself master of Bologna. Though France had hitherto protected the Bentivoglio's, Lewis however ordered the Governour of Milan to send the Pope Troops. Whereupon John Bentivoglio, head of that House, seeing himself forsaken by the King of France, quitted Bologna with all his Family, and retired to Milan, leaving the City to the Pope.

Ferrara. Sardi.

The Duchy of Ferrara (2) was a Fief of the Church, long possessed by the Family of Este, who were invested by the Pope, and paid an yearly relief in Money. This petty State bordering upon the Pope and the Venetians, and being very convenient for both, preserved itself by their mutual Jealousy; but however, the Venetians had taken from them Rovigo, and the Polesin. But Julius II had greater views, and thought seriously of annexing the whole Duchy to the Church.

Modena and Reggio. G. Batt. Pigna.

Modena and Reggio were likewise under the Dominion of the Family of Este, not as belonging to the Duchy of Ferrara, but as a distinct State acquired by that Family after being possessed of Ferrara. Julius II, had also pretensions to these two Cities, as having been formerly given to the Church by Charlemain, and perhaps on the sole pretence, that they belonged to the Duke of Ferrara his Vassal.

Urbino. Cimarelli.

Urbino (3) had formerly been of the Church's demean. But the Popes had not for many years challenged more than the right of Sovereignty. Cæsar Borgia had seized this City, and expelled Duke Guidobaldi Ubaldini, who recovered it after the death of Alexander VI. As Guidobaldi had no Children, Julius II perswaded him to adopt Francis Maria de la Rovere, Nephew to both, Son of the Pope's Brother and the Duke's Sister. Shortly after, la Rovere became Duke of Urbino, by the death of Guidobaldi his adoptive Father.

Parma and Placentia. Alberti.

Parma and Placentia had been under the dominion of several Lords or Tyrants, till at last they became subject to the Dukes of Milan. Lewis XII took possession of them after his Conquest of the Milanese.

Florence. Machiavel.

Florence, a very potent City, and the chief of Tuscany, was fallen at length under the Dominion of the Family of Medicis. But afterwards an opposite Faction prevailing, they were driven from thence, and were now in exile, attempting however from time to time to be restored to their Country.

Pisa. Alberti.

Pisa had been formerly a very considerable City by reason of her naval Forces; but at length becoming subject to the Dukes of Milan, a Bastard of that Family, to whom it was given, sold it to the Florentines. The Pisani were against the Sale, and would have recovered their Liberty, but were overcome. After that, Charles VIII, in his way to Naples, restored Pisa to her Liberty; but as soon as the Florentines had nothing more to fear from him, they besieged Pisa, though assisted by the Venetians, and the Siege was still carrying on at the time of the League of Cambray. 1509.

Genoa. Pizano.

The City of Genoa, after sundry Revolutions caused by the Factions of the Fregosa's, and the Adorno's, was at length fallen into the hands of the French, in the reign of Charles VII. After that, Lewis XI resigned it to the Duke of Milan, and Lewis XII seized it after his Conquest of the Milanese.

Motives of the League of Cambray against the Venetians.

This Survey of the States of Italy shows, that it was then divided between six Powers, namely, Pope Julius II, Lewis XII King of France and Duke of Milan, Ferdinand King of Arragon and Naples, the Republicks of Venice and Florence, and the Duke of Ferrara. To these six may be added, the Emperor Maximilian, who without possessing a foot of land in Italy, had however pretensions to whatever was formerly enjoyed by the Emperors, and particularly to the firm Land-State of the Venetians, whose ruin the other six were equally concerned to procure. The Emperor pretended, that all the Venetian Dominions belonged to the Empire; he passionately desired to wrest some place from them that would give him entrance into Italy, and an opportunity to re-establish the Imperial power in that Country. Julius II, as I said, had formed a project to annex to the Church, whatever had been alienated, and especially the Duchy of Ferrara, and the Towns of la Romagna. This design could be effected only by the destruction of the Venetians, ever attentive to oppose the growth of their Neighbours. Besides, the Pope had a mind to begin with them, and wrest from them Ravenna, Faenza, and Rimini. Lewis XII repented of yielding to them Cremona and Gierradadda. He wanted to dispossess them, and under that pretence, to get possession also of Crema, Bergamo, and Brescia, and in general of whatever had belonged to the Dukes of Milan. Ferdinand was desirous to recover without Money, the five maritime Towns of the Kingdom of Naples which had been mortgaged to them. Moreover, his Interest required, that there should be always troubles in Italy, to hinder Lewis XII from thinking of the Conquest of Naples. The Duke of Ferrara wished to recover Rovigo, and the Polesin. Lastly, the Florentines, obstinately bent upon the Siege of Pisa, protected and defended by the Venetians, could desire nothing more advantagious than to see that Republick unable to assist the Pisani.

Hist. della Legha di Cambray.

League of Cambray.

Such were the motives of the League formed against Venice, of which the Pope, the Emperor, and the King of France were the chief promoters. For the greater Secrecy, they spread a report, that the Emperor, as Guardian to Charles of Austria his Grandson, had agreed, that his differences with the Duke of Gueldres should be amicably adjusted. To that purpose, the City of Cambray was appointed for the place of Congress, thereby to intimate, that the affairs only of Flanders would be considered. Here the famous League against the Republick of Venice was concluded; and the better to deceive the Spies, was signed at first a Treaty of perpetual Peace between the Pope, the Emperor, Lewis XII, and Ferdinand, which was indeed made publick. But a second Treaty, which care was taken not to divulge, contained a League offensive and defensive against the Venetians, the principal Articles whereof were as follows:

Hist. della Legha di Cambray.

Treaty of the Allies against Venice. Bembo.

In the first place it was set forth in the Preamble, that the Turks having begun to make great progress in Europe, it was absolutely necessary for the Christian Princes to join their Forces against them, but that the Venetians, by their continual Incroachments, greatly obstructed this Union. From thence it was concluded, that they were to be dispossessed of what they had usurped. This was the pious motive of the League. And therefore it was agreed, that of their spoils, the Pope should have Ravenna, Faenza and Rimini; the Emperor, as such, Verona, Vicenza, and Padua, and as Duke of Austria, Treviso, and Friuli: Lewis XII, as Duke of Milan, Cremona, Gierradadda, Brescia, Crema, and Bergamo: The King of Arragon, Manfredonia, Trani, Monopoli, Brindisi, and Otranto in the Kingdom of Naples; that the Dukes of Ferrara and Savoy, and the Marquis of Mantua should be admitted into the League if they desired it; the first to recover Rovigo, and the Polesin; the second, to get the Kingdom of Cyprus out of the hands of the Venetians; and the third, to obtain satisfaction concerning certain Pretensions he had To accompliſh this deſign, it was agreed, that the King of France in perſon ſhould enter the Territories of the Venetians, the firſt of April, in the year 1509, with an army of forty thouſand Men: That the Pope ſhould ſend an army into la Romagna; and Ferdinand have one in Lombardy, with a Fleet in the Gulf; and the Emperor attack the Venetians from the ſide of Germany. But as he had lately made a three years Truce with them, an admirable expedient was deviſed to furniſh him with a pretence to break it, which was, that the Pope ſhould ſummon him as the Church's Advocate, to come and defend the Patrimony. In fine, Julius II engaged to thunder out all the Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures againſt Venice. This League was ſigned at Cambray, December 10th, 1508.

Campain of the year 1509. Mezerai. Bembo.

The time of executing the projects of the League being come, Lewis XII departed from Milan the beginning of April 1509, at the head of forty thouſand Men, whilſt the Pope's army entered la Romagna under the Conduct of Franeis Maria de la Rovere Duke of Urbino, and Raymond of Cardona threw himſelf into Lombardy with the King of Arragon's Troops. At the ſame time, the Duke of Ferrara took the Field in the Poleſin. But the Emperor contented himſelf with keeping at Trent, and ſeeing the reſt of the Allies act, in order to be ready to reap the fruit of their labours. Mean while, the Venetians, having firſt provided their Towns with Ammunition, raiſed an army, under the command of Count Pitigliano their General, whoſe Lieutenant was Bartholomew d' Alviano.

Battle of Agnadel. Bembo.

The Van of the French army commanded by Chaumont, paſſed the Adda the 15th of April, and at the ſame time the Pope excommunicated the Venetians, and put the City of Venice under an Interdict. On the 14th of May was fought the Battle of Gierradadda or Agnadel (1), between the French and Venetians, contrary to the opinion of Count Pitigliano, though General in chief of the Venetians, and to all reaſon. For the Venetians having no refuge but their army, it was by no means proper to hazard a Battle. But the heat of Bartholomew d' Alviano prevailed over his General's Prudence. The Venetian army was entirely routed, and Alviano taken Priſoner. Whereupon the Venetians being no longer able to reſiſt their Enemies, Lewis in leſs than a Fortnight became maſter of Cremona, Peſchiera, Crema, Breſcia, Bergamo, and of all the places in general, formerly belonging to the Milaneſe. Moreover Vicenza, Verona, and Padua, ſent him their Keys. But as by the Treaty of Cambray, theſe places were in the Emperor's diviſion, he ſent their Deputies to him. Maximilian was then at Trent expecting the Succeſs of the confederate Arms. Upon the arrival of the Deputies, he ordered his Troops to advance towards the State of Venice, and as theſe Cities freely opened their Gates, had only to garriſon them. Treviſo alone refuſed him admittance, and remained firm to the Venetians, though reduced to the laſt extremity. Friuli and the Towns of Iſtria followed the ſtream, and ſubmitted to the Emperor. On the other hand, the Duke of Urbino, with the Pope's army, took Ravenna, Cervia, Faenza, Rimini, whilſt the Duke of Ferrara became maſter of Rovigo, and the Marquiſs of Mantua of ſome Caſtles which were convenient for him. Thus, in a moment, the Venetians ſaw all their Dominions reduced to the ſingle City of Venice, with five places in the Kingdom of Naples, which could not be of great Service to them. Mean while, they were not entirely diſcouraged amidſt ſo many Calamities, though the Senate and People were under the greateſt Conſternation. Their chief care was to draw together their ſcattered Troops, and uſe their endeavours to break ſo deſtructive a League.

Piſa ſurrenders to the Florentines. Guicciard.

The misfortune befallen the Venetians occaſioned the loſs of Piſa. This City deſpairing of being relieved by Venice, or the King of France, who had deſerted her at laſt, ſurrendered to the Florentines, after having endured a long Siege.

Lewis XII returns to France. Mezerai. Guicciard.

Lewis XII having compaſſed his ends, returned into France, after he had detached a Body of his Troops, under the Command of la Paliſſe to join the Emperor, who probably, had not Men enough to ſupply his Garriſons, and to keep an army in the Field againſt the Venetians, who were drawing together again. Upon the King of France's departure, affairs began to have a new face. The Venetians took Padua by ſurprize, and kept it ever after. Moreover they found means to ſend into Friuli an army which employed the greateſt part of the Emperor's Troops. In ſhort, they appeaſed the Pope by their humble Submiſſion, and obtained his poſitive promiſe to give them Abſolution, and take off the Interdict upon certain Conditions which they could not refuſe him. On the other hand, Ferdinand, who had not yet reaped any benefit by the League, was eaſily gained by the offer of the five Cities held by the Venetians in the Kingdom of Naples.

and appeaſe the Pope.

Whilſt the Senate was labouring to draw off the Pope and King of Arragon from the League, Maximilian with his own and la Paliſſe's Forces, laid Siege to Padua, but after an unſucceſsful Aſſault, raiſed it, and retired into Germany. At the ſame time the French General alſo returned to Milan. By which means the Venetians had time to breathe a little, and continue with the Pope Negotiations, which made them hope the iſſue of the war would not be ſo fatal as they had hitherto apprehended.

The Emperor beſieges Padua in vain.

The Pope's Uneaſineſs. Mezerai. Guicciard.

The Union of the King of France with the Emperor, made Julius II extremely uneaſy. He beheld the French King ſo firmly ſettled in the Duchy of Milan, that it ſeemed impoſſible to diſlodge him. On the other hand, the Emperor could not but be formidable to him, ſince he had an entrance into Italy, by means of Verona and Vicenza. He did not know what to think of the powerful aid lent that Prince by Lewis XII, to compleat the ruin of the Venetians, and he was not without fear, that theſe two Monarchs had made a private Treaty together to ſhare all Italy. Mean while, he hardly ſaw how theſe two formidable Potentates could well be withſtood. Venice was come to nothing. The Florentines were drained by the long Piſan War. As for the King of Arragon it was almoſt impoſſible to treat with him, without being liable to be deceived. He knew how to improve all the Treaties, and ſcrupled not to forſake his Allies, when it was for his Intereſt. Notwithſtanding all theſe difficulties, the Pope formed the project of putting the affairs of Italy upon another foot, in order to execute his firſt deſigns. He reſolved therefore to agree and league with the Venetians; to take off Ferdinand from the league of Cambray, by inveſting him with Naples; to uſe his endeavours to ſet the Emperor and King of France at variance; to bring a Swiſs Army into the Milaneſe; in a word, to perſwade the new King of England to make a diverſion in France. Theſe were the Pope's projects, the Succeſs whereof we ſhall ſee hereafter. He began with making peace with the Venetians, upon three Conditions. Firſt, that they ſhould deſiſt from all their pretenſions to the Cities of la Romagna, lately taken from them. Secondly, that they ſhould renounce the right of placing in Ferrara a certain Magiſtrate called Biſdomina. Thirdly, that they ſhould leave the Navigation of the Gulf free to all the Subjects of the Church. In the preſent circumſtances of Venice, there were no other Conditions to be impoſed upon her.

After ſo long a digreſſion concerning the affairs of Italy, which however is not uſeleſs, as will appear in the Sequel, we muſt return to the affairs of England.

1510. The Parliament being aſſembled the 21ſt of January 1510, the Commons repreſented to the King, that certain Statutes made in the former Parliaments, had given occaſion to the King his Father's Miniſters, to oppreſs the people, by putting forced Interpretations upon them, contrary to the natural meaning of the words: That therefore it was neceſſary to ſoften, or ſo explain them, as to prevent ſuch abuſes for the future (2). Henry readily agreed to what was propoſed by the Commons, not only becauſe the thing was juſt in itſelf, but chiefly becauſe it naturally led to his deſign of having Empſon and Dudley attainted by the Parliament. Though theſe Men had been already condemned by their proper Judges, the King had deferred the execution of the Sentence. He could not help having ſome ſcruple, for cauſing them to be accuſed of a Crime of which he knew them not to be guilty. Nevertheleſs he wanted to ſacrifice them to the people, without incurring the Imputation of a falſe Accuſation, and withal to vindicate his Father's memory, by intimating, that they had exceeded his orders. (2) The benefit of Forfeitures for penal Laws was alſo reduced to the Term of three years next preceding. There was likewiſe a Sumptuary Law againſt exceſs in Apparel repealed, and a more decent one ſubrogated. Herbert, p. 6. ----- It having been enacted in the 3d of Henry VII, That a Coroner ſhould have for his Fee, upon every Inquiſition taken upon view of the body ſlain and murthered, thirteen Shillings and Four-pence of the Goods and Chattels of the Murderer; ſince the enacting of which, Coroners would not perform their Office without receiving the ſaid Sum of thirteen Shillings and Four-pence; which was contrary to the common Law, and the intent of the ſame Statute of Henry VII. It was therefore now enacted, That upon a Requeſt made to a Coroner, to come and inquire upon the view of any Perſon ſlain, drowned, or otherwiſe dead by miſadventure, the ſaid Coroner diligently ſhall do his Office upon the view of the body of every ſuch Perſon or Perſons, without taking any thing for it, upon pain, to every Coroner that will not endeavour himſelf to do his Office, or that taketh any thing for the doing of it, for every time, to forfeit forty Shillings. Statut. 1 Hen. 8. c. 7.

This method, which till then had been ſeldom practiſed, was but too frequently uſed in the Sequel of this Reign; ſo dangerous is it to eſtabliſh ſuch Precedents. Mean while, Henry having ſtill ſome difficulty to overcome his ſcruples, delayed their execution till the following Auguſt (1).

New Treaty of Alliance between Lewis XII and Henry VIII. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 270. March 23. Du Tillet. Herbert. Stow.

Whilſt the Parliament was thus employed, Lewis XII, ſent Ambaſſadors to England to renew with the King the Treaties made with Henry VII. As by the Peace of Eſtaples, after the death of one of the two Kings of France or England, his Succeſſor was to ſignify to the Survivor, whether he would continue the Alliance, it was Henry's Buſineſs to inform Lewis XII of his Intention. However, he had done nothing towards it. But as he was a lively young Prince, and abounding in riches, Lewis thought doubtleſs it would be proper to prevent him, for fear he might ingage in deſigns deſtructive of the welfare of France. His Ambaſſadors therefore concluded with Henry a new Treaty of Alliance, wherein the former Treaties were not mentioned. By this it was agreed, that the Peace between the two Kings ſhould laſt till the death of the ſhorteſt liver: That it ſhould be confirmed by the States-General of France, and the Parliament of England: That each of the two Kings ſhould take care to obtain the Pope's approbation, with a previous Sentence of Excommunication againſt the firſt Violator.

There was nothing ſaid in this new Treaty of the 745000 Crowns that Charles VIII had promiſed to pay to Henry VII, or his Succeſſors, and for which Lewis XII himſelf was ingaged by a ſubſequent Treaty, becauſe the Buſineſs was only to renew the Peace between the two preſent Kings. However, Henry forgot not to ſecure the debt, by requiring of Lewis Letters Patents, wherein he promiſed to pay the Arrears by means of twenty-five thouſand Livres every ſix months, till the whole was diſcharged. After which the Peace was ratified and ſworn by both the Kings.

Act. Pub. XIII p. 277 ---- 280. 287---290.

The Pope ſends Henry a conſecrated Roſe.

Julius II was meditating great deſigns againſt Lewis XII. The Succeſs of the League of Cambray, though he had turned it to his advantage, made him very uneaſy. He ſaw the French more firmly ſettled in Italy than ever, and Lewis XII better able to protect the Duke of Ferrara. To accompliſh his projects againſt France, he doubtleſs wanted aſſiſtance; and to that end, tried to excite all the States of Europe againſt that Kingdom, as will be ſeen preſently. So, to inſinuate himſelf into the King of England's favour, he ſent him this year the Golden Roſe, which the Popes, after ſolemnly conſecrating it, were wont to preſent to ſome Prince (2). Probably alſo, the King of Arragon, in concert with the Pope, began now to take meaſures to ingage Henry his Son-in-law in a League againſt France.

Ib. p. 275. April 9. Burnet.

Ferdinand falls off from the League.

The ſucceſs of the laſt Campain made the King of Arragon no leſs uneaſy than the Pope. He was ſenſible, Lewis never loved him, nor had any reaſon to love him, and ſaw this enemy, ſince the ruin of the Venetians, in a condition to diſturb him in the poſſeſſion of Naples. On the other hand, the League of Cambray could not procure him any further advantages, whereas the offers made him to leave it were very conſiderable. The Venetians agreed to reſtore him the Cities they poſſeſſed in the Kingdom of Naples, and the Pope was willing to depart from his claim of forty thouſand crowns, and give him the inveſtiture of that Kingdom for a Spaniſh Genet only. This was ſufficient to induce him to break his engagements at Cambray. In all appearance, ever ſince the end of the laſt year, he had taken meaſures with the Pope to form a new League againſt France. But as he never acted openly, he deſired theſe meaſures to be kept private, in order to attack Lewis the more irreſiſtibly. To that purpoſe, on the 6th of January this year 1510, he commiſſioned Lewis de Caroz of Villaragud, his Ambaſſador at London, to treat with Henry VIII about a ſtricter Alliance than had yet been concluded between the Crowns of England and Spain. 1510.

New Treaty of Alliance between Henry and Ferdinand. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 284.

Whether Henry could not ſo ſoon reſolve to conclude this new Alliance with Ferdinand, or was willing firſt to finiſh his affairs with Lewis XII, it was not till the 24th of May that the new Treaty was ſigned. It was only a defenſive Alliance between the two Kings, with a promiſe of mutual aid upon occaſion. But Ferdinand, who had his views, cauſed theſe words to be inſerted: That in caſe one of the two Kings was attacked by any Prince whatſoever, the other ſhould be obliged to proclaim and wage War againſt the aggreſſor, though he ſhould be his Ally: That if one was attacked by the King of France, the other ſhould be obliged to go againſt him in perſon with a powerful Army. This Treaty ſecured to Ferdinand the Kingdom of Naples, becauſe if Lewis XII had intended to undertake the Conqueſt, the diverſion, he would have been threatned with from England, would have infallibly kept him from his purpoſe. But it is hard to conceive what advantage Henry could reap from ſuch a Treaty, ſince it was not likely, Lewis deſigned to attack him; ſo that all the advantage was on Ferdinand's ſide. It muſt be either that Henry's Miniſters were not very clear-ſighted, or he, from a motive of generoſity for a Father-in-law, whom he did not yet ſufficiently know, was imprudently perſwaded to this proceeding, the more ſtrange, as he had lately renewed the Peace with France.

Remark on that Treaty.

Henry much only his Diverſions. Herbert. Hall.

But it muſt not be thought that Henry was then a compleat Politician. He was yet young, and minded his diverſions more than the publick affairs. There was nothing every day but Turnaments, Balls, Entertainments, Conſorts of Muſick, which conſumed by degrees the eighteen hundred thouſand pounds Sterling, found in the King his Father's Coffers (3). He uſed likewiſe to play at Tennis and Dice with certain ſtrangers who cheated him of his Money, which he diſcovered at laſt, and though a little too late, ſhamefully chaſed them from Court. He was ſo paſſionately fond of Muſick, that it devoured great part of his time; which, added to the hours he ſpent in his Studies and other diverſions, left him but little leiſure to apply himſelf to the affairs of the Government, the management whereof he willingly left to his Miniſters. And therefore it may be affirmed, that in matter of Policy, never Prince committed groſſer faults, or was more impoſed upon than himſelf, eſpecially in the firſt years of his Reign.

Wolſey riſes at Court.

Whilſt Henry was wholly addicted to his pleaſures, there was a Perſon gradually riſing at Court, who was one day to have an abſolute power over him, and to manage all his affairs as well foreign as domeſtick. I mean Thomas Wolſey, who was made the King's Almoner laſt year, and in the beginning of this Dean of Lincoln (4). It appears in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that on the 30th of January the King gave him a Houſe in London (5) formerly Empſon's, no inconſiderable preſent, ſince the Patent mentions thirteen Gardens belonging thereto. We muſt now return to the affairs of Italy, which will afford us farther matter for ſeveral years.

Act. Pub. XIII. p. 267, 269.

The Pope's Deſigns.

Julius II had two grand deſigns in his head. The firſt was to ſeize the Duchy of Ferrara; the ſecond to expel the French and Germans out of Italy. His Forces alone not being capable to execute theſe projects, it was neceſſary to uſe the aſſiſtance of ſome other Princes, and try to ingage them in his deſigns. His ſcheme was to league with the Venetians; to take off Ferdinand and Maximilian from the intereſts of France; to break the League of Cambray; to perſwade the King of England to make a diverſion in France; to excite the Switzers to invade the Duchy of Milan. He executed all theſe projects, but not without encountering ſuch difficulties as would have diſcouraged any Man leſs reſolute than himſelf. Firſt, he made a private League with the Venetians, after which, he ſolemnly gave them Abſolution the 24th of January. Then, he ſecretly agreed with Ferdinand by promiſing him the Inveſtiture of Naples. That done, he quarrelled with Lewis XII, by filling a Biſhoprick in Provence, with-

He had alſo the Art of attaching ſo effectually thoſe to his Intereſts, in whoſe Company the King did moſt delight, that they were always ready to forward his Views. Being of a gay, facetious, and open Temper, he would divert himſelf with them in ſuch Exerciſes (ſays Polydore Virgil) as were moſt agreeable to the Levity and Paſſions of Youth, and which did not perfectly ſuit with the Character of a Dean in the Church. and with the Duke of Ferrara. Sardi. Mezerai.

His League with the Venetians being publickly known, he imperiouſly commanded the Duke of Ferrara to renounce the League of Cambray, and join his Arms with thoſe of the Church. The Duke not believing, his being Vaſſal to the Holy See obliged him to be thus blindly devoted to the Pope's humours, refuſed to break his Alliance with France, and ſo gave his Holineſs the pretence he had long been ſeeking. When the Duke offered to pay him the Tribute due to the Church for the Fief of Ferrara, the Pope refuſed it, plainly intimating by that refuſal, he intended to confiſcate the Duchy.

Ferdinand acts underhand to gain Henry. Herbert.

Mean while, Ferdinand was privately acting with Henry VIII his Son-in-law, to draw him into the Pope's intereſt, which was become his own, in conſequence of the Projects they had formed in common. But his practices were ſo ſecret, that Lewis XII never miſtruſted him. On the contrary, he entirely confided in the aſſurances given him by his Ambaſſador, that his deſign was to continue firmly attached to the League of Cambray.

The Pope ſets the Switzers at variance with France. Guicciard. Mezerai.

On the other hand, Julius II gained the Biſhop of Sion (1), who having great credit among the Switzers found means to ſet them at variance with France, by perſuading them to demand an augmentation of their penſions. Their Alliance with that Crown being about to expire, they required to renew it, that their penſions might be increaſed. Lewis refuſing it, the Biſhop of Sion effectually uſed that refuſal to ſtir them up againſt France, to which the King himſelf alſo contributed by making an Alliance with the Griſons. He thereby ſo provoked the Switzers, that in a Diet at Lucern they declared for the Pope, and reſolved to ſend an Army into the Duchy of Milan.

He tries to reconcile the Venetians to the Emperor. Guicciard. Mezerai.

In fine, the Pope forgot nothing that he thought capable of perſuading the Venetians to agree with the Emperor at any rate, even to the adviſing them to deliver him Treviſo and Padua. He intimated to them, that the moſt effectual means to drive the French out of the Milaneſe, was to diſengage the Emperor from their intereſts; and when once they were out of Italy, it would be eaſy to wreſt from the Emperor not only Treviſo and Padua, but all his other Conqueſts too. But the Venetians durſt not run ſuch a hazard.

Lewis XII begins to ſuſpect the Pope. Mezerai. Guicciard.

Such were the vaſt projects of the Pope. He was ſo private in his Negotiations, that Lewis XII imagining he had no other deſign than to ſeize Ferrara, contented himſelf with ordering Chaumont, Governor of Milan, to aid the Duke in caſe he was attacked. But ſhortly after, a Venetian Fleet, and Papal Army commanded by Fabricius Colonna attempting, though unſucceſsfully, to ſurprize Genoa, Lewis had but too much reaſon to ſuſpect, there was ſome grand deſign formed againſt him; and therefore, ſent Chaumont orders to have an eye to the Pope's proceedings.

Julius II is like to be ſurprized at Bologna.

Theſe orders came to Milan very ſeaſonably. Julius II really intended to beſiege Ferrara, and for that purpoſe was come to Bologna, till an Army, prepared on ſome pretence by Raymond of Cardona at Naples was ready to join his and the Venetian Troops. But Chaumont did not allow him time to execute his projects. Hearing the Pope was arrived at Bologna, he departed from Milan at the head of an Army, and made ſuch ſpeed that he would have ſurprized the Pope there, had he not ſuffered himſelf to be amuſed with parleys. Whilſt he was treating with the Pope's Envoys, ſome Venetian Troops in the Neighbourhood entering the City, ſecured it from the danger of being inſulted. Whereupon Chaumont, being wholly unprepared for ſo important a Siege was obliged to retire.

He excommunicates the French Generals, and tries to ſurprize Genoa. Bizarro. Mezerai.

Julius II made great noiſe at this inſult of the French, and filled all Europe, and particularly the Court of England, with his clamours. He excommunicated all the Generals of the French Army, and preſently after, his and the Venetian Gallies made a ſecond attempt upon Genoa, but with no better ſucceſs than before.

The Switzers cannot enter the Milaneſe.

At the ſame time, twelve thouſand Switzers began their march in order to enter the Milaneſe, under the conduct of the Biſhop of Sion. But he found the paſſages ſo well guarded, that they deſpaired of ſucceeding in their deſign. So, not receiving beſides from the Pope the Money promiſed them, they returned into their own Country.

Lewis XII joins in a League with the Emperor.

War being thus proclaimed between Lewis XII and the Pope, Lewis thought himſelf under no farther reſtraint. He had done his utmoſt to be reconciled with him, even to the offering to abandon the Duke of Ferrara. But the Pope, depending upon Ferdinand, and expecting great aſſiſtance from England, had evaded all his propoſals. Wherefore, to ſtop the fury of this impetuous old Man, Lewis made a new League with the Emperor, promiſing to put him in poſſeſſion of all Italy, except Genoa and Florence. Maximilian had the good fortune, that in all his Leagues he had ever great advantages, though he contributed the leaſt. On this occaſion, Lewis XII could hardly proceed without him, becauſe it was abſolutely neceſſary to continue the War in the State of Venice, otherwiſe the Venetians would have been able to give the Pope too great an aſſiſtance. The League being concluded at Blois in Auguſt, Lewis called a Synod at Tours, to conſult how he ought to behave to the Pope. The Synod were of opinion, that the King ſhould once more offer the Pope a reaſonable agreement; and in caſe of refuſal, might with a ſafe conſcience wage even an offenſive War with him. Lewis wanted no more to juſtify his intended proceedings. Preſently after, he concluded with Maximilian a new Treaty, whereby they agreed to cauſe a General Council to be ſummoned to Piſa, to depoſe Julius II. To that end, they gained nine Cardinals, who readily undertook to call the Council in their own name. Some of theſe Cardinals were now with the Pope, but found means to leave him under divers pretences; and, when he would have recalled them, refuſed to obey.

Treaty with Maximilian to ſummon a Council at Piſa. Guicciard. Mezerai.

Such was the ſituation of the affairs of Italy during the year 1510. I have ſaid nothing of the events of the War which continued all this while between the Emperor, aſſiſted by the French King, and the Venetians, becauſe theſe particulars are of little ſervice to this Hiſtory. It will ſuffice to obſerve, that Chaumont ſeeing Genoa and Milan in danger, had withdrawn the French Troops from the Emperor's Army to keep them at Milan. The departure of theſe Troops gave the Venetians ſome reſpite, who thereby were enabled to repair ſome loſſes ſuſtained in the beginning of the Campain, and to aſſiſt the Pope who ſtill deſigned to beſiege Ferrara.

Chaumont retires to Milan.

Chaumont's attempt to ſurprize the Pope in Bologna, afforded Raymond of Cardona, Viceroy of Naples, a pretence to march to the relief of his Holineſs. The Pope's Troops and the Venetians were, in December, joined by the Spaniſh Army near Modena, which Fabricius Colonna had taken in his return from his Genoa expedition. Though the ſeaſon was not very proper to enter upon action, the Pope was abſolutely bent to beſiege Mirandola. This Town belonged to the Heirs of Joannes Picus of Miranda, with whom he had no quarrel. But as it lay convenient to favour the Siege of Ferrara, he would not leave it in his rear, but ordered it to be vigorouſly attacked. In ſpite of his age, and the rigour of the Seaſon, he came himſelf to the Siege, to animate the Troops by his preſence; and the Town ſurrendring at laſt on the 20th of January, was pleaſed to enter through the breach.

Siege of Mirandola. Guicciard.

Lewis XII complained to Ferdinand of his aſſiſting the Pope. But Ferdinand calling that a trifle, replied, that as Vaſſal of the Holy See he could not help defending his Holineſs's Perſon and State: That beſides, he was not concerned in the quarrels of the Pope and the King of France, but his intention was to keep to the Articles of the League of Cambray.

Hitherto Henry does not ſeem to be concerned with the affairs of Italy, though the Pope, Ferdinand and the Venetians had formed a deſign to ingage him therein. He peaceably led a life of pleaſure, without much regarding what paſſed abroad. On the 1ſt of January 1511, he had the ſatisfaction to ſee his Queen delivered of a Prince, at whoſe birth there was great rejoicing over all the Kingdom. But the joy laſted not long, ſince the young Prince died before the end of February (2).

Mean while, Ferdinand was ſeeking means to engage Henry in the League he intended to make with the Pope againſt France. Henry was rich and powerful, and conſequently his junction to the League would be of great weight, and extremely incommode France. On the other hand, his youth and ſmall experience made his Father-in-law hope, it would not be impracticable to ingage him by degrees, and inſenſibly, into projects which a King of England ought not to concern himſelf with. It is certain, Ferdinand was now in agreement with the Pope. All his proceedings, and the ſeveral circumſtances of Hiſtory, render it ſo evident that it cannot be doubted. However, he uſed a profound diſſimulation in this reſpect. He feigned to intend only the peace of Europe, that all the Princes of Chriſtendom might join together in

But as he wanted an Army and Fleet to execute his deſigns, he pretended to have very much at heart the continuance of the War he had undertaken againſt the Moors. He had ſent laſt year upon the Coaſts of Africa, a Fleet commanded by Peter of Navarre. Shortly after, he reinforced it with ſome Troops under the conduct of a Son of the Duke of Alva, who attempting to land at Gelves, was ſlain, and all his Men cut in pieces. Ferdinand made uſe of this ill ſucceſs to cover his preparations againſt France. Under colour of being revenged on the Moors, he aſſembled an Army, and equipped a Fleet, which he pretended to ſend into Africa, but was however deſigned for Italy. As it was not yet time to diſcover his intentions, he carried his diſſimulation ſo far, as to demand of the King his Son-in-law a thouſand Engliſh Archers to ſerve in this pretended expedition. Weak aid! to be ſent for ſo far and at ſo great charge, if he had really intended to uſe them. Henry, not perceiving his deſigns, readily complied with his requeſt, and appointed Sir Thomas Darcy, on whom, at the ſame time, he conferred the title of Baron (1), to command that ſmall body (2). We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, Ferdinand's Letter of thanks to Henry (3) for this aid, and for his advice not to hazard his Perſon in the undertaking: Advice, continued he, that he could not follow, becauſe Religion was concerned. And yet, it ſoon appeared, he had never intended any ſuch thing, ſince he employed againſt France the very Forces which ſeemed to be deſigned againſt the Moors (4).

They try to get Henry into the League againſt France.

Nothing more was wanting to conclude the projected League againſt Lewis XII, but to gain the King of England. This was ſtrenuouſly endeavoured during the beginning of the Year 1511. The Venetians ſent him an Ambaſſador, under colour of thanking him for his care to reconcile them to the Pope, deſiring him withal, in their Credentials dated the 2d of March, to give credit to what their Ambaſſador ſhould impart to him, which could relate only to the intended League. About the ſame time it was, that the Pope conferred the Dignity of Cardinal upon Chriſtopher Bambridge Archbiſhop of York, and Ambaſſador at Rome, in a Promotion the 11th of March at Ravenna. All the Hiſtorians unanimouſly affirm, Bambridge was made Cardinal, purely for labouring to ſet Henry at variance with France. Matthew Skinner Biſhop of Sion, was promoted to the ſame honour for his paſt and future Services of the like nature. In thoſe days, it was neither Learning nor Virtue that raiſed Clergymen to the Cardinalate, but ſolely their Abilities in temporal Affairs, joined to an entire Submiſſion to the Pope.

Henry engages with the Allies.

The endeavours that were uſed to engage Henry in the Italian League, had at length the expected Succeſs. In all appearance, it was repreſented to him, that he was highly concerned to oppoſe the progreſs of the King of France, who was already become too powerful by the Conqueſt of the Duchy of Milan, and the ruin of the Venetians. However this be, it appears that about the middle of the year, Henry was now determined to follow the Suggeſtions of the Pope and Ferdinand. For in June he appointed Commiſſioners, to take care that the Militia of the Kingdom were provided with good Arms, and ready to ſerve upon the firſt notice, which it was cuſtomary to order only when a war was foreſeen. The reaſon alledged by the King for theſe orders, plainly ſhew what was his deſign. He ſaid, though the Kingdom was in perfect Tranquillity, nevertheleſs, as the Arms were commonly ſuffered to ruſt in time of Peace, he wiſhed that his Subjects would be in a readineſs to ſerve him, as well againſt Invaſions, if any were intended, as in defence of his Allies. Theſe laſt words could reſpect only the Pope, the King of Arragon, and the Venetians; from whence it may be inferred, that the King had now given his word. But the Sequel will ſhew it ſtill more clearly.

He guards againſt Scotland.

The antient and ſtrict Union between France and Scotland, gave Henry juſt cauſe to fear, that as ſoon as the war with France was begun, the King of Scotland, as Ally of Lewis XII, would interpoſe in the quarrel. And therefore, to remove all pretence of rupture, he took care to appoint Commiſſioners (5) with power, to repair all the outrages committed ſince the late Peace. But his precautions proved ineffectual. An accident this year, afforded the King of Scotland afterwards that pretence of Breach which Henry would have prevented. 1511. Ib. p. 301.

Andrew Breton, a Scotch Merchant, complaining to the King of Scotland, that the Portugueſe had killed his Father, and ſeized his Ship, the King gave him Letters of Mart, after having in vain ſought redreſs from the Court of Portugal. Whereupon, Breton equipped two ſtout Ships, and found means to make himſelf ample amends for his loſſes, by falling upon all the Portugal Ships trading to Flanders and England. The Portugal Ambaſſador reſiding at London, complained to the Council, and repreſented, that ſince the King of England pretended to the Sovereignty of the narrow Seas, it was but reaſonable he ſhould protect the foreign Ships that came into the Channel. Upon this Complaint, the King equipped two large Men of War, and appointed the two Sons of the Earl of Surrey (6) to command them, with orders to take the Scotch Pyrate. Theſe two Lords watched him ſo narrowly, that they met with him at laſt, as he was returning from Flanders to Scotland. Breton fought deſperately, but was killed in the fight, and his two Ships taken and brought into England (7). The King of Scotland hearing of this, ſent and demanded the two Ships, with ſpeedy reparation of the outrage committed againſt the Peace. The Ambaſſadors were told, that Pyrates were not included in the Peace, and that to puniſh ſuch people according to their deſerts was no breach of Treaty. Probably, Breton had made himſelf more than amends for the damage he had ſuſtained, as it too frequently happens on ſuch occaſions. But however King James not being able to obtain any thing from the Court of England, proteſted againſt the Injuſtice, being determined to reſent it the firſt opportunity.

I left Julius II, after the taking of Mirandola, bent upon the Siege of Ferrara, and only waiting the return of good Weather. Though Lewis XII was in good meaſure ignorant of what paſſed in Spain and England, he knew however enough not to doubt that the Pope was endeavouring to raiſe him enemies on all ſides. He was even ſatisfied, that though he ſeemed to have no other deſign than to become maſter of Ferrara, yet that was only the firſt Step to ſome greater project. Mean while, he was very much embarraſſed. He had properly nothing to gain upon the Pope, unleſs he would ſeize the Church's Patrimony. But he had a great deal to loſe, beſides the troubles which the obſtinate and haughty Temper of the Pope might create him. Wherefore he reſolved to try all poſſible ways to be reconciled with him. To that end, whilſt the Pope was employed in the Siege of Mirandola, he made him ſome overtures by Chaumont; but it was to no purpoſe. The Pope would hearken to nothing, and continued the Siege till he forced the Town to capitulate. At laſt, Lewis ſeeing there was no hopes of a reconciliation, ordered Chaumont to regard him no longer, and at any rate ſupport the Duke of Ferrara. Chaumont receiving theſe orders, takes the Field in the midſt of winter. His army, joined by the Duke of Ferrara, was not ſo numerous as the Forces of the Pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians; but compoſed of ſo good Troops, that the Allies durſt never hazard a Battle, though it was offered them more than once. Mean while, the Pope was greatly embarraſſed. Inſtead of quietly preparing for the Siege of Ferrara, he was forced to keep the Field during the winter, without knowing even how to ſave Modena, which was in danger of a Siege. Ferdinand, who foreſaw what trouble that place would give the Pope, had adviſed him to reſign it to the Emperor. Nay, that affair had been negotiated, but without Succeſs, becauſe Maximilian would receive it only as a place held of the Empire, to which the Pope would not conſent. At laſt, upon Chaumont's approach to beſiege it, the Pope was willing to deliver it as the Emperor deſired, becauſe it was not to be ſaved without venturing a Battle. The Terms of this bargain are not preciſely known.

1511. But from thenceforward all the Emperor's proceedings gave occaſion to ſuſpect, Modena was acquired upon Conditions very prejudicial to the King of France his Ally.

Ferdinand's Diſſimulation

The King of Arragon pretended to be in Alliance with France. He would not declare againſt her till he had ſecured the King of England, with whom he was privately negotiating a Treaty which required a long diſcuſſion. Indeed, his Troops which were to ſerve the Pope but three months, according to the terms of the Inveſtiture of Naples, were ſtill joined with thoſe of the Allies. But he pretended, the Viceroy of Naples acted contrary to his orders, in remaining in the Pope's army longer than he was commanded. Mean while, the Army was preſſed by Chaumont and the Duke of Ferrara, who followed them cloſe, and endeavoured to provoke them to a Battle. So, to gain time, Ferdinand, who would ſtill paſs for a neutral Prince, and well affected to the repoſe of Italy, propoſed a Congreſs at Mantua for a Peace. The Pope immediately accepted the overture. The Emperor agreed to it likewiſe, and Lewis XII durſt not reject it, leſt he ſhould be charged with being the ſole Author of the troubles of Italy. It is certain, if, at this juncture, inſtead of ſuffering himſelf to be amuſed by a Negotiation, the ſole aim whereof was to rob him of the opportunity of puſhing his enemies, he had ordered his Troops to advance, he would have over-run the whole Eccleſiaſtical State; with ſo great a Terror had his arms inſpired the Allies. But he had to manage his Subjects as well as his Queen, who conſidered a war with the head of the Church as a Crime, though there was but too much provocation. He had himſelf likewiſe ſcruples upon that account, which he could not eaſily ſurmount. But however, he was willing to try once more, whether the propoſed Congreſs of Mantua would produce ſome good effect. He hoped at leaſt, that the breaking off the Negotiation, in caſe it was not ſucceſsful, would fully juſtify him. The Congreſs produced the effect expected by the Allies, that is, it cauſed the French to loſe a great deal of time to no purpoſe.

Congreſs of Mantua ineffectual. Guicciard.

The Emperor ſides privately with the Pope. Guicciard.

A few days before the Congreſs of Mantua, the Biſhop of Gurck, who was to be there from the Emperor, had a Conference at Bologna with the Pope, after which they pretended to part in great diſcontent. But what followed plainly ſhewed the contrary, ſince the Emperor never after did any thing agreeable to his Alliance with Lewis XII. He conſented however, that the Council of Piſa ſhould be called in his name, and the Summons ſet up at Modena, and ſeveral other places belonging to him, becauſe it was not yet time to declare himſelf. The Summons ran, That Julius II having refuſed to call a Council, purſuant to the Decree of Conſtance, the Cardinals were empowered by the ſame Decree to ſummon a Council in their own name. And therefore with the conſent of the Emperor and the King of France, they ordered the Council to meet on the 1ſt of September, in the City of Piſa, to endeavour the Reformation of the Church, in the Head and Members.

A Council ſummoned to Piſa in the Emperor's and French King's Name.

Lewis ſuſpects the Emperor and King of Arragon.

The Biſhop of Gurck's Conference with the Pope, and the breaking up of the Congreſs of Mantua, made the King of France greatly ſuſpect the Emperor. On the other hand, he could not help fearing the King of Arragon, knowing by experience what was to be expected from him. He ſaw him making great preparations under colour of the African War, and knew withal, that notwithſtanding his daily aſſurances that he would not concern himſelf with the troubles of Italy, he was uſing his utmoſt endeavours to procure a Peace between the Emperor and the Venetians. That is, properly ſpeaking, he was labouring to diſengage Maximilian from the Intereſt of France. In ſhort, Ferdinand ſent him brotherly Admonitions to make his Peace with the Pope, and not draw on himſelf the juſt reproach of waging an unnatural war with the common Father of Chriſtians. Lewis could not but conſider theſe Remonſtrances as a ſort of Proteſtation to aſſiſt the Pope in caſe of need. At the ſame time, he could not believe he would ingage in ſuch an undertaking without being ſecure of the Emperor. Theſe things made him uneaſy, and apprehenſive that he ſhould at laſt be the dupe of the Pope, the Emperor, and Ferdinand. So, for fear of being prevented, he gave expreſs orders to Triulzi, who commanded his army in the room of Chaumont lately deceaſed, to take all the advantages of the Allies that lay in his power.

He orders Triulzi to puſh the War vigorouſly. Guicciard. Mezerai.

Triulzi upon this order aſſaulted and took Concordia in the beginning of May, at the time the calling of the Council of Piſa was every where poſted up. Then he endeavoured by ſeveral marches to oblige the Allies to a Battle, without being able to ſucceed. At laſt, he reſolved to approach Bologna; not that he believed himſelf in condition to beſiege the City, but to draw the Allies from their advantagious Poſts, and give the Bolonnois opportunity to riſe in favour of the Bentivoglio's whom he brought with him. The Pope had now done his utmoſt to perſuade the Generals of the Allies to hazard a Battle, without being able to prevail, ſo much did they dread ingaging with the French. Wherefore, knowing how the army ſtood diſpoſed, and diſtruſting the Bolonnois, who loved him not, he retired to Ravenna, leaving in Bologna the Cardinal of Pavia his prime Miniſter. He was no ſooner gone, but a Tumult aroſe in the City, during which the Inhabitants called in their old maſters the Bentivoglio's, and put them in poſſeſſion of the Government. The Cardinal of Pavia had taken to flight the moment he perceived their reſolution. On the other hand, the army of the Allies advancing to one of the gates of Bologna, and hearing the Bentivoglio's were admitted, and the Legate withdrawn, ran away in confuſion, leaving in the Camp their Artillery, Baggage, and Ammunition. Whereupon the Inhabitants ſallying out, and joining with the Peaſants, completely ſtripped the ſcattered army, and rendered it entirely unſerviceable for ſeveral months. The Duke of Ferrara improving this opportunity, very eaſily recovered the places lately taken from him by the Allies.

The Army of the Allies takes to flight of their own accord.

The Cardinal of Pavia ſtabbed by the Duke of Urbino. Guicciard.

Amidſt all theſe mortifications, the Pope ſtill met with another which ſenſibly touched him. The Cardinal of Pavia was ſtabbed by the Duke of Urbino, who taxed him with being the cauſe of the loſs of Bologna. The Pope's concern was the greater as he durſt not puniſh, in the perſon of his Nephew, a Crime he would have thought worthy of the ſevereſt treatment, had it been committed by any other hand. His army being diſperſed, and his deſigns upon Ferrara vaniſhed, he quitted Ravenna and retired to Rome. In his way, he had the frequent mortification to ſee the Papers poſted up for the calling of the Council of Piſa, wherein he was himſelf ſummoned to appear in perſon.

The Pope retires to Rome.

Lewis orders his army to retire to Milan. Guicciard.

It was univerſally expected that Lewis XII would purſue his Succeſſes, and certainly in the then ſituation of Italy, it was his own fault that he was not maſter of Rome. The Pope had no remedy ſpeedy enough to free himſelf from his ſad condition. The King of Arragon was too remote. The Venetians were unable to lend him a ſufficient aſſiſtance, and the Emperor was not powerful enough to ſave him, had he been willing to attempt it. Genoa, Bologna, Florence, Milan, were in the hands of his enemies. But Lewis, either through ſcruple, or ſome other motive, inſtead of puſhing his point, ordered Triulzi to retire to Milan with the army, and even disband part of the Troops. Probably, he was willing to deprive the Pope of the pretence of exciting all Chriſtendom againſt him, and publiſhing, that he intended to ſeize Rome and all Italy. He was very juſtly apprehenſive of this from the Pope, ſince it was in effect the foundation, or rather the pretence of the League formed ſome months after againſt France. Triulzi was no ſooner at Milan, but Ferdinand's Fleet arrived at Naples, with about three thouſand Men, who were ſoon to be followed by a more conſiderable Body.

Julius II offers to agree with Lewis XII.

It was not difficult to perceive, that the King of Arragon had ſent his Fleet to Naples to ſupport the Pope's Intereſts, and give jealouſy to the King of France. Julius II, who was better informed than any man, revived at the news, and the rather, as he well judged that Ferdinand would not have been altogether aſſured of the King of England. Since the loſs of Bologna, and the rout of his army, he had ſeemed willing to conſent to an agreement with France, and though he had made overtures more like a Conqueror than one conquered, Lewis had accepted them on condition they were approved by the Emperor. But when the Pope found, the Spaniſh Fleet was at Naples, and Ferdinand began to declare himſelf, he added new Terms to thoſe he had already propoſed, and plainly ſhewed he was no longer for Peace. This Conduct put Lewis XII beyond all patience. So, deſpairing to agree with ſo obſtinate an enemy, he ordered Triulzi to ſend Supplies to Bentivoglio to guard Bologna, and ſome time after, took Bologna and the Bentivoglio's under his protection. On the other hand, though he was not obliged to aſſiſt the Emperor, unleſs he came into Italy in perſon, he added however to the German Troops in the State of Venice a ſtrong re-inforcement commanded by la Paliſſe. Mean while, the Pope having certain advice of the good Inclination of the Kings of Arragon and England in his favour, reſolved to ſummon a General Council in oppoſition to that of Piſa. To that end, he publiſhed a Bull, wherein, having firſt excuſed the neglect the Schiſmatic Cardinals laid to his charge, and inveighed againſt their Inſolence, he called a Council to be held at the Lateran in Rome, the 19th of April 1512.

The Pope calls a Council at the Lateran Church. Guicciard.

1511. consent. But he had not yet appointed Ambaſſadors, neither was it known that any German Biſhop was preparing to go thither. Moreover, he had promiſed to command in perſon in Italy, and lead thither a ſtrong reinforcement. But he remained immoveable. And yet, he continued at Inſpruck, without ſhewing any thoughts either of the Council of Piſa, or the War with Italy. Mean while, the Conqueſts that were expected to be made upon the Venetians were to be all his. Thus, in the preſent poſture of the affairs of Italy, Lewis XII ſaw the burden of the war laid upon him alone, without his daring almoſt to complain to the Emperor, for fear he ſhould join with his enemies. And indeed, Maximilian was ſtrongly ſollicited by the Pope, the King of Arragon, and the Venetians themſelves, who offered him a good Sum to induce him to deſiſt from his pretenſions to their Dominions. Very probably, he was yet unreſolved, and knowing the League that was forming againſt France, was willing, according to Cuſtom, to let the two Parties proceed, in order to take afterwards that Side which beſt ſuited with his Intereſt. This doubtleſs was the reaſon of his preſerving a good underſtanding with Lewis XII, in conſenting to the calling of the Council of Piſa, and withal, of reſerving a means to be reconciled to the Pope, in ſending neither Biſhops nor Ambaſſadors to the Council. Thus remaining almoſt equally ſuſpected by both Parties, he waited till the Succeſs of the War, or the offers from both Sides, ſhould engage him to declare for one or other.

Uncertainty of the affairs of Italy.

Mean while, affairs continued ſtill in the ſame ſituation. The Pope and the Venetians were alone in open War with France. The Emperor ſeemed to float between both ſides. The King of Arragon had hitherto done nothing more than afforded hopes that he would join the League when concluded. But it was not ſo yet, every one fearing to engage in it unſeaſonably. Julius II and Ferdinand knew one another too well to confide in each other. Each ſtrove to make the other ſubſervient to his deſigns, and was afraid at the ſame time of being deceived. Ferdinand had ſtill in France an Ambaſſador, who endeavoured to perſuade the King, that the preparations in Spain concerned only the Moors. On the other hand, the Pope had not ſo quarrelled with Lewis XII, but that he had ſtill left him ſome hopes, and continued a ſort of Negotiation with him, by means of the Biſhop of Murray the Scotch Ambaſſador, who did the office of mediator. Ferdinand was afraid, in caſe the Pope made a ſeparate Peace with France, the Kingdom of Naples would be in danger. The Pope had no leſs reaſon to fear, that to ſecure the quiet poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Naples, Ferdinand would forſake the intereſts of the Church, and leave him expoſed to the mercy of the King of France. In that caſe, the Pope would have nothing to expect from England. Thus, affairs were come to that paſs, that it was neceſſary, either that each ſhould quickly make a ſeparate Treaty, or both jointly declare themſelves, not to remain in this ſtate of uncertainty. And therefore, Ferdinand began at laſt to pull off the mask a little more, by ſending to Naples, the Troops he pretended to deſign for Africa, in order to hinder the Pope from thinking of a ſeparate agreement with France.

Opening of the Council of Piſa. Guicciard.

Whilſt the Pope and the King of Arragon were thus ſounding each other, the Cardinals, who had ſummoned the Council to Piſa and were come to Milan, thought fit to open it by Commiſſioners. But this was only for form's ſake, to keep to the day appointed. Never was General Council ſo thin. The Biſhops of France were not yet arrived, and there was no likelihood of any from Germany. The Pope was enraged when he heard the Council was opened at Piſa. In his paſſion with the Florentines, for ſuffering the Council to meet in one of their Towns, he excommunicated them as well as the Piſans, and put both the Cities under an Interdict. But the Florentines forced the Prieſts to celebrate Divine Service, leaving to private Perſons the liberty to obſerve or reject the Interdict.

Henry promiſes to enter into the League. Herbert. Pol. Virg.

It was difficult for Julius II and Ferdinand, to continue long in their preſent ſituation, without cauſing mutual ſuſpicions, capable of changing the face of affairs. The reaſon which had hitherto with-held Ferdinand, namely, his uncertainty with reſpect to the King of England, was now vaniſhed. Henry, after long ſuſpenſe, had at laſt poſitively promiſed to enter into the League againſt France. Whereupon the Negotiation of the League advanced more in one month than in a whole year before. It was a conſtant rule with Ferdinand, to cover all his deſigns with the cloke of Religion, little caring, that after the execution, his artifices were diſcovered. The Fleet and Army he had prepared in Spain, had for pretence, a War with the Infidels. When he was going to declare openly againſt France, he failed not to uſe the pretence of protecting the Church againſt the outrages of Lewis. As ſoon as he had gained the King of England, they jointly ſent Ambaſſadors to Lewis, to require him to leave the Pope unmoleſted, intimating, that as Chriſtian Princes they could not diſpenſe with protecting the Church, diſturbed by his ambition. Lewis ſaw plainly, that their meaſures being now taken, it would be too late to juſtify his conduct; and therefore, choſe to return a haughty anſwer, which was preciſely what his enemies wanted. 1511.

Henry's and Ferdinand's Embaſſy to Lewis XII.

Shortly after, on the 4th of October, the Pope, the King of Arragon, and the Venetians concluded a League at Rome, leaving a place for the King of England, who had ſhewn his deſire to be included. Indeed, Cardinal Bambridge was concerned in the Negotiation as Ambaſſador of England. But he was ordered not to ſign the Treaty, becauſe Henry expected to make a private one, more agreeable to the intereſts of England than that which concerned Italy only. By this Treaty the Pope promiſed to find for the ſervice of the League ſix hundred Men at Arms, five hundred Light Horſe, ſix thouſand Foot(1), and twenty thouſand Ducats a month. The Venetians were to furniſh eight hundred Men at Arms, a thouſand Light Horſe, eight thouſand Foot, and to pay monthly twenty thouſand Ducats. Ferdinand was to provide twelve hundred Men at Arms, a thouſand Light Horſe, ten thouſand Foot, and twenty thouſand Ducats a month. It is true, neither the King of France, nor the Duke of Ferrara, were named in the Treaty as enemies of the Allies. But it was eaſy to perceive it, ſince the intent of the League was to reſtore to the Pope the City of Bologna, and whatever belonged to the Holy See, and to make War upon all Perſons that ſhould offer to hinder it. A place was left for the Emperor in caſe he would enter into it; and Raymond of Cardona, Viceroy of Naples, was declared General of the League.

League againſt France concluded at Rome. Guicciard.

Articles of the League. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 747. Guicciard.

Whilſt the World was in expectation of the effect of this League, the Council of Piſa was ſolemnly opened in that City, by the Cardinals who had convened it, and ſome Biſhops of France and Milan. The firſt Seſſion was held the 4th of November, though the Pope had excommunicated the Cardinals, and deprived them of their dignity. The ſecond was held the 11th of the ſame month. But becauſe there was a commotion that day in the City, the Cardinals and Biſhops were ſo terrified, that on the morrow they removed the Council to Milan, where they expected to be more out of danger. Indeed, the Inhabitants of Piſa could not look with a good eye upon a Council, which expoſed them to an excommunication and interdict, though it was not in their power to oppoſe the orders of the Florentines their Sovereigns.

A more ſolemn opening of the Council of Piſa. Guicciard.

The Council removes to Milan.

I obſerved that the Switzers were at variance with Lewis XII, by the practices of the Cardinal of Sion, or rather of the Pope himſelf, who ſet him to work. Their firſt attempt to enter the Milaneſe proving unſucceſsful, they reſolved this year to levy ſixteen thouſand Men, the Cardinal of Sion having poſitively promiſed them Money at their entrance into Italy, and that the Army of the Allies would employ the French in la Romagna. As this levy could not be ready till the beginning of the Winter, they began their march in November, and penetrated as far as Vareſe. Gaſton de Foix, Nephew of Lewis XII, Governor of Milan, was ſo deſtitute of Troops, that he knew not how to oppoſe their paſſage. However, with the few Men he had, he took the Field, to annoy them and obſtruct their march. But it was not poſſible for him to hinder them from coming to the very Gates of Milan. The French had now begun to furniſh the Caſtle with Ammunition in order to quit the City, when ſuddenly the Switzers hearing no news of the Pope, nor the Army of the Allies which they thought to be aſſembled in la Romagna, retired to their own Country, after burning ſome Villages. If the Pope had not diſappointed them of the Money he had promiſed them, and if the Army of the Allies had acted in la Romagna, Milan, Bologna, and Ferrara, would have been in great danger, ſince the French were at that time very weak in thoſe parts. La Paliſſe was then in the Emperor's Army with a large detachment of the King's beſt Troops.

The Switzers march into the Milaneſe. Guicciard.

They retire ſuddenly.

Nothing could be more advantagious to England, than to ſee the Forces of France turned againſt Italy. The Conqueſt of the Duchy of Milan was leſs beneficial to Falſe Policy of Henry VIII to meddle with the Affairs of Italy.

(1) In the Treaty, as it ſtands in Rymer, it is only ſaid, that the Pope was to furniſh ſix hundred Men at Arms, without any mention of Light-Horſe and Foot: Neither is the number of Troops that was to be ſent by the Venetians ſpecified, but it is ſaid, they were to find a Fleet ſtrong enough to beat the Enemy's: And on the day of the Publication of the League, the Pope and the Venetians were to pay eighty thouſand Ducats of Gold for two months wages for their Forces. Fœd. Tom. XIII. p. 307. See Guicciardin, l. 10.

Lewis

1511. Lewis XII than to England. For it procured England a ſettled Tranquillity, whereas it expoſed France to perpetual troubles, and an immenſe expence. It was therefore policy in Henry to ſuffer the French, Germans, Italians, and Spaniards to battle it in Italy, without involving himſelf in a War which could never procure him any advantage. To the time I am ſpeaking of, the Kings of England had taken care not to meddle with the affairs of Italy, if we except Henry III, who being unfortunately deſirous of making his ſecond Son King of Sicily, ruined his own Kingdom to execute that extravagant project. But he was not a Prince to be imitated by his Succeſſors. The advantages of this policy were ſo manifeſt to all the Engliſh, that it required no leſs than a Ferdinand, the ableſt and moſt ſubtle Prince of his age, to make them ſwerve from it.

This Prince had joined with the Pope ever ſince the beginning of the year 1510, or perhaps the end of the foregoing, and yet had been near two years without declaring himſelf. This delay proceeded only from his deſire to ſecure England firſt, that Henry might make a diverſion in France, which would oblige Lewis XII to neglect the affairs of Italy. This diverſion muſt have been advantageous to the King of Arragon, ſince it would remove from Italy, or at leaſt, weaken, a very formidable rival. But it is hard to conceive wherein it could be ſerviceable to England. On the contrary, there ſeemed to be ſeveral very ſtrong reaſons to divert Henry from ſuch a deſign, without mentioning the Peace he had lately renewed with France, and confirmed by a ſolemn Oath. This probably was the cauſe of his ſo long deferring the concluſion of the League I ſhall ſpeak of hereafter. Indeed it was not poſſible, but that ſome of the King's Council were clear-ſighted enough to ſee that this League was no ways advantageous to England, what colour ſoever was given thereto.

Whilſt this Negotiation languiſhed in England, new occurrences put Ferdinand upon taking freſh meaſures, and contriving all ſorts of ways to ſucceed with Henry. Lewis XII perſiſted in his deſign to hold the Council of Piſa, as was ſaid, and that cauſed Julius II to convene another at the Lateran, and excommunicate by the ſame Bull all Princes and others who adhered to the firſt. Among theſe Princes, was John d'Albret King of Navarre, who being allied to Lewis XII, blindly followed the directions of the Court of France. The King of Navarre had no ſooner declared for the Council of Piſa, but Ferdinand upon that pretence, formed the deſign to ſeize his whole Kingdom, and make Henry his Son-in-law the inſtrument to execute it. To that end he gave Henry to underſtand, that a fair opportunity offered to recover Guienne, taken by France from one of his predeceſſors, ſince the League that was going to be concluded in Italy would find Lewis XII ſo much employment, that probably, he would not be able to defend his own Country. But as the diſtance of Guienne might deter Henry from attempting this Conqueſt, Ferdinand, out of affection, very willingly promiſed to ſupply him with Troops, Tranſport-Ships, Artillery, Proviſions, Ammunition, without ſtipulating any thing for himſelf, but the ſole pleaſure of procuring his Son-in-law ſo great an advantage. This offer opened the eyes of Henry and his Council (1). The acquiſition of Guienne ſeemed to them a thing ſo advantageous, and withal, ſo glorious in the beginning of this Reign, that the King, without any farther difficulty, entered into the League propoſed by the Pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians. Such was the real motive (2) that induced the Court of England to break the Peace lately renewed with France, without alledging other reaſon than the protection granted by Lewis to the Bentivoglio's, and the calling of the unlawful aſſembly of Piſa. As if England was concerned to help the Pope to Bologna, and oppoſe with Arms a Council, conſiſting of a ſcore of French Biſhops, without power and credit even in the very place where they were aſſembled. We ſhall ſee preſently, how Henry was the Dupe of his affectionate Father-in-law, and how Ferdinand politickly made uſe of him to ſerve his own ends, without giving himſelf the leaſt trouble about his Son-in-law's affairs.

When Ferdinand had gained Henry, he concluded at Rome, with the Pope and the Venetians, the fore-mentioned League. In this Treaty of Rome, it was expreſly ſaid, that all the Articles were negotiated and ſettled with the King of England's knowledge, the Cardinal of York acting for him, and daily expecting orders to ſign it; but that for certain reaſons the concluſion of it could be no longer delayed. 1511.

League between Henry and Ferdinand for the Conqueſt of Guienne. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 311. Nov. 17.

About ſix weeks after, Henry and Ferdinand concluded at London, a private League for the Conqueſt of Guienne (3). This was a conſequence of the firſt, on the ſuppoſition that the depriving the King of France of that Province was a good means to ſerve and protect the Church of God, the great and principal aim of the Allies. If ever God's holy name was openly and ſhamefully taken in vain, it is in the preambles of theſe two Treaties. In the firſt, the Pope proteſted that his ſole aim in deſiring Bologna, and the other States which belonged to the Church, was to reſtore Italy to her former Tranquillity, that all Chriſtians might join their Forces againſt the Infidels, as he had ever wiſhed, and ſtill did wiſh with all his heart. Thus, to make War upon the Infidels, it was neceſſary that Italy ſhould be free from troubles, which could not be hoped till the Pope had executed his ambitious projects, without which Italy was not to expect to enjoy any quiet.

False Motives of the League of Rome.

Articles of the League of London between Henry and Ferdinand.

In the ſecond Treaty, Henry and Ferdinand ſet forth, "That they had made Alliances with all Chriſtian Princes, ſolely to be enabled to wage War with the enemies of Chriſt; and for that purpoſe, were now imployed in preparing powerful Armies by Land and Sea; but that ſuddenly, when they leaſt expected it, they were told, the King of France's Troops were beſieging Bologna, where the Pope, old and infirm, lay ſeized with a grievous diſtemper, and attended by all his Cardinals: That being extremely afflicted at this news, they had beſought the King of France by Letters and Ambaſſadors, to give over his deſign: That the Pope had offered him the pardon of all his Sins, provided only he would abſtain from the patrimony of the Church, ceaſe to inflame the Schiſm, and adhere to the Council of Lateran: But that all this had been to no purpoſe. On the contrary, he had made himſelf maſter of Bologna, by the treachery of ſome of the Inhabitants; twice routed the Army of the Holy Church of Rome, and in contempt of the Holy See, called a Council, after having bribed ſome of the Cardinals. That ſince, the Pope had ſent a Legate to him to demand only that he would forbear to attack the Church. That the Legate not prevailing, the two Kings of England and Spain had ſent Ambaſſadors to adviſe him amicably to deſiſt from his attempts, and be reconciled with the Pope, or elſe they could do no leſs than undertake the protection of the Church; but that their advice had been ſlighted. That upon all theſe conſiderations, the two Kings perfectly knowing how detrimental ſuch an ambition might prove to the Catholick Faith, the Church of God, and the welfare of Chriſtendom, had thought proper to agree upon the following Articles, to the praiſe and glory of Almighty God, our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and the whole triumphant Court of Heaven, for the defence, exaltation, increaſe of the Catholick Faith, the Chriſtian Religion, the Holy Roman Church, which was unjuſtly oppreſſed, and upon the frequent inſtances, exhortations, and admonitions of the Pope, the head thereof." The ſubſtance of this pious Treaty was as follows:

I. The two Kings took upon them the defence and protection of the Holy Roman Church, againſt all Perſons that ſhould attack her (4).

II. Ferdinand, as Catholick King, and to diſcharge his duty to God and the Church, promiſed to take Arms in her defence in Italy.

In the IIId Article it was ſaid, that the Pope and the ſacred College of Cardinals had judged, that in order to deliver the Church from the oppreſſion ſhe groaned under, it was neceſſary to wage War upon the King of France, not only in Italy, but in ſuch of his Provinces alſo as bordered upon the two Allies. And therefore it was agreed, that they ſhould carry their Arms into Guienne, and conquer that Province for the Crown of England, and that Henry, in aſſiſting the Church, might at the ſame time recover what belonged to him. To that purpoſe, as ſoon as Ferdinand ſhould have actually declared againſt the Kingdom of France, and taken arms in defence of the Church, Henry, at a proper ſeaſon, ſhould proclaim war againſt the ſame Prince in defence of the ſame Church.

1511. To perform this Article, Henry promiſed to ſend into Guienne ſome time in April 1512, a body of ſix thouſand Foot (1) commanded by a good General; to maintain them at his own expence, and not recall them without the conſent of the King of Arragon. Ferdinand bound himſelf, on his part, to find five hundred Men at Arms, fifteen hundred Light-Horſe, and four thouſand Foot, on the ſame terms. Moreover, he ingaged to furniſh the Engliſh Troops with proviſions and ammunition at a moderate price. It was farther agreed, that each of the two Kings ſhould ſend a Fleet to Sea with three thouſand good Soldiers, for ſix months, beſides the Mariners, and that neither ſhould recall his Fleet without the other's conſent.

IV. That Ferdinand ſhould find forty Ships, at a reaſonable rate, to tranſport the Engliſh Forces.

V. That in caſe the Allies ſhould take any places in Guienne and elſewhere, they ſhould be delivered to him of the two Kings, who had a prior title to the ſame.

VI. That if either of the two Kings ſhould be attacked out of Guienne, they ſhould jointly take care of the defence of the Country of him who wanted aſſiſtance, ſincerely and with all their power.

VII. That the two Kings conſidering that the Pope had called at Rome a Council, which all Chriſtian Princes ought to obey, and ſend Ambaſſadors to, and it was affirmed that the King of France perſiſted in his deſign to continue the Council ſummoned to Piſa, they agreed to adhere to whatever ſhould be decreed by the Council of Lateran, and oppoſe that of Piſa, with all its Favorers and Adherents.

VIII. That neither of the two Kings ſhould make Peace or Truce without a mutual conſent.

IX. That by this, the former Treaties ſhould not be deemed void, but, on the contrary, remain in full force.

X. That it ſhould be ratified within four months, by Henry, and Ferdinand, in his own and the name of Queen Jane his Daughter.

Imprudence of Henry and his Council.

Henry and his Council thought, without doubt, they had made a very advantagious Treaty, ſince it was to procure them the Duchy of Guienne, and Ferdinand demanded nothing for himſelf, as if he had acted purely from a motive of Religion, and out of affection to his Son-in-law, though, in reality, he had conſulted only his own intereſt. As for the Pope's affairs, about which both Kings ſeemed to be ſo greatly concerned, it may be affirmed, they did not ſo much as think of them, as it afterwards appeared. But they wanted that pretence to dazzle the publick, though, in all appearance, the world was not ſo blind, as to imagine that two great Kings ſhould take arms on purpoſe to diſſolve a Council which called itſelf General, compoſed of a ſmall number of Biſhops, of one Nation only, and ſo little regarded, that even at Milan, where it was removed, the Government was forced to make uſe of their whole Authority to procure its reception.

Lewis's Suſpicions of the Emperor. Guicciard.

During theſe Tranſactions, the Emperor gave the King of France ſo much cauſe to ſuſpect his Sincerity, that neceſſity only obliged him to feign any further confidence in him. There was no German Biſhop come to the Council; and when the Emperor was preſſed upon that ſubject, he replied, It was neceſſary firſt to have the approbation of the Diet of the Empire, which he did not doubt of obtaining: That though he ſhould ſend Biſhops from his hereditary Dominions to Piſa, it would be more prejudicial than advantagious to the Council, ſince it would give occaſion to imagine, he deſpaired to obtain the Diet's conſent. On the other hand, inſtead of commanding in perſon his Army in the ſtate of Venice, as he had promiſed, he left all to the French Troops, who were come to his aid. In ſhort, whilſt he liſtened to the offers of the Pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians, he told the French Ambaſſador, he was ready to march to Rome at the head of an Army, provided his maſter would ſend him a ſtrong Re-inforcement, and a ſum of Money, proportionable to the greatneſs of the Undertaking. Amidſt theſe uncertainties, Lewis knew not what to truſt to. He could look upon Maximilian but as an ally ready to 1511. abandon him, if he found it more for his intereſt to join with his enemies. In that caſe, all the Emperor's conqueſts upon the Venetians would be ſo many loſſes to France. Mean while, the Supplies he lent him were very expenſive, and yet, he durſt not afford him a pretence to change ſides. Thus Lewis ſaw himſelf upon the point of being attacked by all the forces of the Pope, the King of Spain, and the Venetians, without any hope of aſſiſtance from the Emperor. As for England, though he was yet ignorant of the Treaty of London, and Henry's Ambaſſador poſitively denied that his Maſter intended to be concerned, all Henry's Proceedings were plain indications that he would ſoon declare againſt him. Lewis ſuſpects Henry.

The King of Arragon's Army joins the Pope and Venetians. Guicciard.

Mean while, the Pope, who had ever in view the taking of Bologna and Ferrara, was very preſſing with the Viceroy of Naples to advance with his Troops, and take the command of the confederate Army. But notwithſtanding all his ſollicitations, the Junction could not be till the middle of December, and even then, the Naples Artillery not being yet arrived, the Army could be only employed in ſome trifling Expeditions in la Romagna, with which ended the year 1511. It is time now to return to the affairs of England.

Hall. Herbert. Hollingſh.

Though Henry had not yet proclaimed war with France, Lewis XII knew what he was to expect. He had good intelligence by means of one Buonviſo a Merchant of Lucca, who being a Bankrupt, was retired into England, where he had obtained ſo much favour from the Pope as to be made a kind of Agent (2). This Man being corrupted by France, diſcovered to Lewis the ſecrets, the Pope was ſometimes forced to truſt him with; and hence it was that the Court of France was informed of many things which the Engliſh would have concealed from them. It was probably by this means that the King of France had the firſt notice of the League concluded at London, though it was made a great Secret. But ſhortly after, he had no more occaſion for ſpies to know Henry's Intentions. Lewis has notice of the League of London.

1512. The Parliament being met the fourth of February (3), the King communicated his deſign of making War upon France. He proteſted, his ſole aim was to free the Pope from the King of France's oppreſſion, and eſpecially to cauſe the Schiſmatical Council of Piſa, now removed to Milan, to be diſſolved. Though this War undertaken, as the King himſelf affirmed, ſolely to oblige the Pope, was little agreeable to the intereſt of England, the Parliament however gave the King a large Subſidy (4). In all appearance, the leading Members of the Houſe of Commons being informed of the true reaſons, ſo ordered it, that the reſt came into their opinion. Otherwiſe, it would have been difficult to make them perceive the neceſſity of England's ingaging in a War with France, to reſtore Bologna to the Pope, and diſſolve a Council ſo inconſiderable as that of Piſa. Before the Parliament broke up, the King was pleaſed to reſtore John Dudley, Son of Edmund Dudley, to the rank and honours his Family had been deprived of by the Father's Attainder. From that time, he had always an affection for him, and at length, towards the end of his Reign, made him Lord Admiral of England. Henry acquaints the Parliament with his deſign, and obtains an Aid of Money. Herbert. He made choice of Silveſter Biſhop of Worceſter, with Sir Robert Wingfield, and commiſſioned them to agree in his name to whatever ſhould be deemed neceſſary for the reformation of the Church, as well in the Head as in the Members. This Clauſe was only to caſt a miſt before People's eyes, ſince nothing certainly was farther from the Pope's thoughts, than to endeavour in this Council, either his own or the Church's reformation. Henry ſends Ambaſſadors to the Council of Lateran. Act. The Admiral having convoyed the Marquiſs of Dorſet to Spain, put to Sea again, and arriving on the Coaſt of Bretagne, landed ſome Troops, and plundered the Country (3). Henry hearing, the King of France was preparing a great naval Armament, ſent a reinforcement (4) to his Admiral, which enabled him to make head againſt the French. The two Fleets meeting the 10th of Auguſt, came to a furious engagement, which ended in great loſs on both ſides. The Regent, a firſt rate Ship (5), and the Cordeliere, commanded by Primauget (6), being grappled, were both blown up, with loſs of all their Men. This accident happened by the deſperate courage of Primauget, who finding he could not ſave his Ship, ſet fire to the powder (7).

Ferdinand's private deſign to conquer Navarre.

The Treaty of League concluded at London, ſeemed to be made only to pave the way for Henry to the Conqueſt of Guienne. But Ferdinand had never any ſuch thought. His ſole aim was to conquer Navarre for himſelf, and employ to that end the Engliſh Troops he had ſent for into Spain. But as it was by no means proper to inform Henry of ſuch a project, he had been obliged to allure him with the hopes of recovering Guienne, in order to induce him to ſend his Troops. This is the true reaſon why Ferdinand ſhewed in the Treaty ſo much diſintereſtedneſs, that all the advantage ſeemed to be on the ſide of England. But the performance was very far from anſwering the engagement.

The Marquiſs of Dorſet being arrived in Guipuſcoa, found a Commiſſioner of the King, who paid him great reſpect, and told him, the Duke d'Alva was taking the Field, in order to join him. And indeed, the Duke immediately put himſelf at the head of the Spaniſh Army. But inſtead of joining the Engliſh who were encamped near Fontarabia with deſign to beſiege with him the City of Bayonne, as was reſolved, he kept at Logrogno on the borders of Navarre. He intimated to the Engliſh General, that the King of Navarre being in Alliance with France, it would be very dangerous to attack Bayonne with Navarre behind them: That whilſt they ſhould be employed in the Siege, the King of Navarre might introduce the French into his Dominions, join with them, and by encamping between the Mountains of Navarre and the Sea, cut off the Proviſions which ſhould be brought to the Camp before Bayonne, without being obliged to give Battle, if he thought proper: That therefore it was neceſſary, before they engaged in the Siege, to try to gain the King of Navarre to the Intereſts of their maſters.

Theſe reaſons were ſo plauſible, that the Marquiſs of Dorſet was eaſily perſuaded to ſend an Engliſh Officer to the King of Navarre, to require him to join with the Allies. Ferdinand ſummoned him likewiſe, but more haughtily, to forſake the King of France, and come into the League (8). The King of Navarre replied, he was reſolved to ſtand neutral. But the Engliſh and Spaniards not being ſatisfied with this anſwer, jointly preſſed him to declare himſelf, or deliver four of his Towns for their Security, which that Prince would not grant. During theſe Negotiations, a French Army commanded by the Duke of Longueville, approached the Frontiers of Bearn. Whereupon the Marquiſs of Dorſet complained to Ferdinand, that the time loſt in ſolliciting the King of Navarre, had ſerved only to give the French opportunity to come and defend their Borders, and withal preſſed him to declare, whether he would attack Guienne, purſuant to the Treaty of London. Ferdinand anſwered, Prudence would not ſuffer him to ſend his army to Fontarabia to beſiege Bayonne, and leave his Dominions expoſed to the Invaſions of the French and Navarrois: That it was much more convenient to paſs through Navarre, and ſecure three or four places, in order to hinder his enemies from making uſe of that Kingdom againſt him: That therefore he wiſhed the Engliſh would join the Duke of Alva, and his army ſhould make the Vanguard; to be expoſed to the firſt dangers: That however the Siege of Bayonne would not be retarded, becauſe there was no queſtion, the King of Navarre would be glad to be ſomething preſſed, in order to juſtify himſelf to the King of France, when he ſhould enter into the League. The Marquiſs of Dorſet, who did not yet ſee into his deſigns, having held a Council of War, replied, That by his Inſtructions he could undertake nothing againſt the King of Navarre; but if the Duke of Alva would paſs thro' that Kingdom, he might if he pleaſed; but for his part, being already near Bayonne, he could not think of taking ſo great a compaſs to join him. 1512.

Ferdinand was not content with this anſwer. He ſtrongly inſiſted upon what he had propoſed, that the Engliſh Troops ſhould come and join his army, and in the mean while, gave orders to the Duke of Alva to beſiege Pampeluna, Metropolis of Navarre. During the Siege, he continually amuſed the Marquiſs of Dorſet with poſitive promiſes, that immediately after the taking of Pampeluna, the Duke of Alva ſhould join him to beſiege Bayonne. Mean while, the King of Navarre being unable to defend himſelf, was retired into France, where he made a Treaty with Lewis XII, for their common defence. But it coſt him the Town of Salvatierra, and all Bearn, which he was forced to deliver to the French.

The King of Navarre retires to France.

Pampeluna having ſurrendered by capitulation the 25th of July, Ferdinand, according to his promiſe, ſhould have ordered the Duke of Alva to join the Engliſh. But the reſt of the fortified Towns in Navarre ſerved him for pretence to delay the Junction. So the Duke of Alva continued his Conqueſts, whilſt the Engliſh Troops, tho' without ſtirring from their Camp, ſerved as a countenance to his deſigns. And indeed, though the French, who daily received freſh Supplies, ſaw themſelves ſufficiently ſtrong to withſtand the Duke of Alva, they never dared to enter Navarre, for fear of coming between the Engliſh and Spaniards. Wherefore, being contented to remain encamped between Bayonne and Salvatierra, they gave the Duke of Alva all the leiſure he wanted to ſubdue almoſt all Navarre.

Then it was that the Marquiſs of Dorſet plainly perceived the King of Arragon acted with inſincerity, and that his deſign from the very firſt was not to invade Guienne, but conquer Navarre. Ferdinand was very ſenſible, his Artifice would at laſt be diſcovered. So, to prevent the complaints the Engliſh General might make to the King his maſter, he ſends an Expreſs to England, to give Henry an account, after his manner, of the affairs of that Country, and to deſire him to order his General to act in concert with him. Henry, who had received nothing to the contrary from the Marquiſs, readily ſent Windſor Herald with the deſired orders to the General.

He has a mind to attack Bearn. Herbert.

Whilſt the Herald was on his journey, the Duke of Alva became maſter of St. Juan de Pie del Puerto. Preſently after the taking of that place, Ferdinand acquainted the Marquiſs of Dorſet, that his army was ready to march into Guienne, and deſired him to join the Duke of Alva without delay. But the Marquiſs was no longer willing to be deceived. He knew, the French army was intrenched between Bayonne and Salvatierra, with the River Bidaſſoa in Front, which muſt be paſſed within view, and beſides Bayonne was ſo well provided, that there was no likelihood of beſieging it. What Ferdinand therefore propoſed was impracticable, and only a continuation of his Artifices. From St. Juan de Pie del Puerto, the right-hand Road led into Bearn, and the left to Bayonne, ſo the Duke of Alva's intent was to engage the Engliſh to enter Bearn with him, under colour there was no other way to draw the enemies from their advantagious Poſt, or at leaſt, to beſiege Salvatierra. But the Engliſh General having no orders to make War upon the King of Navarre, either in Bearn or elſewhere, refuſed to join the Spaniards. Ferdinand reaped this advantage from his refuſal, that he caſt the whole blame upon him, of their not invading Guienne according to the Treaty. After that, the Duke of Alva turning back, laid Siege to Eſtella, the only place that remained to the King of Navarre.

But the army mutinying it was impoſſile to detain the Soldiers any longer in Spain, and the Embarkation being made, they arrived in England in November (2). Henry was at firſt very angry with his General; but being informed of all particulars during the Campain, plainly ſaw, Ferdinand had deceived him, and that his affected diſintereſtedneſs in the Treaty of League, was only to draw him more eaſily into the Snare. After Ferdinand was in poſſeſſion of Navarre, he ſought pretences to keep it, but found no better than a Bull of Pope Julius II, who excommunicated John d'Albret King of Navarre, and gave his Kingdom in prey to the Conqueror. Mezerai affirms, this Bull never appeared; but the Lord Herbert ſays, it was dated March 1. 1512.

Affairs of Italy. Guicciard. Bembo.

We muſt now ſee what paſſed in Italy whilſt Ferdinand was conquering Navarre. The confederate army of the Pope, the King of Arragon, and the Venetians, under the command of the Viceroy of Naples, taking the Field in December, the Pope cauſed the Viceroy to be continually preſſed by Cardinal John de Medici, his Legate, to beſiege Bologna. At length, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the Viceroy, and the Venetian General, who foreſaw great difficulties in the execution of that deſign, the Pope's Inſtances were to be complied with, and the Siege of Bologna being reſolved, the army of the Allies (3) appeared before the City. But Gaſton de Foix Duke of Nemours, and Governor of Milan, coming to its relief, compelled the Allies to raiſe the Siege. Some days after, he defeated a Venetian Army at Breſcia, and ſlew eight thouſand Men. At laſt, on the 11th of April, finding means to give the Allies battle near Ravenna, he put them to rout, and took the Legate priſoner; but was himſelf ſlain after the Battle, in too warmly purſuing a body of Spaniards, who were retreating in good order. After that Prince's death, la Paliſſe took the Command of the army, and the next day became maſter of Ravenna. Whereupon all the Towns of la Romagna, taken by the Pope after the Battle of Agnadel, voluntarily ſurrendered to the Cardinal of St. Severin, who was in the French Army as Legate of the Council of Piſa, transferred to Milan.

The Conſternation at Rome was ſo great, that the Cardinals went in a Body to petition the Pope to make Peace with France. But Julius II had reſſources unknown perhaps to the Cardinals. So, all they could obtain was to engage him to make ſome feigned advances, in order to gain time, and hinder the French from marching to Rome, as they might eaſily have done, without fear of meeting any obſtacle

Whilſt Lewis's affairs ſeemed to be in the moſt flouriſhing condition, they were in reality going to decay. The Switzers, encouraged by the Cardinal of Sion, preparing to exert their utmoſt to invade the Duchy of Milan, la Paliſſe thought it more proper for his Maſter's Intereſt, to relieve that Country which was deſtitute of Troops, than make Conqueſts in the Eccleſiaſtical State. So, leaving the Cardinal of St. Severin in la Romagna, with five or ſix thouſand Men, he haſtily marched into Milan. The retreat of the French, when it lay in their power to march to Rome, inſpired Julius II with freſh Courage. From thenceforward he would no more hear of Peace, though Lewis XII offered him the ſame Terms as before his Victory. At this Juncture it was that the Council of Lateran was opened the 3d of May, which had been delayed by reaſon of the battle of Ravenna.

uſed for pretence the captivity of his Legate, who was detained at Milan, where, tho' a priſoner, he performed however the Functions of the Pope's Legate, the Inhabitants of Milan refuſing to own the Authority of the Council held in their City. It was a great mortification to Lewis, to ſee his Council contemned by his own Subjects; but this was only a ſmall part of the misfortunes to which he was expoſed this ſame year. After la Paliſſe had quitted la Romagna, all the Towns of that Country ſubmitted to the Pope. At the ſame time, Ferdinand became maſter of Navarre, and Lewis was forced to ſend an army into Bearn to hinder the Engliſh and Spaniards from invading Guienne. On the other hand, the Emperor concluded a Truce with Venice, and ſecretly promiſed to withdraw from the French Army a body of German Troops, lent the King for the defence of the Milaneſe. And yet upon the aſſurance of this aid it was that Lewis recalled from Milan part of his own Troops, not doubting that with thoſe he left there, and the Germans ſent him by the Emperor, he ſhould be able to reſiſt his Enemies. Thus, the French finding themſelves weak in the Duchy of Milan, la Paliſſe was obliged to recall the Cardinal of St. Severin, with his Troops, which was the cauſe of the loſs of la Romagna.

The Emperor's Truce with the Venetians. Bembo.

Mean while, the Switzers, to the number of ſixteen thouſand, began their march about the end of Auguſt, or the beginning of September. But inſtead of taking the direct road to the Milaneſe, the paſſes whereof, they did not queſtion, were ſtrongly guarded, they marched to Trent, with Maximilian's permiſſion. Though this, if any, was an Enemy's act, he was ſtill deſirous to hide his Intentions, by telling the French Ambaſſador, that his Alliance with the Switzers ſuffered him not to refuſe them a paſſage through his Dominions; as if his Treaty with Lewis XII was to be leſs obſerved. The Switzers having paſſed unmoleſted through Trent, proceeded to Verona, and joining the Venetians, they marched together towards Milan. Whereupon the French entirely diſconcerted, and not having above ten thouſand Men, reſolved to retire into the fortified Towns, in order to waſte the Enemy's Army by Sieges, till the King ſent them Supplies, or the approaching Winter ſtopped the progreſs of the Allies. But they were ſoon deprived of this refuge, by the Emperor's orders for his Troops to retire immediately. Theſe orders being punctually obeyed, la Paliſſe found himſelf ſo weak, that deſpairing to ſave the Milaneſe, he reſolved to repaſs the Mountains, and return into France. The Prelates of the Council ſeeing Milan was going to be abandoned, by a ſudden Decree, removed the Council to Lyons, and followed the French Troops. They would have carried the Cardinal de Medici with them; but went away in ſuch confuſion, that his Friends found means to ſecure him. After the French were retired, all the Towns of the Duchy readily ſurrendered to the Switzers and Venetians, except Parma, Placentia, and Reggio, which ſubmitted to the Pope. On the other hand, Alexander Bentivoglio, not thinking himſelf ſafe in Bologna, departed from thence with all his Family, leaving the City to the Pope's Mercy. Thus Julius II, who, about a month before, ſaw himſelf in a very ill ſituation, was arrived at the height of his wiſhes by this ſurprizing revolution, which reſtored him Ravenna, Bologna, all la Romagna, and drove the French out of Italy.

There remained ſtill four things to do to complete the Pope's happineſs, namely, to diſpoſſeſs the Duke of Ferrara, to reſtore the Sforza's to Milan, and the Medici to Florence; and laſtly, to expel the Germans and Spaniards out of Italy. As for the Duke of Ferrara, he voluntarily delivered himſelf to the Pope, upon the faith of a Safe-Conduct. An Imprudence which would have coſt him dear, had he not been freed by Fabricius Colonna his Friend, who forced the Guard ſet at the gates of Rome, to hinder his departure.

The French were no ſooner out of Italy, than the Allies began to diſcover their different ends in acting againſt France. Upon this occaſion they judged proper to meet at Mantua, where they could agree but upon two Articles, namely, that Maximilian Sforza eldeſt Son of Lodovico the Moor, ſhould be reſtored to Milan, and the Houſe of de Medici to Florence. In conſequence of this laſt reſolution, the army of the Allies approaching Florence, compelled the Florentines to conſent to a Treaty, whereby the Medici were reſtored to their Country as Citizens only, and not as Governors. But the Cardinal de Medici entering the City by virtue of the Treaty, whilſt the army of the Allies was at the gates, found means to introduce many Officers and Soldiers, and raiſe

Another Congreſs at Rome. Guicciard.

It was a great ſtep for the Pope to have reſtored the Medici to Florence, and Sforza to Milan. But this did not ſuffice to content him. The Duke of Ferrara was ſtill maſter of his Duchy, and the Council of Piſa ſitting at Lyons. The Allies therefore muſt be brought to turn their arms againſt Ferrara, and procure a Peace between the Emperor and the Venetians, that the Emperor might without difficulty abandon his Council. To that purpoſe, the Pope obtained a ſecond meeting at Rome, where he could gain nothing with reſpect to Ferrara, becauſe the Duke was protected by the King of Arragon. Beſides, the Venetians could not agree to find Men and Money to render the Pope maſter of that Duchy. As for the Peace between the Emperor and Venice, he found ſtill greater difficulties, though he paſſionately wiſhed to accompliſh that Project, for fear one or other of the two Powers ſhould recall the French into Italy. But the intolerable Terms propoſed by the Emperor to the Venetians, hindered him from ſucceeding. In ſhort, the Pope ſeeing his labour was in vain, and deſiring, at any rate, to diſſolve the Council of Piſa, and prevent the return of the French into Italy, concluded with the Emperor a League offenſive and defenſive againſt Venice. By this Treaty, the Emperor engaged to become a principal Party in the League of Rome, and agreed, that the Pope ſhould keep Parma, Placentia, and Reggio, ſaving however the Rights of the Empire. He promiſed to renounce the Council of Piſa, and forſake the Duke of Ferrara, and the Bentivoglio's. The Pope engaged on his part, to aid the Emperor with all his power, thunder his Cenſures againſt the Venetians, declare them excluded out of the League of Rome, and drop the proſecution of the Colonna's, for aiding the Duke of Ferrara to make his eſcape. The Treaty being ſigned and ratified, the Biſhop of Gurck as the Emperor's Lieutenant, renounced in the next Seſſion of the Council of Lateran, the Aſſembly of Piſa, and revoked whatever had been done by the Emperor towards the calling and ſupporting it.

Remarks on the year 1512.

I have now run over the occurrences of the year 1512, a year very remarkable for the ſeveral changes in the affairs of Italy, and ſtill more, for the conduct of the Princes concerned, which diſcovers their different characters. Lewis XII was the dupe of his ſcruples, which made him loſe the opportunity of diſabling the Pope to hurt him, and in the end occaſioned the loſs of the Milaneſe. Julius II made Religion ſubſervient to his immoderate ambition, by uſing the glory of God and the good of the Church, for a cloak to gratify his paſſions. Having formed a League to reſtore the Venetians to their Dominions, to the glory of God and exaltation of the Chriſtian Faith, he concluded another, on the ſame pretence, to diſpoſſeſs them of all they had recovered. Ferdinand drew Henry VIII into a War for the Pope's defence, and to procure Guienne for the Crown of England; but artfully made it ſubſervient to the Conqueſt of Navarre for himſelf. The Emperour Maximilian acted with no more ſincerity. His conduct was the more extraordinary, as he was ſolely indebted to Lewis XII for all he had conquered in Italy, after the League of Cambray. Nay, the very preſervation of his Conqueſts was wholly owing to that Prince's continual ſupplies. And yet, he no ſooner ſaw him upon the decline, but he moſt ungratefully helped to hurl him down the precipice. It is ſaid he had a Book wherein he marked in red Letters, the injuries received from the King of France. But I do not know in what colour Lewis XII ſhould have writ in his Book the wrong done him by Maximilian on this occaſion. As for Henry VIII, he was certainly the dupe of the King of Arragon and the Pope. But what is more ſtrange, after Ferdinand and Julius II, by their artifices, had ingaged that Prince in a League againſt France, as ſoon as affairs had taken ſuch a turn that they no longer wanted his aſſiſtance, they thought no more of him than if there had been no ſuch Perſon in the World. In all the Negotiations between the Allies, whether at Mantua or Rome, after the retreat of the French, Cardinal Bambridge was never called to them, neither was there any mention of the King of England. The Pope and the King of Arragon, ſatisfied with expelling the French, forſook Henry, without troubling themſelves about his concerns. It even appears that he was not informed of theſe Negotiations. We ſee in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that the 10th of November, he ſtill gave full powers to his Ambaſſadors (1) at ſeveral Courts, to treat of a League in favour of the Pope, at the very time, the Pope was entirely neglecting the intereſts of England. About the ſame time, Henry ſigned Letters Patents, declaring he entered into the League concluded at Rome a year before, though, ſince that, Julius II was in poſſeſſion of Ravenna, all la Romagna, Parma, Placentia, Reggio, and his deſires had been accompliſhed by Lewis's loſs of Genoa and Milan, and by the Emperor's renouncing the Aſſembly of Piſa. Thus, he was evidently the dupe of all theſe intrigues. He lent, without knowing it, his Troops to Ferdinand to conquer Navarre. On the other hand, the Terror of his Arms was greatly ſubſervient to the Pope's deſigns, as it hindered Lewis XII from keeping in Italy Troops, which he believed neceſſary for the defence of his Kingdom againſt the Engliſh. This was the real aim of Julius and Ferdinand, and Henry was ſo blind as to ingage, without neceſſity, in a War with France for their intereſt, imagining he was acting for his own. 1512.

Act. Pub. XIII. p. 341.

Who would not have thought that Henry's experience ſhould have rendered him wiſer and more circumſpect? And yet, he was farther amuſed by theſe very Princes, who told him that having nothing more to fear in Italy, they were going to join all their Forces to invade France, and if he would act likewiſe, he might eaſily recover Guienne and Normandy. Henry being perſwaded of their ſincerity, immediately ſent Ambaſſadors to Bruſſels (2), to conclude a League againſt France with the Pope, the Emperor, the King of Arragon, Charles of Auſtria Sovereign of the Low-Countries, and Margaret Ducheſs Dowager of Savoy his Aunt, who governed his Dominions during his Minority. Henry reckoned that the execution of the Treaty would immediately follow the concluſion. But it will hereafter be ſeen, that if they concluded the League, it was only to draw Money from him, and leave him to make War all alone. He was young and unexperienced, but withal ſo ſelf-conceited as to think himſelf wiſer than his Council. Beſides, he had plenty of ready Money in his Coffers. What could Perſons ſo ſubtle as Julius, Maximilian, and Ferdinand, deſire better than to have to deal with ſuch a Prince as Henry? We have already ſeen this year 1512, how artfully they improved ſo favorable a diſpoſition, and we ſhall ſee in the following years, how very little he himſelf profited by what he might have learnt by experience, during the courſe of the preſent. However this be, being reſolved to carry War into France, he aſſembled a Parliament the 4th of November, to demand an aid of Money. Shortly after, the Commons, without examining too cloſely the reaſons which induced him to take arms, granted him a Subſidy (3), and a Poll-Tax (4) upon all his Subjects, for the expences of the War (5).

powerful diverſion, in caſe that Kingdom was attacked. Upon the firſt report that the King of England was going to quarrel with Lewis XII, James took care to be provided with pretences to break with him. The affair of Breton furniſhed him with one, and he moreover ſought others. But the true reaſon of his acting was, that, for ſome ages paſt, the Kings of England were grown ſo powerful, and had ſhown ſo great a deſire to unite all Great-Britain under their Dominion, that the Scots could little expect to reſiſt them but by the aſſiſtance of France, which had ever protected them. It was therefore more neceſſary than juſt, for Scotland to continue firm to the intereſts of France, and not ſuffer that Crown to be diſabled to aſſiſt her Allies. So, not to ſwerve from this maxim, James IV, who had determined to go to Jeruſalem, laid aſide his deſign when he heard there was like to be a rupture between France and England. He equipped a Fleet, which he intended to ſend into France, under colour of preſenting it to Queen Ann, Wife of Lewis XII. But this Fleet, in which was the largeſt Ship that had yet been ſeen on the Sea, was loſt or diſabled by a ſtorm and the Admiral's ill conduct.

The King of Scotland prepares to aid France.

At laſt, Henry having proclaimed War with Lewis XII, James concluded a League againſt him with France the 22d of May this year. Shortly after, he prepared an Army, but without divulging for what it was deſigned. His intent was to make an inroad into England, as ſoon as Henry had ſent his Forces into France. Henry having notice of this armament, ſent two Ambaſſadors (1) into Scotland, under colour of adjuſting ſome little differences, but in reality to ſound the King's intentions. The Ambaſſadors acquainting King James that their maſter was ſomething jealous of this Armament, as if it was made in favour of France, James replied, That being equally an Ally of both Crowns, his deſign was to obſerve an exact neutrality. The Ambaſſadors prayed him to give that anſwer in writing; but he refuſed, on pretence it would breed a ſuſpicion in the King of France. Shortly after, Henry learnt by his Spies that a League was concluded between France and Scotland, and he even procured a copy of the Treaty (2). So, perceiving that a War with Scotland was unavoidable, he ſent the Earl of Surrey into the northern parts with power to levy an Army, and act againſt Scotland in caſe of neceſſity (3).

1513. Views and Intereſts of the Princes.

The occurrences of the year 1512 made great alterations in the intereſts of the Princes concerned, and conſequently in their deſigns and meaſures.

Of Julius II.

Julius II, pleaſed with having expelled the French out of Italy, and ſo greatly increaſed his power, by the acquiſition of ſo many places, was thinking however of ſeizing Ferrara. After that, he hoped, with the aſſiſtance of the Venetians and Florentines to be able to drive the Emperor out of Venice, though he had lately leagued with him. As for the reſt, he had no thought of making Conqueſts in France; his ſole aim was to find Lewis XII employment at home, and entirely diſſolve the remains of the Council of Piſa, which however was not very formidable to him, ſince the Emperor's diſingagement.

Of Ferdinand.

The King of Arragon's ſole view was to preſerve his late Conqueſt of Navarre. To enjoy it in peace, the only way was to keep Lewis XII elſewhere employed, or prevail with him not to diſturb him. To that purpoſe it was neceſſary to uſe the terror of the Arms of the Allies, and particularly of the King of England, that the King of France being attacked from ſeveral quarters, might be induced of himſelf to deſire a Peace, and leave him in poſſeſſion of Navarre. Ferdinand would not have ſcrupled to abandon his Allies, provided he could obtain at that rate ſuch a Peace as he wanted.

Of the Emperor.

The Emperor ſought only to draw Money both from his Friends and Enemies. He was very ſenſible, that with his own Forces alone, it would be difficult to make Conqueſts upon the Venetians; and that the Pope, though his Ally, did not wiſh it. But he was extremely reſerved to them, to procure the larger ſums in making a Peace. On the other hand, he endeavoured to embroil matters as much as poſſible, and make new Leagues, becauſe in all the Treaties of that kind, Money was ſtill given him to maintain imaginary Troops, which he never raiſed, at leaſt not ſo many as he promiſed.

Of the Venetians.

The Venetians were extremely deſirous to end a deſtructive War, by which they were drained. Their ſole aim was to induce the Emperor to be ſatisfied with a good ſum of Money, for the reſtitution of their Towns, and thereby put their State upon the ſame foot it was before the League of Cambray. But as the Emperor could not think of depriving himſelf of an entrance into Italy by the reſtitution of theſe places, it was their buſineſs to compel him in ſome meaſure, by new Leagues which might make him apprehenſive of loſing them without any advantage. But as this was the Senate's ſole view, they were always ready to break all their engagements, as ſoon as the Emperor would hearken to reaſon. 1513.

Of the Switzers.

The Switzers thought only of ſupporting Sforza at Milan, to have always in that Duchy a Prince who ſhould rely on their aſſiſtance. Conſequently, it was their intereſt to keep the King of France at a diſtance, and oppoſe all his attempts to recover it.

Of the King of France.

Lewis XII, extremely mortified at the good ſucceſs of his Enemies in Italy, ardently deſired to recover Genoa and Milan. To ſucceed, the aid of the Venetians, the Emperor, or the Switzers was neceſſary. It was alſo requiſite ſo to haſten the concluſion with one or other of the two laſt Powers, that the expedition of the Milaneſe might be made in the Spring, for fear it ſhould be prevented by the War, the King of England was preparing againſt him in Picardy.

Of Henry VIII.

Of all Lewis's Enemies Henry was the only one who thought of making Conqueſts in France, prepoſterouſly imagining, his Allies would make diverſions in ſeveral places, to facilitate the execution of his deſigns. But he did not yet ſufficiently know them. The Venetians had been excluded out of the late league. The Pope and King of Arragon had no deſire to attack France, but only to create Lewis troubles, which might hinder him from thinking of Italy. It was ſolely with this view that they feigned a willingneſs to ſecond the King of England. As for Maximilian, Henry and his Council muſt have voluntarily deceived themſelves, to hope for any aſſiſtance from him.

Of the King of Scotland.

James IV King of Scotland, ſeeing France upon the point of being attacked by the King of England, was preparing to aſſiſt her, deeming his own and that Kingdom's intereſts to be inſeparable. He eaſily perceived, Henry courted him only to hinder his interpoſing in the quarrel, and was willing to feed him with hopes of ſucceeding in his deſign. But he was however determined to break the Peace, rather than leave a Kingdom in danger, from which alone he could expect a ſpeedy and powerful protection in caſe of need. It is true, he had made a Peace with Henry VII, and renewed it with Henry VIII. But it was when theſe Princes had no quarrel with France, his antient and conſtant Ally. In his opinion, Henry by wantonly attacking France on frivolous pretences, violated indirectly the Peace made with Scotland. At leaſt, James pretended that in ſigning a Peace with England, he was not bound to forſake France whenever the King of England ſhould think of attacking her.

Such were the diſpoſitions of all theſe Potentates in the beginning of the year 1513. We muſt ſee now by what means each endeavoured to attain his ends. This new Scene will diſcover to us no leſs variety, artful managements, devices and artifices, than the former, ſince the Actors and Perſonages will ſtill be the ſame.

The Emperor offers a League to Lewis XII, in order to deceive them. Guicciard.

Whilſt Henry was ſeriouſly preparing for the War he was to carry into France, his pretended Allies were minding their own affairs, without regarding his intereſts. Since he had entered into the League of Rome, the Allies, it ſeemed, ſhould have done nothing without his knowledge. And yet Julius II had leagued with Maximilian, and excluded the Venetians, without informing him of it.

In the beginning of the year 1513, the Emperor had no farther regard for his new Allies, ſince he ſent and propoſed a freſh League to Lewis XII upon new Terms. He offered to aſſiſt him in recovering the Milaneſe, provided Lewis in return would aid him againſt the Venetians. Moreover, he demanded Renée, Lewis's ſecond Daughter, for Charles of Auſtria his Grandſon, and that for her Dower Lewis ſhould aſſign him all his pretenſions to Milan and the Kingdom of Naples. But that the performance of the Treaty might not entirely depend upon the Faith of the King of France, he required that the Princeſs ſhould be immediately ſent to him, and Cremona, and all Gierradadda delivered to him as ſoon as the Duchy of Milan was recovered. Certainly, one cannot but admire the Emperor's aſſurance in making theſe propoſals. He had not hitherto been able to continue the war againſt Venice, without the aſſiſtance of Lewis XII, nay, he thought he ſtill wanted it, and yet made him an offer of his aid to recover the Milaneſe. But upon what Terms? Why, after Lewis ſhould have been at a vaſt expence to recover that Duchy, he was to reſign it to the Emperor's Grandſon, with his pretenſions to Naples. This is called uſing people like true dupes. But after 1513. the ill turn Maximilian had lately ſerved Lewis XII, it is not very likely, that he believed his propoſals would be accepted. Probably, he made them only to hinder Lewis from joining with the Venetians. At the ſame time he intended to inſpire theſe laſt with jealouſy, and a fear of his uniting with France, that this fear might induce them to offer him more advantagious Conditions.

Lewis tries in vain to gain the Switzers. Guicciard.

Lewis XII hearkened to theſe propoſals, as if he had ſome deſign to accept them, becauſe he thereby hoped to create ſuſpicions in the Switzers and Venetians, and incline them the ſooner to join with him. As for the Venetians, they deſired nothing more than a ſtrict Union with France, and if any thing retarded the Negotiation, it was only the hope of an agreement with the Emperor, in which caſe they would have gladly renounced all ſorts of Leagues. As for the Switzers, it was not poſſible for Lewis XII to gain them to his ſide, though he offered them more than at firſt was demanded. Beſides their hatred of him, the face of their affairs was altered, ſince the reſtoration of Sforza to Milan. Whilſt that Prince was in exile, it was doubtful, whether in good policy they ought to engage in a war with France for his ſake. But ſince he was by their aſſiſtance in poſſeſſion of the Duchy, their Honour and Intereſt required their utmoſt endeavours to ſupport him (1). However this be, Lewis's Negotiation with the Switzers not ſucceeding, he was under a neceſſity to join in a League either with the Emperor or with Venice, otherwiſe he could little expect to recover Milan.

Propoſals of the Venetians to Lewis XII.

In the mean time, the Venetians ſent and propoſed a League to him upon the ſame Terms with that of the year 1498, namely, that they would aſſiſt him to recover the Milaneſe, provided he would reſign Cremona and Gierradadda. Lewis readily liſtened to their offers; but the Venetians themſelves did not haſten the concluſion, by reaſon of their circumſtances preſently after.

Guicciard.

The King of Arragon having good Intelligence of what paſſed between Lewis XII and the Venetians, informed the Emperor, and adviſed him to offer Verona to the Venetians for a ſum of Money. This was the ſubject of a long, though fruitleſs Negotiation.

Death of Julius II. Guicciard.

Whilſt the affairs of Italy were in this ſtate of uncertainty, Julius II, who was preparing to beſiege Ferrara in the beginning of the Spring, died the 21ſt of February, having kindled a flame which his death was not capable of extinguiſhing (2). As ſoon as the news reached the Viceroy of Naples, who was ſtill with his army in Lombardy, he approached Placentia, and entering without oppoſition, reſtored that place to the Duke of Milan. Parma quickly followed the example of Placentia, and was likewiſe delivered to the ſame Prince. No one was in haſte to ſend aſſiſtance to the future Pope to preſerve theſe places for him. On the contrary, the Princes of Italy could not ſee without uneaſineſs, that the Popes had footing in Lombardy, under a pretence which might, upon occaſion, be uſed againſt moſt of them.

Parma and Placentia ſubmit to the Duke of Milan.

Leo X Pope. Act. Pub. XIII. p 349. Guicciard.

On the 11th of March, Cardinal John de Medici, who eleven months before was taken priſoner at the Battle of Ravenna, was elected Pope, and aſſumed the name of Leo X. He was but thirty ſeven years old, but had however great experience, having been employed in divers important affairs in the late Pontificate. He was neither ſo hot nor ſo haughty as Julius II his Predeceſſor, but was much more artful and politick. I ſhall have occaſion hereafter to add to his Portraiture ſome Strokes, which will more fully ſhow his Genius and Character.

Truce for one year between Lewis and Ferdinand. Guicciard.

Before the death of Julius II, Ferdinand was employed in framing a plot perfectly anſwering the name he had in the world. The beginning of the year he had ſent two Monks into France to make ſome overtures to Lewis XII, by means of Queen Ann, to whom they had acceſs. But as Lewis perceived it was not poſſible to make a Peace, or even a Truce with Ferdinand, without leaving him in poſſeſſion of Navarre, he had appeared at firſt very cold. But at length, conſidering that he could hardly expect to recover the Duchy of Milan, whilſt the King of Arragon was his enemy, becauſe it was he that excited the King of England his Son-in-law, he determined, though unwillingly, to conclude with him a Truce, for a year, on condition the King of England was included, and Italy excepted. He reckoned, that during this Truce he ſhould with eaſe be able to re-conquer the Duchy of Milan, after which, he ſhould be ſufficiently ſtrong to defend his own Kingdom againſt the Engliſh. Nothing was farther from Henry's thoughts than ſuch a Truce, which would have broke all his meaſures, and yet, Ferdinand doubted not to act in his name, as if he were ſure of his conſent. This affair was began in January, and the 8th of February, Lewis empowered Odet de Foix Lord of Lautrec, to treat with Ferdinand's Commiſſioners. In ſhort, the Treaty was concluded at Orthez in Bearn the 1ſt of April. The Treaty ran, That there ſhould be a Truce for a year, out of Italy, between the King of France, the King of Scotland, the Duke of Guelders on the one part; and on the other the Emperor, the King of Arragon, the Queen of Caſtile, and the King of England. Lewis XII undertook to procure the King of Scotland's and the Duke of Guelders's conſent, and Ferdinand ingaged for the King of England. But as Ferdinand knew he ſhould not eaſily obtain Henry's conſent, he cauſed it to be inſerted in the Treaty, that it ſhould be ratified within a month by himſelf and Lewis XII, but that the other parties ſhould be allowed two months; with expreſs Declaration, that with regard to the Emperor, the King of England, the King of Scotland, and the Duke of Guelders, the Truce ſhould take place, but from the day of the exchange of their ratifications. Never perhaps was ſeen any thing ſo bold as what Ferdinand did on this occaſion. He perfectly knew that Henry would never agree to the Truce, and yet took upon him to procure his conſent, as if he had been fully empowered to that end. The laſt Article, concerning the ratification, plainly diſcovers his thoughts. But it is ſtill more viſible, in that he not only took no ſtep to perſwade Henry to do what he ſeemed to deſire, but even concealed from him the Truce as far as poſſible. 1513. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 349.

Ferdinand excludes Henry without his knowledge. Guicciard.

Ferdinand complains of the Allies. Guicciard.

As ſoon as the Treaty was ſigned, Ferdinand took care to publiſh his complaints, that he had been very ill-uſed by the Allies of the League; that the Pope and Venetians had acquired many places, but for his part he had gained nothing at all, and yet the Allies refuſed to continue the Supply to which they were bound, though the King of France ſtill poſſeſſed ſeveral Towns in Italy, and the Spaniſh Army was ſtill in the ſervice of the League. But this was only to prepare people to ſee with leſs ſurprize and indignation, the private Truce he had juſt made with France, without the participation of his Allies.

The Eyes of the publick were fixed upon the new Pope, to ſee what courſe he would take. But he did not long leave the Politicians in ſuſpence. Though whilſt a Cardinal, he did not entirely approve of Julius II's Conduct, he purſued however his plan as ſoon as he was in his place. He was doubly concerned to keep the French out of Italy: Firſt, as Pope, ſince Neighbours ſo powerful could not but be formidable to him. Secondly, as head of the Houſe of the Medici, he had cauſe to fear, that if Lewis XII recovered the Milaneſe, he would undertake to reſtore the Florentines to their Liberty. In a word, he wiſhed to put an end to the Council of Piſa, which could be done only by ingaging Lewis XII in wars, which ſhould compel him to make his Peace with the Church. Ferdinand had likewiſe the ſame views, to keep the King of France at a diſtance from Navarre, Rouſſillon, and the Kingdom of Naples. As for the Emperor, it was his Intereſt to diſable France to aſſiſt the Venetians. But they had, none of them, any deſire to carry war into France, but only ſo to manage, that this diverſion might be made at another's expence.

The Allies try to engage Henry in a war with France.

To that purpoſe they unanimouſly caſt their Eyes upon Henry VIII, as a Prince extremely proper to execute their deſigns. He had ready Money, warlike Subjects, and could with eaſe tranſport Troops into ſome part of France remote from the Borders of Spain and Italy. In fine, he was exceeding deſirous to ſignalize himſelf by illuſtrious Actions, and ſcrupled not to ſhow it publickly. So, each of them laboured with all his power to confirm him in his deſign, to wage war with France, by putting him in hopes of being vigorouſly ſupported, though nothing was farther from their thoughts. Leo X was no ſooner in the papal Chair, but under colour of notifying his Promotion, ſent him a Letter, aſſuring him, that he was fully determined to adhere to the League formed by Julius II his Predeceſſor, and even to conclude a new one with England. But at the ſame time, he preſſed the Emperor to make a Peace with Venice, and negotiated with the Venetians to hinder their Union with France, promiſing to uſe all his Intereſt with the Emperor to procure them an honorable and advantagious Peace. All theſe practices could not be managed ſo privately but the King of France had ſome Intelligence of them, ſo that he ſoon grew very jealous of the new Pope.

League concluded at Mechlin between the Allies and Henry.

Henry did not want much Sollicitation to carry his Arms into France. His thoughts were already bent upon a war. So, finding, the Pope, Emperor, and King of Arragon promiſed him to act vigorouſly, he did not queſ-

1513. tion the favorableneſs of the opportunity to recover good part of what his Predeceſſors had formerly loſt. And therefore, he readily agreed to form a new League with them, not for the affairs of Italy, with which he was probably diſguſted, but to attack France from ſeveral quarters. And that the League might be the more ſecret, it was agreed, that it ſhould be negotiated at Mechlin, between Margaret of Auſtria Governeſs of the Low-Countries, authorized by the Emperor her Father, and the Ambaſſadors of England (1), and that afterwards it ſhould be approved and ratified by the Pope, the Emperor, and Ferdinand. This was another ſnare laid for Henry, which he perceived not till it was too late to avoid it. Though Ferdinand was then upon the point of concluding the Truce with the King of France, he made himſelf however one of the principal Parties in this League, as repugnant as it was to the Truce. The Subſtance of the new League concluded at Mechlin the 5th of April, about the ſame time the Truce was ſigned at Orthez, was as follows.

Act. Pub. XIII. p. 354, &c.

The Terms of the League.

That within thirty days after the date of this Treaty, each of the Confederates ſhould proclaim War with the King of France, and within two months invade him, viz. the Pope in Provence or Dauphiné: The Emperor in ſome place out of Italy: The King of Arragon in Bearn, Guienne, or Languedoc: The King of England in Guienne, Normandy, or Picardy, and that their Armies ſhould be ſtrong and well provided with all things.

That the Emperor (if he had not yet done it) ſhould revoke all his proceedings in favor of the Council of Piſa. This ſhows how little Henry or his Plenipotentiaries knew of what paſſed at Rome, ſince it was now three months or more that the Emperor had abandoned that Council.

That the Pope ſhould thunder his Cenſures againſt all the oppoſers of this League and abettors of the contrary party.

That towards the expences of the War, the King of England ſhould give the Emperor a hundred thouſand Crowns of Gold, at three payments; thirty-five thouſand preſently after the declaration of the War, as much more when the War was begun, and thirty thouſand within three months after.

That the Emperor meant not to enter into this League as Guardian to Charles his Grandſon.

That the Emperor and King of England ſhould ratify the Treaty within a month, and the Pope and King of Arragon within two months; with this expreſs declaration, that in caſe the Pope and the King of Arragon ſhould not ratify the Treaty by the time appointed, it ſhould however be in force between the Emperor and the King of England.

Laſtly, The Confederates renounced all exceptions whatever, and particularly that which might be made to another's ſtipulating for them.

Never perhaps was ſeen more inſincerity than in this whole Nogotiation, ſince of all the Confederates Henry alone intended to keep his word. Leo X ratified not the Treaty; Ferdinand, as will be ſeen preſently, diſowned his Ambaſſador: As for the Emperor, he received the Money from the King without troubling himſelf to perform his engagements. Thus Henry was the conſtant dupe of theſe Princes, who were a little too politick for him.

Ferdinand's Ambaſſador at London ratifies and ſwears to the League of Mechlin. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 358.

The Treaty being brought to London, Lewis Carroz de Villaragud, Ferdinand's Ambaſſador, approved and ratified it by Letters Patents of April 18th. He declared in theſe Letters, that though he had a ſufficient power from the King his maſter, to conclude the League with the Plenipotentiaries of the confederate Princes, he had not been able, for certain weighty reaſons, to be preſent at the ſigning at Mechlin. But being very ſure, the Treaty contained only what was agreeable to the King his Maſter, who deſired nothing more earneſtly than it's execution, he approved and ratified, in the ſaid King's name, all the Articles of the Treaty. And to remove all occaſion of diſputing the validity of his ratification, he inſerted the Treaty word for word, in his Letters of ratification, and concluded it again with the Earl of Surrey the King of England's Commiſſioner, by virtue of a full power received for that purpoſe. Afterwards, the 25th of the ſame month, he ſwore to the obſervance of the Articles upon the Souls of Ferdinand King of Arragon, and Jane Queen of Caſtile. It is uncertain whether the Ambaſſador was himſelf deceived, or whether knowing it, voluntarily helped to impoſe upon Henry. All that can be ſaid is, that the great precautions taken to hinder his being ſuſpected of inſincerity, are not very common with thoſe who intend to act fairly. 1533.

Henry is impoſed upon.

It muſt doubtleſs be thought ſtrange, that a Pope, an Emperor, and a King of Spain ſhould thus join, to lay ſuch a ſnare for a young Prince of twenty one years of age, and who was even Son-in-law to one of them. And yet it is ſcarce to be doubted, that the League concluded at Mechlin, in the abſence of the Pope's and King of Arragon's Ambaſſador's, was thus projected to entangle Henry, under colour of keeping it the more ſecret. They ſucceeded ſo well, that Henry relying upon the diverſions, his pretended Allies would make in Guienne, Bearn, Provence, Dauphiné, Burgundy, flattered himſelf that he might eaſily extend his Conqueſts in Picardy. To that end, he made extraordinary preparations by Sea and Land, which put him to a vaſt expence. But whilſt we leave him employed in preparing for the next Campain, it will be neceſſary to relate what paſſed in Italy.

Act. Pub. XIII. p. 364. Hall.

League between Lewis XII and the Venetians. Mezerai. P. Daniel.

The Venetians not being able to obtain a Peace from the Emperor, who pretended to ſubject them to very unreaſonable terms, ſollicited afreſh the Negotiation they had begun with France. On the other hand, Lewis XII, to whom time was precious, readily accepted their propoſals. Thus the League between that Monarch and the Venetians was quickly concluded (2), upon the ſame foot as that of the year 1498. This was tranſacted by Andrew Gritti, who being then Priſoner in France, was commiſſioned to conclude it in the Senate's name. Preſently after he was releaſed, as well as Alviano, who returning to Venice, was made General of the Forces of the Republick.

Guicciard.

Lewis ſends Trimouille into Italy with an Army. Guicciard. P. Daniel.

When Lewis XII had concluded his Treaty with the Venetians, he ordered his Troops to march into Italy, where they arrived in June. As, by the Treaty of Truce concluded at Orthez, Henry was allowed two months to ſend his pretended ratification, and as that term was not yet expired, very probably Lewis ſtill flattered himſelf that Henry would perform what the King of Arragon had promiſed for him; otherwiſe he would not doubtleſs have ſent his beſt Troops into Italy. Mean while, the preparations which were continuing in England, and the Hoſtilities, already begun at Sea ſince April, between the French and Engliſh, ſhould have convinced him that Ferdinand had deceived him. However this be, the French Army commanded by la Trimouille being arrived upon the borders of the Milaneſe, Maximilian Sforza quitted his capital, and retired among the Switzers, who were to the number of ſeven or eight thouſand Men, at Como and Novarra, where they expected ſupplies from their own Country.

Ferdinand's General goes from Milan.

Upon the approach of the French, Raymund de Cardona, who was ſtill in Lombardy with the Spaniſh Army, retired without making the leaſt motion to aſſiſt the Duke of Milan, though Italy was not included in the Truce of Orthez. Very likely Ferdinand was not diſpleaſed, that the French ſhould make ſome progreſs in the Milaneſe, to keep them employed there, whilſt Henry carried War into Picardy. At leaſt, any other reaſon of his General's conduct can ſcarce be imagined. The Duke of Milan having no other Forces but the Switzers to oppoſe to the French, Milan and the reſt of the Towns of the Duchy, except Como and Novarra, ſubmitted to la Trimouille without offering to reſiſt, whilſt the Switzers, who were not ſtrong enough to take the Field, remained immured within the Walls of theſe two places. Whilſt the French were making theſe Conqueſts, Alviano took for the Venetians, Peſchiera, Breſcia, Valeggio, and at laſt Cremona, after a fruitleſs attempt to become maſter of Verona by intelligence.

Sforza loſes all Milan except Como and Novarra. Guicciard.

Genoa is reſtored to France. Guicciard.

About this time the Faction of the Adorno's, who in Genoa ſided with France, found means to become ſuperior, and put the City again under the Dominion of the King (3).

La Trimouille is repulſed by the Switzers at Novarra.

Lewis XII was now in poſſeſſion of the whole Milaneſe, except Como and Novarra. La Trimouille knowing, the Switzers expected a ſtrong reinforcement from their own Country, thought he ſhould make haſte and beſiege Novarra, before the arrival of theſe Troops. He marched therefore to the Town, and in the expectation of taking it immediately, furiouſly ſtormed it. But whatever bravery the French ſhowed upon this occaſion, they were repulſed with a very great loſs, which even obliged the General to retire to Riotta, a village about two miles from Novarra. Mean while, the Switzers proud of repulſing ſo terrible an aſſault, and beginning to deſpiſe the French, before whom they had not yet dared to appear in the Field, ſuddenly reſolved to ſally out of Novarra, and attack the enemy in their Camp. This reſolution was imme-

Their consternation after the defeat was so great, that they thought it their only safety to repass the mountains, and with all possible diligence return into France. The news of their flight reaching Genoa, the Adorno's quitted the City to the Fregosa's their enemies, who chose for Doge Octavian Fregosa head of their Family and Faction. Thus, within the space of a month, Lewis XII got and lost Genoa and Milan, and Maximilian Sforza, who had been expelled out of his Duchy, took possession again. But it was the latter end of the year before he recovered the Castles of Milan and Cremona, kept by the French and Venetians.

The French retire home. Genoa is lost; and Sforza is restored to Milan.

The revolution in the King of France's affairs, occasioned much the same to those of the Venetians. Alviano their General no sooner heard of the French Army's misfortune, but he hastily retired into the territories of Venice, and besieged Verona. But Raimund de Cardona, who had affected a sort of neutrality whilst the French were in the Milanese, knowing they were out of Italy, turned his Forces against Alviano. He not only forced him to raise the Siege of Verona, but even pursuing him from place to place, obtained over him a signal Victory, which obliged the Venetians to refer their differences to the Pope, tho' he had declared against them by assisting the Emperor. The necessity of their affairs compelled them to take that step in order to gain time. They had lost all their Towns in the Milanese, and their own Country had been horribly ravaged by the Spanish Troops, even within sight of Venice.

Whilst these things were acting in Italy, Henry was preparing to pass into France with a numerous Army. But before I speak of the success of his first Campain, it will be necessary briefly to mention what passed at his own Court, and which it will be worth while to insist upon a moment. Thomas Wolsey had been introduced to Court by the Bishop of Winchester. Presently after, he was made Privy-Counsellor, and as such, had opportunity to make himself better known to the King, and gain his esteem, as well by his own qualifications, as by the interest of the Bishop his Benefactor, who ceased not to cause the King to admire the strength of his genius, and observe how fit he was for the greatest affairs. Wolsey on his part neglected not what he thought capable of increasing the King's good opinion of him. To an indefatigable application, and extreme diligence in all the affairs he was charged with, he added a blind condescension for all his Master's passions. The King was highly pleased to see in his Court and Council a Churchman, less rigid and scrupulous than the Archbishop of Canterbury, or the old Bishop of Winchester. Wolsey danced, sung, laughed, and played with the young Courtiers who were most in favour; and if Polydore Virgil is to be credited, who loved him not, neither had reason to love him, he carried his complaisance so far as to lend the King his house for his most secret pleasures. However this be, his condescension, joined to his Talents for business, and a pretty extensive knowledge in Divinity which he had acquired, as well as the King, by reading the works of Thomas Aquinas, soon gave him the advantage over all the other Courtiers. When he saw himself well fixed, he made it his particular business to shew the King his errors since his accession to the Throne, and how his youth had been abused. By this method he insinuated to him by degrees, that he was ill-served, and wanted an able Minister, capable of easing him in the Administration of the most weighty affairs, and of shewing him the consequences. In a word, he so managed, that he became himself that Minister which he advised the King to seek, and by degrees was intrusted with the care and conduct of the King's principal affairs. His credit rendered him haughty, proud, insolent, and ungrateful to his old Friends. In short, he was taxed with all the failings of this nature, which Favorites are usually charged with, and which indeed few Favorites can avoid. Wolsey, like most others, grew extremely odious, chiefly because his Counsels were always self-interested, which the event discovered to all but the King, who was blind in that respect. His favor and credit, caused the most potent Princes of Europe, to strive to gain him to their interests, and glory, at least outwardly, in being of the number of his Friends. The reason is, because during this Reign, the affairs of Europe were in such a situation, that England was capable of making the balance incline to the side she espoused. Wolsey knew how to improve this advantage, to render himself the richest and most powerful Subject that ever was; but laboured not with the same ardour for his Master's honour, as for his own interest. After he was declared Prime Minister, he managed, during the space of seventeen years, all the King's affairs both Foreign and Domestick (1). 1513.

Before the King was ready to pass into France, the War was already begun at Sea. In April, Admiral Howard had put to Sea with thirty-two Ships of War (2), whilst the French Fleet remained at Brest, expecting six Gallies, which Pregent (3) was to bring from Marseilles. The English Admiral approaching Brest, resolved to attack the French Ships as they lay at Anchor. But upon notice that Pregent was arrived at Conquet, he sailed that way, to endeavour to take the six Gallies, and attacked them indeed with great bravery (4). But during the fight, his Ship being grappled with Pregent's Galley, he entered it sword in hand, and at first caused great disorder. Unhappily, the Galley being afterwards disingaged, he was left in the hands of his enemies, with a few attendants, and, being unknown, was knocked over-board with a half-pike. The loss of the Admiral caused such a consternation in the English Fleet, that they durst not continue the fight (5). The news being carried to Court, the King conferred the Office of Lord Admiral upon Thomas Howard, Brother of the deceased. Mean while, as the French Fleet, by receiving a strong reinforcement, was become superior to the English, the last returned to some Port in England, expecting the arrival of the new Admiral. The French, encouraged by the retreat of the English, sailed to the Coast of England, and even made a descent in Sussex, and carried away some booty.

Mean time, Henry was preparing to carry War into France, tho' none of his pretended Allies had yet made the least step towards performing the Treaty of Mechlin. Leo X had not ratified the Treaty, and nothing was farther from his thoughts, than the sending of an Army into Provence or Dauphiné. The Emperor began to seek excuses not to enter Burgundy with an Army, though he had positively promised it. As for the King of Arragon, he had not only concealed from Henry his one year's Truce with France, but was even trying to amuse him with hopes, that he was instantly going to make a powerful diversion in Guienne. He so artfully acted his part, that it was June before Henry was fully informed of the Truce of Orthez. Provoked at such a Fraud, he dispatched an Ambassador to the King his Father-in-law, to upbraid him with breach of Faith, and summon him to execute the Treaty of Mechlin, or rather, that signed by his Ambassador in his name at London. Whereupon Ferdinand, seeing he could no longer wear the mask, disowned his Ambassador, and said, he had exceeded his Instructions. He confessed however, he had concluded a Truce for a year with Lewis XII, being forced by the necessity of his affairs, but promised to do wonders when it was expired, and advised his Son-in-law to accept of the Truce, that they might afterwards unite their Forces, and jointly attack the common Enemy. But Henry could no longer rely upon such promises. Thus, by the Artifices of the Pope, the Emperor, and Ferdinand, he saw himself engaged to carry War alone into the Enemy's Country, which was to have been invaded in four several quarters. He was not convinced of their Insincerity till it was almost too late to recede, the greatest part of his Army having already passed the Sea, and just entring upon action. Happily for him, Lewis XII, deceived by the Treaty of Truce concluded at Orthez, had now sent his best Troops into Italy, imagining Henry would accept of the Truce according to the King of Arragon's Engagement.

Shortly after Henry received a Letter from the Emperor, with many excuses, that it was impossible for him this year to lead an Army into Burgundy, but he would punctually perform his engagement next year. Mean while, to shew, he meant not to forsake him, he said, he would come and serve as Volunteer in his Army. Thus, of the four Allies who were to act at once against France, Henry alone was charged with the burden of the

He had ſo relied on the ſincerity of his Allies, that though the Treaty of Mechlin was not to be ratified by the Pope and the King of Arragon, till the 5th of June, he had cauſed the beſt part of his Army to paſs over to Calais in the middle of May. It is evident, the ratification of the Treaty of Mechlin had been ſo long retarded, only to engage Henry beyond a poſſibility of receding.

But probably, he gave the Prince his Son orders like thoſe given by King David to Solomon his Succeſſor, with reſpect to Joab. The Hiſtorians have endeavoured to diſcover Henry's Inducement at ſuch a Juncture, to put the Earl of Suffolk to death, who was not in condition to hurt him. But they have ſaid nothing ſatisfactory (2).

The two Bodies of Troops tranſported to Calais departed thence the 17th of June (3), under the Command of the Earl of Shrewsbury (4), and the Lord Herbert (5), in order to march to Terouenne, to which they laid Siege (6). But the King departed not from England till the 30th of the ſame month, having conſtituted Queen Catherine Regent (7). He arrived the ſame day at Calais, being attended by Thomas Wolſey his Prime Miniſter, Charles Brandon another Favorite lately made Viſcount l'Iſle (8), with many other Lords (9). Whilſt the Troops continued the Siege of Terouenne, he remained at Calais with a body of nine thouſand Men, ready to march upon the firſt occaſion. At laſt, having certain advice that the Duke of Longueville was approaching to relieve the Town, he haſtened from Calais to the Siege, where he arrived the 4th of Auguſt. On the 9th, the Emperor came and conferred with him between Aire and Terouenne, and three days after repaired to the Camp and ſerved as Volunteer under the King, making no ſcruple to receive a hunded Crowns a day for his pay. By this mark of eſteem, and the imaginary honour he did the King, he meant to make amends for his Breach of Faith, and the hundred thouſand Crowns received for an Expedition which he had never intended to make.

Mean time, the Duke of Longueville who commanded the French Army, approaching Terouenne, Henry paſſed the Lys with the greateſt part of his Troops, in order to meet him. The two Armies engaged, but not long. For the fight was hardly begun, when the French, by what accident is unknown, ran away in confuſion without any poſſibility of their being rallied. But the principal Officers choſe rather to be taken priſoners than follow ſo diſhonorable an example. The Duke of Longueville was of the number, with Chevalier Bayard, la Fayette, Buſſi d'Amboiſe, and ſome others of the greateſt Diſtinction. This Battle, if ſuch a rout may be ſo termed, was called, The Battle of Guinegaſte, and by ſome, The Battle of Spurs, becauſe the French made more uſe of their Spurs than their Swords. Whilſt the two Armies were in view, before the Engagement, a body of French attempted to introduce a Convoy of Proviſions into the Town, but were repulſed by the Lord Herbert, who was left to guard the Trenches. After the Battle, the beſieged deſpairing of relief, ſurrendered the City the 22d of Auguſt, and the King, in company with the Emperor, entered on the 24th. 1513.

It ſeemed to be Henry's deſtiny to be always the Emperor's dupe. After the taking of Terouenne, Maximilian, who had only ſerved at the Siege as Volunteer, found means to have the place delivered to him, and immediately ordered it to be demoliſhed. It is hard to conceive what induced Henry to this condeſcenſion. All that can be conjectured is, that there was perhaps in the Capitulation, ſome Article againſt the razing of the place, but that altering his mind, he was willing to ſave his honour by delivering it to the Emperor. Though this were the caſe, there would be no leſs reaſon to be ſurprized at his management. 'Tis eaſy to perceive it was very advantagious to Charles of Auſtria, Grandſon of Maximilian, that Terouenne belonged neither to the French nor the Engliſh. But what Intereſt could Henry have to loſe ſo many Men, and ſo much time, to take a place in order to have it razed in favour of Maximilian, who had not merited ſuch a Condeſcenſion (10)?

Henry gives the Place to the Emperor, who razes it. Hall. Stow. Herbert. Hollingſh.

As the Seaſon was not yet far advanced, Henry reſolved, before the end of the Campain, to beſiege Tournay, whether he heard the place was ill provided, or the Emperor's Intrigues had again influenced his Council. For, the Conqueſt of Tournay, which lies at ſome diſtance from Calais, was much leſs advantagious to Henry than to the Archduke Charles, whoſe Dominions it ſecured; whereas Boulogne would have been, without doubt, much more convenient for the King, by reaſon of the neighbourhood of Calais. Nevertheleſs the Siege of Tournay was reſolved, probably, becauſe the Emperor hoped the King would give him that place as he had done Terouenne. But he found againſt him Intereſts ſtronger than thoſe of the King himſelf, which oppoſed his deſigns.

1513. cil of War, it was debated, whether it was proper to keep the place, which ſeemed to be difficult, by reaſon of its diſtance from Calais. But after a long debate, it was reſolved to keep it, and leave for Governor Sir Edward Poynings, with a ſtrong Garriſon. The contrariety of the two reſolutions with reſpect to Terouenne and Tournay will, perhaps, appear ſtrange. The firſt of theſe places which was neareſt Calais, and ſecured the road from Calais to Tournay, was demoliſhed. The ſecond, which could not without great difficulty be relieved, was deemed neceſſary to be kept. This contrariety could proceed only from Wolſey's Intereſt, who influenced the Council as he pleaſed. He had caſt his Eyes on the Biſhoprick of Tournay, as a thing very convenient for him, whereas that of Terouenne was nothing in compariſon. Accordingly, he afterwards found means to obtain the adminiſtration of this See, under colour, that the Biſhop refuſed to ſwear Fealty to the King. This is the true reaſon why it was reſolved to keep Tournay, and perhaps of undertaking the Siege (1).

The fortnight they ſtaid with him, he took care to entertain them with all ſorts of Diverſions, as Juſts, Turnaments, running at the Ring, Balls, Maſquerades, and the like. Mean while, amidſt all theſe Diverſions, the Miniſters of the two Courts began a Treaty, which was concluded a few days after.

Henry returns their Viſit. New Treaty at Liſle. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 379. October 15. Herbert.

Margaret and Charles being returned to Liſle, Henry repaid their viſit (2), and was received with all imaginable reſpect and civility. Some days after, on the 15th of October, they ſigned a Treaty, importing, That though Henry had bound himſelf not to repaſs into England till the war was ended, he ſhould however, have liberty to return thither with his army.

That during the Winter, the Emperor ſhould keep in Artois and Hainault a body of four thouſand Horſe, and ſix thouſand Foot, for the Defence as well of Tournay and the Tournaiſis, as of the Archduke's Dominions.

That for the maintenance of theſe Troops, Henry ſhould pay the Emperor two hundred thouſand Crowns at ſeveral payments.

That before the 1ſt of June next year, Henry ſhould carry war into Guienne, Normandy, or Picardy, and the Emperor into ſome other Province of France.

That before the 15th of May, the Emperor, the Ducheſs Margaret, the Archduke Charles, the King of England, Queen Catherine, the Princeſs Mary, ſhould meet all together at Calais to celebrate the Archduke's Marriage with the Princeſs Mary, purſuant to the Treaty concluded between the Emperor and the late King Henry VII.

Remark on this Treaty.

Whatever was to be done, Henry muſt always find Money. Maximilian had already received a hundred thouſand Crowns of Gold, without having executed any of his Engagements entered into by the Treaty of Mechlin, and found means to procure two hundred thouſand more by the preſent Treaty, beſides the advantage of razing Terouenne, which very much annoyed his Grandſon the Archduke's Dominions. Nay, it is very probable, the diſguſt which made him quit the King's Army, proceeded from his not being able to perſuade him to promiſe him Tournay alſo when taken. This manifeſtly ſhews, he looked upon Henry as a novice, eaſily to be inſnared. Certainly Henry's many falſe ſteps in the beginning of his reign can only be excuſed by his little knowledge of the Character of the Princes with whom he treated.

Ferdinand propoſes a new League to Henry.

It cannot be doubted, that the King of Arragon was of the ſame opinion concerning Henry him Son-in-law. Notwithſtanding the ill turn he had ſerved him laſt year, he had ſtill the aſſurance to ſend him an Ambaſſador at Liſle to propoſe a new League, as if his word had been more to be relied on than ſome months before. But it does not appear that Henry was then inclined to truſt to his promiſes.

Henry returns to England. Herbert. Hall. Stow.

Henry departed from Liſle the 17th of October, and on the 24th arrived at his Palace at Richmond, after a glorious Campain. I call it glorious, if the Succeſs of his Arms be only conſidered. But in another reſpect it was not very honorable, ſince he had been the dupe of the Pope, the Emperor, and the King of Arragon, who had thrown upon him the whole burden of the War, which ſhould have been common to all the four. It is true, he had taken Terouenne and Tournay. But the firſt of theſe places being given to the Emperor, and razed, was to him of no benefit. As for Tournay, he never reaped any conſiderable advantage from it, by reaſon of its diſtance from Calais. Wolſey was the only gainer by it, the Biſhoprick of that City, which he obtained in the end, together with the Abby of St. Amand, being of a much greater Revenue than what the King himſelf received from Tournay and its Territory. 1513.

The Switzers enter Burgundy. Mezerai. Guicciard. P. Daniel.

The ill Succeſs of the Italian Campain had put Lewis XII's affairs in a bad ſituation, and the loſs of the battle of Guinegaſte, with the taking of Terouenne and Tournay, had entirely diſordered them. But this was a trifle in compariſon of the danger France was in, by a Swiſs Invaſion, after the French were driven out of the Milaneſe. The warlike Switzers, excited againſt Lewis by the Pope and the Emperor, not being ſatisfied with their advantages over him in Italy, reſolved to attack him in his own Kingdom. The opportunity was favourable, by reaſon of the ſeveral forementioned Junctures. To improve this opportunity therefore, the Switzers levied fifteen thouſand Men (3), to whom the Emperor joined all the Nobility of Franche-Comté, and ſome German Horſe, under the Command of Ulrick Duke of Wirtemberg. This army entering the Duchy of Burgundy, encamped before Dijon, where la Trimouille, lately returned from Italy, had ſhut himſelf up with ſome Troops (4); but that place was ſo weak, that there was no likelihood of keeping it. He defended it however ſix weeks. But at laſt, ſeeing that by the loſs of Dijon, not only Burgundy, but all the reſt of France would be in great danger, he thought he ſhould prevent it without waiting the King's orders, which might come too late. By a Capitulation with the Switzers, he bound himſelf to pay them four hundred thouſand Crowns (5), of which he paid down twenty thouſand, and promiſed in the King's name, that he would deſiſt from all his pretenſions to the Duchy of Milan. The Switzers, pleaſed with their Expedition, retired into their own Country, carrying with them four Hoſtages, who found means to eſcape when they knew the King refuſed to ratify the Capitulation.

Lewis makes a Peace with the Pope. Guicciard. Mezerai. Herbert.

Lewis XII finding himſelf attacked in ſo many places, and not doubting that the Pope and the King of Arragon created him all theſe Troubles, reſolved at laſt to be reconciled with the Pope. This agreement was the more eaſy, as Leo X had not, like Julius II, a perſonal enmity againſt him. Since the French were out of Italy, he had nothing to demand of the King, but the diſſolving of the Council of Piſa, without which indeed he could not conſent to a Peace. The Council was grown ſo thin, that Lewis, in forſaking it, made no great ſacrifice to the Pope. It is true, the ſubmitting in a point he had hitherto openly maintained, ſeemed to be ſomething diſhonorable. But as the Council of Piſa had been properly ſummoned againſt Julius II, he thought he might without reproach yield to another Pope. However, Lewis perceiving, that by his reconciliation with Leo X, he ſhould take from the Kings of England and Arragon the pretence they uſed to make War upon him, was at length induced to renounce his Council, and acknowledge that of Lateran. This renunciation was ſolemnly made in the tenth Seſſion, held about the end of December.

The Pope exhorts Henry to Peace. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 349. March 16. Guicciard.

Leo X, in the beginning of his Pontificate, writ to Henry, as to all the reſt of the Princes, earneſtly exhorting him to Peace. In this manner he was to talk, in order to diſcharge the duty of the common Father of Chriſtians. Henry, who ſaw plainly, and was afterwards ſtill more fully convinced, that this was only grimace, replied, he could not make Peace without his Allies, and that a ſeparate Peace would be directly contrary to all his Engagements. This anſwer diſpleaſed not the Pope, who then ſought only to raiſe Enemies to France. But when he was ſure of his agreement with Lewis XII, he took occaſion to ſend another Letter to Henry, telling him, he never intended to perſuade him to make a ſeparate Peace, but as he had taken Arms ſolely for the defence of the Church and the Holy See, and had, by his late Victories, attained the end he had propoſed, it was reaſonable he ſhould lay them down, ſince the Prince, who oppreſſed the Church, was returned to his obedience. This Letter was dated December the 17th, about the time of the tenth Seſſion of the Council of Lateran, wherein the French Ambaſſadors made a ſolemn Submiſſion in their Maſter's name.

1513. knew, he did not mean, for all that, to neglect his own Intereſt, that Language being properly only to amuſe the publick. He had the more reaſon to believe it, as, even in the Treaty of League, each of the Allies had evidently propoſed to himſelf temporal advantages. And yet, he ſaw, the Pope had no ſooner obtained his deſire, but he took the words of the Preamble of the Treaty in the literal Senſe, as if there had been indeed no other deſign than to labour for the Church, and under that colour, pretended to diſſolve a League formed by himſelf. This convinced him, that the Pope, in drawing him into a war with France, had only his own Intereſt in view. On the other hand, he was not better pleaſed with the King of Arragon, nor had reaſon to be ſo. As for the Emperor, he had performed nothing of what he had promiſed. All theſe Conſiderations having at laſt opened his Eyes, produced a Peace with France, which was concluded the next year. But before we cloſe this, it will be neceſſary to relate what paſſed during the Campain, between the Engliſh and Scots.

War between England and Scotland. Buchanan. Herbert.

James IV ſeeing Henry ready to carry War into France, called his Parliament, and repreſented to them the indignities Scotland had ſuffered from the Engliſh, ſince the laſt Peace. Breton's affair was not forgot in this enumeration. But the beſt reaſon, he alledged to induce the Scots to a War, was, that France, the ancient and faithful Ally of Scotland, being about to be invaded by the King of England, he could not diſpenſe with aſſiſting her. This reaſon, though very plauſible, was not however univerſally approved. Many thought it ſtrange that the King ſhould thus wantonly, and without an urgent neceſſity, break a Peace advantageous to Scotland, ſolemnly ſworn to, and even lately renewed. But the King's Creatures and the Penſioners of France, whom Lamothe, the French Ambaſſador, had now prepared to ſerve the King his Maſter upon this occaſion, carried it by a great majority, ſo that War was reſolved.

James IV enters England. He ſends a defiance to Henry. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 382. Hall.

Henry was in France, when James aſſembled his Army to invade England, purſuant to the foregoing reſolution. But to keep ſome ſort of formality, James writ him a Letter, and ſent it by a Herald, who found him at the Siege of Terouenne. This Letter, dated the 26th of July, contained the Grievances, James believed to have cauſe to complain of, and a declaration of War in caſe he deſiſted not from his Invaſion of France. Henry could not ſend his anſwer till the 12th of Auguſt, the ſubſtance whereof was, "That he was not at all ſurprized to ſee "him break the Peace upon frivolous pretences, ſince he "therein only imitated the inſincerity of his Anceſtors "and Progenitors. Then he upbraided him, that whilſt "he knew him to be in England, he never ſhewed, "either by Letter or Ambaſſador, that he intended to "eſpouſe the King of France's quarrel, but waited for "his departure to execute his unjuſt deſigns. He added, "that knowing him perfectly, he had foreſeen his "breach of Faith, and for that reaſon, before he paſſed "into France, had taken ſuch a courſe, and ſo well "provided for the defence of his Kingdom, that he did "not queſtion, by God's help, to fruſtrate all the en-"deavours of Schiſmaticks, excommunicated by the Pope "and Council of Lateran. That beſides, he hoped to "have it very ſoon in his power to requite him, and "in the mean time, would not fail to take the moſt ef-"fectual methods, to deprive him and his poſterity of all "hopes of ever inheriting the Kingdom, he was going "ſo perfidiouſly to invade. After that, he ſet before "his eyes the example of the King of Navarre, who "for taking part with France, was diſpoſſeſſed of his "Kingdom, without hopes of being ever reſtored. As "for the pretended grievances alledged in his Letter, he "ſaid, they had been ſo often anſwered, that all farther "mention of them was entirely needleſs. But for the "King of Scotland's ſummoning him to deſiſt from the "War with France, he told him, he did not acknow-"ledge him for competent judge in his affairs with Lewis "XII, and notwithſtanding his threats, would con-"tinue the War. He concluded with ſaying, that he "might be aſſured he would omit no opportunity to be "revenged, wherein he hoped to ſucceed, with the help 1513. "of God and St. George."

Henry's Anſwer.

James ſtayed not for an anſwer to his Letter, to take the Field. On the 22d of Auguſt, he enter Northumberland, and took ſeveral places, particularly Norham Caſtle (1). The Engliſh Writers affirm his Army to be ſixty thouſand ſtrong. Nay, ſome mount the number to a hundred thouſand, which is hardly credible. It cannot however be doubted it was very numerous, conſidering the care Buchanan takes to ſhew, it was extremely leſſened by deſertions, and by being kept unemployed for ſome time. The Earl of Surrey was then in Yorkſhire (2), with twenty ſix thouſand Men. But at the firſt news of the Scots entring England, he marched directly towards them, and the 4th of September came near enough to ſend and offer them Battle, by a Herald, who reported that the King of Scotland accepted it for the Friday following. James was then encamped on the edge of mount Cheviot, where it was difficult to attack him (3). And therefore, the Earl of Surrey, ſeeing the Scots would fight only in ſo advantageous a Poſt, reſolved to ſtay till they deſcended on the plain. The Engliſh not appearing on the day appointed, an old Scotch Lord (4) took occaſion to repreſent to the King, that he had done enough to ſave his honour: That it was not prudent to fight the Engliſh in their own Country, but the beſt way would be to retire with his booty into Scotland, where it would be in his power to fight or avoid a Battle as he pleaſed: That as he had taken Arms only to make a diverſion in favour of France, he no leſs employed the Engliſh Forces, without fighting, than by hazarding a Battle: That upon this occaſion he ought not to liſten to the intereſted Counſels of the French Ambaſſador, who only wanted to hazard ſome great action at another's expence, in order to free the King his Maſter from his preſent ſtreights: But in ſerving France, Scotland was likewiſe to be regarded. This advice ſeemed too cautious to the King. As he had determined to give Battle, he fiercely anſwered, he would fight the Engliſh were they a hundred thouſand. Mean while, the Earl of Surrey to draw him from his Poſt, marched along a River (5) which parted the two Armies, as if he intended to enter Scotland thro' Carliſle, the road to which place he ſeemed to take. James having notice of it, ſet fire to his Camp, and marched along the ſame River on the oppoſite ſide. But unhappily for him, the ſmoak of his own Camp hindered him from ſeeing the Engliſh, who forded the River unperceived. Then James halting about Floddon, drew up his Army. Here it was the Earl of Surrey attacked him, having paſſed with difficulty a ſort of moraſs between the two Armies. The particulars of this Battle are ſo variouſly related by the Hiſtorians of both Nations, that the one cannot be followed without departing from the other. But as to the ſucceſs it is not the ſame. They all agree, the Scots loſt the day, after valiantly fighting till night, which parted the Combatants. The two Armies retiring, the Engliſh knew not they were victorious, till the morning, when they ſaw, their enemies had quitted the Field of Battle with all their Artillery. The Engliſh own, they loſt five thouſand Men in this Battle, which was fought the 9th of September. But they ſay the Scots loſt ten thouſand (6). The Scots pretend, there were but five thouſand ſlain on each ſide, but confeſs their loſs was very conſiderable by the great number of Lords and Officers of their nation killed in the Battle; whereas the Engliſh loſt not one Perſon of diſtinction (7). King James was never more ſeen after the Battle. The Engliſh imagined they found his Body wounded in two places, upon a heap of dead, and ordered it to be put into a Leaden-Coffin, without daring however to bury it, becauſe he died excommunicate. But the Scots affirmed it was not the Body of their King. They ſaid that before the Battle, he had cauſed five Men of his own Stature to wear the ſame Arms with himſelf, and that the Body which the Engliſh took for the King's was one Elphinſton's who greatly reſembled him. However, they could not tell what was become of the King. One ſaid

1513. indeed he saw him ride over the Tweed after the Battle. But as the Fight lasted till night, this evidence is not much to be relied on. It was however the foundation Buchanan. of the report of his not being dead. Some suspected, he was killed in retiring out of the Battle by the Lord Alexander Humes, or his Vassals. But this Fact was never well proved. However this be, it was never known for certain, whether the Body found by the English on the Field of Battle, was the King's or not (1). Pub. XIII p 385. Nov. 29. "That it was set forth to him from the King of England, that in a Treaty concluded between the late King "of Scotland and Henry VII, and renewed by Henry VIII, "the first had submitted to an excommunication in case "he acted in breach of it, and yet had broken the "Peace: That therefore he had been pronounced excommunicate by the Cardinal Archbishop of York, by virtue of a power granted by Julius II: That he died "in a Battle, without having been absolved; but in "consideration of his Royal dignity and nearness of blood, "the King of England desired permission to bury him "in consecrated ground. Upon these accounts, the Pope "was pleased to grant his request, considering, as he was "told and ought to believe, James in his last moments "showed some signs of contrition, such as his circumstances would admit. That therefore he appointed the "Bishop of London, or any other Bishop the King should "please to nominate, to inquire into the matter; and if "it was found, James had shown any signs of repentance "before his death, he gave him power to absolve him: "That however the absolution should serve for no other purpose than his interment in Holy Ground. "Moreover, he ordered the Bishop to injoin the King "of England to undergo some convenient or suitable "penance in the name of the deceased King."

Remark upon this Brief. Among many remarks that might be made on this Brief, I shall confine myself to this one. There was no declaration of War between James and Henry before James's Letter dated the 16th of July, and received the 12th of August, nor any hostility committed before the 22d of August, when James entered England. So the King of Scotland cannot be said to have violated the Truce till that time. Now, he died the 9th of September excommunicated by the Cardinal of York, who was then Ambassador at Rome. Hence I think it may be inferred, that the Cardinal had excommunicated James without knowing the cause, or hearing his reasons, and probably upon a bare Letter sent him by Henry, that the King of Scotland intended to break the Peace; I say, he only intended to break the Peace, since there is no likelihood that from the 22d of August, when James entered England, to the 9th of September, the day of his death, the Cardinal, who was at Rome, could have been informed of the actual rupture, and proceeded to an Excommunication. I say nothing of the supposition that James, slain on the spot, showed any signs of contrition, especially as it was even uncertain whether the Body they would have interred, was the King of Scotland's. I pass over likewise the limitation set to the absolution, that it should serve only for burying the dead Prince in Holy Ground, and the Penance enjoined a living Person in the name of a dead one. Every Reader may make what reflections he thinks proper on these things.

1514. Interests and Views of the Princes of Europe. Such being the situation of the affairs of Europe at the end of the year 1513, it is not surprising that the designs and interests of the Princes should be different from what they were in the beginning of the same year. It is therefore necessary, before we enter upon the recital of the events of the year 1514, to mention how the chief Sovereigns stood affected.

Lewis XII. Lewis XII burned with desire to recover Genoa and Milan. But he perceived, that to succeed in that design, the Allies must be divided, otherwise there was not even a possibility of undertaking it. The Pope, Emperor, King of Arragon, and Switzers, were equally concerned to oppose it. And yet, as they had also their separate interests, he thought it would not be impossible to divide them, by offering to each apart, or at least to some of them, advantages as great as those they could naturally expect from their Union. Besides, he hoped, in treating with each in particular, to breed jealousies and suspicions among them, which would induce them to make haste and treat with him for fear of being deserted. He had the more hopes of succeeding this way, as most of the Princes with whom he was in War, were not over scrupulous, but rather very ready to sacrifice their Allies to their own private interest. To this artifice therefore 1514. Lewis recurred to free himself from his present embarassment. At the beginning of the year 1514 he took care to renew the Negotiation concerning the marriage of the Princess Renée his second Daughter with Charles Archduke of Austria, knowing, Maximilian and Ferdinand were equally desirous of it, especially upon the terms proposed by themselves. He started however difficulties capable of continuing the Negotiation without entirely breaking it off. The Pope could not look upon this project without uneasiness. He was as much afraid of Milan's being in the hands of a Grandson of the Emperor and King of Arragon, as of seeing the French King restored. His interest required that Milan should remain in the Family of the Sforza's. The Switzers passionately wished it also. The Venetians too would have therein found a great advantage, if another interest had not prevailed. And that was, to oblige the Emperor to make Peace with them on reasonable Terms. But this they could not hope without the assistance of France; and this assistance could not be obtained without aiding Lewis XII to recover the Milanese.

Maximilian. Maximilian found his account in his War with Venice, because it cost him little. Since the League of Cambray, he had always been powerfully aided by France, or Spain, or rather, had never made War but at another's expence. His Allies were necessarily obliged to find him Men or Money, otherwise they might be sure he would quickly change sides. Since he had left France, the Spanish Troops had done all in the War with Venice, and the King of Arragon, with all his policy, was not able to dispense with acting for him. It is not therefore surprising that he was so difficult, when a Peace was on foot, or used his endeavours to inflame the divisions among the Princes.

The King of Arragon. As for King Ferdinand, since he was become master of Navarre, it was his interest to imbroil affairs, and cherish in Italy, the hopes and fears of the several Parties, to make himself necessary, and that a Peace might not be concluded without him. He thereby tried to hinder Lewis from thinking of Navarre, and hoped at last to come to a Treaty which should leave him in quiet possession of his Conquest. For that reason, he acted all sorts of parts, in order to attain his ends. One while, he assisted the Emperor against the Venetians, another while, he sollicited him in their favour. Sometimes he excited the Pope and Switzers not to suffer the King of France to become master of Milan; and sometimes he offered to assist the same Prince to conquer that Duchy. This was only deceit and artifice to preserve a dissention so advantagious to him. However, his policy began to fail him. He had so forfeited his reputation with respect to sincerity, that he was no longer trusted. It was merely out of necessity, or from a desire to breed suspicion in their enemies, that the rest of the Sovereigns made any Treaties with him, which, they were sensible, they could not rely on.

Henry VIII. Henry VIII had with glory got clear of his first Campain, but plainly saw himself indebted for his good success to Lewis's passion, who had neglected the defence of his own Kingdom, by sending his best Troops to recover Milan. The truth is, Henry, depending upon the Treaty of Mechlin, and the diversions, his Allies were to make in several Provinces of France, had led into that Kingdom not above five and twenty thousand Men; too weak an Army to give him hopes of great advantages, had he been to deal with all the Forces of his enemy. Forsaken as he was by the Pope, the Emperor, the King of Arragon, how would he have disingaged himself, if Lewis XII had resolved to defer his Milan expedition to another time, and march all his Troops into Picardy? Thus Henry should have considered, and in effect did consider, that he was more indebted for the Victory of Guinegaste, and the taking of Terouenne and Tournay, to the circumstances of the time than to his prudence or valour. He was therefore inclined to get clear of an affair, he had indiscreetly embarked in, without flattering himself any longer with the imaginary assistance of his Allies. It was necessary however to conceal his inclination, in order to draw from France advantagious conditions in a Treaty. Such was the posture of affairs in the beginning of the year 1514. But before I speak of those of England in particular, it is requisite to show what steps were taken by the Princes concerned in the troubles of Italy, because that was then the chief point, on which all the other affairs did depend.

1514. of Renée his ſecond Daughter, uſed all poſſible endeavours to reconcile the Switzers to France, that Lewis might be the leſs inclined to treat with the Emperor and the King of Arragon. But he wiſhed that Lewis would ratify the capitulation of Dijon as to what concerned the Duchy of Milan; and on the other hand, exhorted the Switzers to be ſatisfied with a leſs ſum than was promiſed by la Trimouille. This was the plan he had formed for that reconciliation. In ſhort, he had ſo far gained his point, that the King of France had offered a Truce for three years, without however departing from his pretenſions to Milan, and many of the principal Switzers were ſatisfied with it. But it was not poſſible to perſwade that People to abate any thing of the Capitulation of Dijon. They even debated whether they ſhould make a ſecond incurſion into France, to revenge the breach of that Treaty. Thus the Pope's pains were fruitleſs, and the Switzers ſtill remained mortal enemies to France.

Ferdinand prolongs the Truce with Lewis XII. Guicciard. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 395.

Ferdinand having advice of what was tranſacting in Switzerland, was afraid of being deſerted, whether Lewis gave up his claim to Milan, or the Switzers accepted the Truce he offered them. So, without communicating any thing to his Allies, he ſpeedily ſent Quintana his Secretary to Paris, who renewed for a year the Truce with France upon the ſame foot with the former. Only by a ſecret Article, Lewis promiſed not to invade the Milaneſe this year. In the publication of the Truce in France, there was no mention of Milan. But Ferdinand publiſhed it in Spain with that Article; ſo that the World was at a loſs to know what to think of the matter. Lewis made no ſcruple to prolong the Truce, becauſe he could not undertake to invade Milan and Navarre before he had made a Peace with England. Beſides, he was very glad the World ſhould think, the Truce, he had prolonged with the King of Arragon, would be followed by a Peace.

The Pope ſtrives to make Peace between the Emperor and Venetians, who make him Umpire of their differences. Guicciard.

This was a very natural Conſequence, and probably, it inclined Henry ſeriouſly to think of a Peace. But on the other hand, Lewis was going to receive a great prejudice by it, in that the Pope to break his meaſures with reſpect to Milan, laboured with all his power to procure a Peace between the Emperor and the Venetians. He deſired above all things, for the good of his See, of all Italy, and of himſelf, that the French ſhould never more ſet foot in Italy. Whilſt the French were in poſſeſſion of the Milaneſe, Italy had never been free from troubles, the Popes had been leſs regarded than before, and the Florentines had preſerved their Liberty. Theſe were ſufficient reaſons to make the Pope wiſh, they might never return. Beſides, he had formed projects for raiſing his Family, which their neighbourhood might obſtruct. One great means to attain his ends, was, to deprive Lewis XII of the aſſiſtance of the Venetians, which would infallibly happen, if it was poſſible to find ſome Expedient to make their Peace with the Emperor. Laſt year the Venetians, preſſed by the Spaniſh Army, had agreed to make the Pope Umpire, and the Emperor had accepted him. But the affair had lain dormant ever ſince. Preſently after Ferdinand's renewing of the Truce with Lewis XII, the Pope fearing a Peace would be concluded between the two Monarchs, at the expence of the Duchy of Milan, ſtrove to renew the Negotiation between the Emperor and the Venetians. He knew, if it ſucceeded, the King of France would in vain expect the aſſiſtance of the Republick to conquer Milan. In ſhort, with much Sollicitation, he obtained from both Parties an ingagement to ſtand to his arbitration, and to give him power to ſettle the Terms of the Peace as he ſhould think fit. However, by a writing under his own hand, he promiſed not to pronounce Sentence without both their conſents.

Difficulties of the Peace.

It was very difficult to make this Peace, becauſe the War ſtill continuing in the State of Venice and Friuli, the leaſt Succeſs was ſufficent to cauſe the Parties to riſe or fall in their demands. When the Venetians found themſelves preſſed, they very willingly agreed, that the Emperor ſhould keep Verona; but then Maximilian would have alſo Vicenza, Padua, and Treviſo. When his affairs were not proſperous, he was ready to leave them theſe three places, but then they could not think of making Peace without Verona. Thus the Pope, finding the various Succeſs of the War was a perpetual obſtacle to his projected agreement, paſſed a proviſional Sentence, ordering that both Parties ſhould lay down their arms: That the Emperor ſhould depoſite in his hands, Vicenza, and whatever was poſſeſſed by the Spaniards in the Territories of Padua, and Treviſo: That the Venetians ſhould do the like with regard to Crema, and pay down to the Emperor fifty thouſand Ducats: But that this proviſional agreement ſhould be deemed void, if the two Parties ſhould not think proper to ratify it; but in caſe they approved of it, he promiſed to pronounce a definitive Sentence within a year. The Venetians did not think proper to ratify the Sentence, being perſwaded that, in their preſent Circumſtances, a Truce was much more prejudicial than the continuation of the War. Thus the Pope's pains were ineffectual. Such was the ſituation of the affairs of Italy during the year 1514. We muſt ſee now what paſſed in England. 1514.

rejected by the Venetians.

Parliament in England. Herbert.

Henry, at his return from his glorious Campain, thought only of Mirth and Diverſions. The Parliament however met the 3d of January, but there was nothing done of any moment with reſpect to the publick affairs (1). Before the end of the Seſſion, the King gave the Earl of Surrey, the title of Duke of Norfolk, which his Father had enjoyed, and loſt with his Life at Boſworth-field, fighting for Richard III (2). By this change, Thomas Howard Son and Heir of the new Duke, became Earl of Surrey. Charles Brandon Viſcount Liſle, one of the King's Favorites, was alſo created Duke of Suffolk; and Charles Somerſet, Earl of Worceſter. Margaret of York, Daughter of the Duke of Clarence, Brother of Edward IV, obtained likewiſe the title of Counteſs of Sarum, as Heir to the Earl of Warwick her Brother, beheaded by Henry VII (3).

The Earl of Surrey created Duke of Norfolk. Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 389. Feb. 1. Margaret of Clarence Counteſs of Salisbury.

Thomas Wolſey had now been ſome months Prime Miniſter, without receiving other particular marks of his maſter's favour. But Wolſey was not forgetful of himſelf. The Biſhoprick of Lincoln being vacant, he ſo ordered, that the King demanded it for him of the Pope, who had ingroſſed the Collations of all the Sees, by anticipated reſervations. Shortly after, Lewis Guillard Biſhop of Tournay, neglecting to repair to his Biſhoprick, ſince the City was in the hands of the King of England, the Pope readily ſuppoſed he had quitted his See, and gave the Adminiſtration thereof to Thomas Wolſey, both in Temporals and Spirituals. This was ſuddenly and almoſt at once a great addition to the new Favourite's Income. Leo X, not expecting much, either from the Emperor, or the King of Arragon, eaſily perceived, he might want the King of England. In order to gain his protection, he had diſpoſed of the Sees of Lincoln and Tournay in favour of Wolſey, to win him to his Intereſt, by preſents which coſt him nothing. But after having ſatisfied the Favourite, he muſt teſtify by ſome mark of diſtinction, his eſteem for the maſter. To that purpoſe, he ſent him a Sword and a Hat, conſecrated on Chriſtmas-day, which the Popes were wont to preſent to Princes or Generals who had obtained ſome ſignal Victory over the Enemies of the Church.

Whilſt the Pope, Emperor, and King of Arragon, were labouring to accompliſh their projects, Lewis XII was not unmindful of his own affairs (4). Among all his enemies, none gave him ſo much uneaſineſs as the King of England, chiefly for two reaſons. Firſt, Henry was young, greedy of glory, rich in ready Money, and moreover always ſure of Supplies from his Parliament, eſpecially in caſe of a war with France. Secondly, the Diverſion he could and did make in Picardy, by means of Calais, rendered all Lewis's future projects in Italy abortive. He thereby kept the Forces of France ſo divided, that it was almoſt impoſſible to aſſiſt one another in caſe of Accident. Thus, it was the King of France's great Intereſt to remove this Thorn from his Side, otherwiſe he could not undertake to recover Genoa and Milan. Accordingly, he had been very ſeriouſly endeavouring it, ever ſince the end of the laſt Campain, by the Miniſtry of Lewis of Orleans Duke of Longueville, taken Priſoner at the Battle of Guinegaſte. It was this private Ambaſſador who, in his frequent Converſations with Henry, laboured by degrees to open his Eyes, by ſhowing him how little he could

He was created Duke of Norfolk, Feb. 1. 1513-14. This Sir Richard was made chief Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber to Prince Arthur, and Knight of the moſt noble Order of the Garter. He had four Sons by the Lady Margaret; Henry, afterwards Lord Montague, Geffrey, Arthur, and Reginald the famous Cardinal Pole Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and one of the three that preſided at the Council of Trent. Margaret petitioned to be Counteſs of Salisbury, from her Grandfather Richard Nevil Earl of Salisbury, for all whoſe Caſtles, Manors and Lands, ſhe obtained a Grant dated Octob. 14, which came to the Crown by the Attainder of her Brother Edward Earl of Warwick. Idem. p. 292.

1514. could depend upon his Allies, and clearly diſcovering their artifices to draw him into their Snares. Henry was convinced, but, in all appearance, was told many things which he knew not before. However this be, theſe Converſations had ſuch an effect, that Henry told the Duke he was inclined to a Peace, provided it was upon reaſonable Terms. Lewis XII having notice thereof, ordered the Duke of Longueville privately to negotiate the affair, and try to diſcover the King of England's real Intentions. Probably, Henry inſiſted ſome time upon his Claim to the whole Kingdom of France, and particularly to Guienne and Normandy, which made the Duke apprehenſive, his Negotiation would not be ſucceſsful. However, to induce Henry to abate ſomething of his pretenſions, the Duke had orders to demand the Princeſs Mary his Siſter for the King his maſter, who had loſt Ann of Bretogne his Queen, the beginning of the year. This private Negotiation, to which only Thomas Wolſey Biſhop of Lincoln was admitted, continued ſome time without making great progreſs, by reaſon of Henry's exceſſive demands. At laſt, at a ſecret Conference which the King himſelf had with the Duke of Longueville, he ſuddenly deſiſted from the hardeſt of his demands, and plainly told him, on what Conditions the Peace might be concluded, adding, he was fully reſolved not to take leſs. Here is a Letter from the King to Wolſey, under his own hand, after the Conference, wherein appears what was his laſt reſolution (1).

HENRY R.

Though this Letter has no date, it may, by ſeveral Circumſtances be conjectured to be written in June 1514.

Lewis XII being informed of the King of England's laſt reſolution, entertained great hopes of a Peace. There were however two Articles which troubled him. The firſt was to pay annually a hundred thouſand Crowns, as a compenſation for Henry's Claim to the Kingdom of France. This was in ſome meaſure to own the Juſtice of his Title, and pay him a ſort of Tribute, which he could not reſolve. The other Article related to Tournay, which he deſired to recover, and which however, was not mentioned in the King's propoſals. But as to this Article, there was an obſtacle which was not eaſily to be ſurmounted, and that was, Wolſey was concerned. It was not ſufficient to gain Henry by Flatteries, or by giving him a Sum of Money in lieu of Tournay; the Favourite muſt alſo be made amends for the loſs of a See which brought him a conſiderable Income. To endeavour therefore to agree upon theſe two Articles, Lewis ſent Ambaſſadors to England. He choſe for this purpoſe, Lewis d'Orleans Duke of Longueville, John de Selve firſt Preſident of Roan; and Thomas Bohier, to whom Du Bellai gives the title of General of Normandy, and the King, in his Commiſſion, that of Chevalier General of France. Mean while, the two Kings agreed upon a Ceſſation of Arms during the Treaty.

Lewis is not pleaſed with Henry's Propoſals.

He ſends Ambaſſadors to England. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 405, 406. July 29.

A Truce agreed upon.

It was eaſier for the French Ambaſſadors to cauſe Henry to alter his laſt reſolution concerning the firſt Article, than to obtain the reſtitution of Tournay. The reaſon is evident. In the firſt Article, the King alone was concerned, whereas in the ſecond, the Miniſter's Intereſt was properly in queſtion. Mean while, ſince Henry was determined to make Peace with France, Tournay could be of no farther uſe, and a Sum of Money would have been doubtleſs more advantagious than the preſervation of that place. But Wolſey perceived when Tournay ſhould be in the hands of the King of France, he would infallibly loſe the Adminiſtration of the See. So, the Negotiation of the Ambaſſadors upon that Article was entirely fruitleſs. It was not the ſame with reſpect to the penſion of the hundred thouſand Crowns demanded by Henry. They found means to perſwade him to be ſatisfied with a Million of Crowns, in which were included the ſeven hundred forty-five thouſand, contained in the Treaty of Eſtaples; but whereof, indeed, an inconſiderable part had been paid. The Spaniſh Ambaſſador reſiding at London, uſed all poſſible endeavours to intervene in the Negotiation. But Henry would never ſuffer him, well knowing, he only intended to obſtruct it. The Commiſſioners of the two Kings (2) having ſettled all the Articles, the Treaties were ſigned the 7th of Auguſt.

Henry refuſes to reſtore Tournay.

Henry would not ſuffer the Spaniſh Ambaſſador to have to do in the Treaty.

There were three ſeparate Treaties. The firſt concerned only the renewing of the Alliance between France and England. The ſecond was about the Marriage of the Princeſs Mary with Lewis XII. The third, related to the payment of the Million of Crowns. As theſe Treaties ſerved for foundation to many others hereafter concluded, it is neceſſary to inſert the Subſtance, at leaſt, of the moſt material Articles.

Three ſeveral Treaties ſigned at London. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 413.

I. TREATY,

Of Peace and Amity between LEWIS XII and HENRY VIII, concluded at London, Auguſt 7. 1514.

p. 413. THAT the Amity between the two Kings ſhould laſt till a year after the death of the ſhorteſt liver. That the Succeſſor of him that died firſt, ſhould give notice within the year to the other, whether he would prolong this, or make a new Treaty.

That all Impoſitions laid, within fifty-two years laſt paſt, by one King on the Subjects of the other, ſhould be aboliſhed.

That the Peace ſhould not be deemed violated by the outrages committed on either ſide.

That neither of the two Kings ſhould afford protection or refuge to the Rebels of the other.

(1) The Tranſlator has thought fit to inſert the Original Letter in the very words of King Henry, as it is to be found in Rymer's Fœdera; and intends to do the ſame by all the Original Papers, which Rapin hath tranſlated word for word, as he has done this.

(2) The Engliſh Commiſſioners were, Thomas Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Biſhop of Lincoln, and Richard Biſhop of Winchester. Rymer, Tom. 13. p. 422.

By

1514. By the 14th, 15th, and 16th Articles, the two Kings bound themſelves to mutual aſſiſtance in three Caſes: 1. For defence of one another's Dominions: 2. For recovery of the Territories with-held by other Princes: 3. In caſe one of the two Kings ſhould be attacked on account of the preſent Treaty, and affirmed upon his honour, it was for that cauſe. In each of theſe caſes the conditions were different (1). But in the laſt, they promiſed mutual Aid, though the Aſſailant ſhould be Relation, Friend, or Ally of one only, or of both.

Lewis included in the Treaty, as his Allies, the Pope, the Switzers, and the King of Scotland (2). On Henry's part, were named the Pope, Bologna, all the Towns of St. Peter's Patrimony, the Archduke of Auſtria, and the Switzers (3).

Scotland was included in the Treaty, but on condition that the Scots ſhould commit no Hoſtilities againſt England, after the 25th of November.

That the Treaty ſhould be ratified and ſworn by the two Kings, and confirmed by the Parliament of England, and the States-General of France.

That each of the two Kings ſhould endeavour to obtain of the Pope a Sentence of Excommunication againſt the infractor of the Peace.

II. TREATY,

Concerning the Marriage of LEWIS XII with the Princeſs MARY.

Act. Pub. XIII. p. 423. THAT Matrimony ſhould be contracted by Proxies, and per verba de præſenti, within ten days after the date of this Treaty.

That the King of England, [within two months after the Contract,] ſhould convey at his own charge, the Princeſs his Siſter to Abbeville, where within four days after her arrival, the King of France ſhould ſolemnly marry her.

That Mary ſhould have in Dower four hundred thouſand Crowns, two hundred thouſand whereof ſhould be reckoned for Jewels, &c. and in caſe of recovery, Lewis ſhould be obliged to reſtore only the Jewels, &c. which ſhould be valued at the ſum of two hundred thouſand Crowns.

That the other half, amounting to two hundred thouſand Crowns, Henry ſhould pay, by deducting the ſum out of the million the King of France was bound to pay by a late Treaty.

That the future Queen's Jointure ſhould be as great as that aſſigned to Ann of Bretagne, or any other Queen of France.

That in caſe of Lewis's death, Mary ſhould enjoy her Dower and Jointure during Life, whether ſhe reſided in France or England.

III. TREATY,

For the Payment of a Million of Crowns.

p. 428, 439. BY this Treaty Lewis XII acknowledged, that by the Treaty of Eſtaples, Charles VIII was bound to pay Henry VII, or his Succeſſors, the ſum of 745000 Crowns, and that himſelf was obliged to pay the Arrears of the ſame.

Moreover, that Charles Duke of Orleans his Father, by an Obligation dated March the 7th, 1444, had owned himſelf debter in a certain ſum to Margaret of Somerſet Grandmother of Henry VIII.

That theſe two ſums not being yet paid, Lewis bound himſelf to pay to the King of England, or his Succeſſors, a million of Crowns, as well for the Arrears of the ſaid two ſums, as on account of the good affection he bore him, and to the end their amity might be the more laſting.

That this million ſhould be paid by Lewis to the King of England, by half-yearly payments of fifty thouſand Livres Tournois, till the whole was diſcharged.

Thus the War, which had been undertaken on pretence of Religion, and for the Glory of God, ended in a Treaty, which mentions neither Religion, nor the Pope, nor the Church. 1514.

The Princeſs Mary proteſts againſt her Contract with Charles of Auſtria. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 409. July 30. Herbert.

On the other hand, though the Princeſs Mary had been ſolemnly affianced to Charles of Auſtria, Lewis XII and Henry VIII, made no difficulty concerning this ſecond marriage, neither did they ſo much as vouchſafe to demand the Pope's diſpenſation, to abſolve Mary from her firſt contract. Only, a few days before the ſigning of the Treaty, Mary declared in the preſence of a Notary Publick, and other Witneſſes, that ſhe had been forced to plight her Faith to the Prince of Caſtile, Archduke of Auſtria. That moreover the Archduke having promiſed to eſpouſe her by Proxy and per verba de præſenti, as ſoon as he was fourteen years of age, had broken his word. She added further, that ſhe was creditably informed, the Counſellors and Confidents of the Prince of Caſtile were inſtilling into him, to the utmoſt of their power, an averſion for the King of England her Brother. Upon theſe Allegations, the two Kings making themſelves judges in a cauſe which doubtleſs belonged to the Pope's cognizance, thought fit the marriage ſhould be conſummated.

Remark on the third Treaty. I have ſtill to remark upon the third Treaty, That, though Henry had declared to the Duke of Longueville, as appears in his Letter to Wolſey, that he could not make Peace unleſs the King of France would pay him a yearly penſion of a hundred thouſand Crowns, as a compenſation for the inheritance he with-held from him, an expedient was found to ſatisfy him with much leſs. The whole was reduced to Lewis's bond to pay him a million of Crowns, two thirds of which were already due before the Treaty. Beſides, that this Bond might not be conſidered as a compenſation of the King of England's title to France, according to Henry's intentions, it was expreſsly ſaid in the Treaty, to be in payment of the arrears of the ſeven hundred forty five thouſand Crowns, due to the King of England by the Treaty of Eſtaples, of another ſum due from the late Duke of Orleans to Margaret the King's Grandmother, and laſtly, for Lewis's good affection to Henry. Hereby was cauſed to vaniſh the principal foundation, on which Henry had built his demand of a penſion of a hundred thouſand Crowns; a demand conſidered by him at firſt as the baſis of the Treaty, according to his Letter to Wolſey. It may therefore be affirmed, that Henry was no leſs over-reached by the King of France in the Treaty of Peace, than he had been by the Pope, the Emperor, and the King of Arragon, in that which had ingaged him in the War. This proceeded not from his miſunderſtanding his own intereſts, ſince it appears in his Letter, that he was very ſenſible of the conſequence of his demand. To what then can his eaſineſs be aſcribed but to the inſinuations of his Prime Miniſter, who certainly erred not out of ignorance? Probably, Lewis XII found means to make Wolſey his Friend. We ſhall ſee ſtill more plainly hereafter, that this Miniſter was much more mindful of his own than his Maſter's advantages, when they came in competition, and that he loſt no opportunity of inriching himſelf.

Death of Cardinal Bambridge. Herbert. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 404. Whilſt Wolſey was employed with the French Ambaſſadors in negotiating the Peace, Cardinal Bambridge, Archbiſhop of York, died at Rome the 14th of July (4). The ſame day Cardinal Julius de Medici, afterwards Pope by the name of Clement VII, ſent the King notice, acquainting him withal that he had prevailed with the Pope, not to diſpoſe of the See of York before his pleaſure was known. Whereupon the King demanded the Archbiſhoprick for Thomas Wolſey, which was immediately granted. This Miniſter was then in ſo great favour, that he abſolutely directed all the King's affairs, who had for him a very great eſteem and affection. It may be preſumed that he was now doing Lewis XII ſome good Services, ſince there are in the Collection of the Publick Acts, ſeveral Letters from that Monarch to him, beginning with theſe kind words, My Lord of York, and very good Friend.

Wolſey is made Archbiſhop of York. p. 412, 450--455. p. 439, 455.

Lewis's Marriage with Mary conſummated. p. 448. Hall. Stow. Auguſt and September were ſpent in preparations for the new Queen of France's journey, in the celebration of the marriage by Proxies, in France and England, and in the ratifications of the Treaties. After which, Mary was conducted to Abbeville with a numerous train of Lords and Ladies, where the marriage was conſummated the 9th of October (5).

1514. Leo X proposes a new League to the King of France. Guicciard. P. Daniel.

Whilst the Peace between France and England was treating at London, the Pope, Emperor, and King of Arragon omitted nothing, that they imagined would obstruct it. They plainly perceived, it could not but turn to their prejudice, and that the burden of the War would fall upon them. They were even afraid that Henry would join against them with France. Leo X had sent to Henry to persuade him to a Peace, and yet, when he saw it upon the point of conclusion, would have been glad, his exhortations had not been regarded. So, to cross the Negotiation at London as much as he could, he proposed a new League with the King of France, imagining it would be a means to abate his eagerness for a Peace with England. But as Lewis took a fortnight to give him his answer, he was afraid of being left alone, and for that reason, made haste and concluded a defensive League with the King of Arragon for a year only.

He makes one with Ferdinand.

Fruitless endeavours of the Emperor and Ferdinand to hinder the Peace between Lewis and Henry. Guicciard.

On the other hand, Ferdinand fearing, Lewis, after making a Peace with England, would invade Navarre, offered him his assistance to conquer Milan. But Lewis knew him too well to put any confidence in him. In short, the Emperor and Ferdinand, desiring at any rate to hinder him from concluding with England, sent him their consent in form, for the marriage of Renée his second Daughter with Charles of Austria their Grandson. At the same time, Maximilian ratified the one year's Truce made by Ferdinand with France. But all would not do. They had even the mortification to hear, that they were neither of them included in the Treaty of London; a clear evidence how little Henry valued their friendship. Notwithstanding all this, they both feigned to be extremely pleased with the Peace, though in their hearts they were exceedingly vexed.

The Pope tries to amuse Lewis XII. Guicciard.

It was expected that the King of France being freed from the War with England, would infallibly recover Genoa and Milan. The Pope was so persuaded of it, that he writ to exhort him to that expedition, though at the same time he used all his endeavours to break his measures, by an agreement between the Emperor and the Venetians. He even dispatched to Venice, Peter Bembo, afterwards Cardinal, to incline the Venetians to Peace. But these fearing the Pope was laying a snare for them, to take off the King from their Alliance, gave him immediate information, and thereby rendered him very jealous of his Holiness.

He forms vast Projects for his House. Sardi. Guicciard.

Leo X was forming at that time grand projects in favour of Julian de Medici his Brother. His design was to become master of Ferrara and Urbino, and to join these two States to Parma, Placentia, Reggio, and the City of Modena, lately purchased of the Emperor, in order to cast them into one State for this Brother, of whom he had a mind to make a great Prince. Nay, it is said, he intended to add the Kingdom of Naples; and to make that Conquest, had joined in a League with the Venetians. But as he saw the King of France would quickly invade the Milanese, he shewed great regard for him, lest he should make an enemy of a Prince, who, if he came to be possessed of Milan, would have it in his power to obstruct his designs. Mean while, Lewis not being pleased with the Pope, pressed him to declare himself, resolving to know for certain whether he was to consider him as a friend, or an enemy. Leo, who perceived his intent, amused him with fair words, without however being determined, because his purpose was to regulate his conduct by the events of the War, he foresaw.

Lewis prepares to pass into Italy. He loses the Lanthorn at Genoa.

This did not hinder Lewis from vigorously continuing the necessary preparations for his expedition into Italy, where he intended to go in Person the next spring. But whilst he was thinking of means to relieve the Lanthorn-Tower, which he still held at Genoa, and by the help whereof, hoped to become master of the City, he received the news that it was surrendered by capitulation, and immediately razed by the Genoese. However, this was not capable to deter him from his designs upon Italy.

Affairs of Scotland. Buchanan. Hubert.

Before I close the year 1514, it will not be unserviceable briefly to relate what passed in Scotland this year. James IV left two Sons, of whom the eldest, called after his own name, was not yet full two years old. By a Will, made before he took the Field, he left the Regency of the Kingdom after his death to his Queen, Sister of Henry VIII, during her Widowhood. The States being met the begining of the year 1514, immediately acknowledged for King, James V, Son and Heir to the deceased. As for the Regency, there would doubtless have been great debates, if the loss of the Battle of Floddon had not made the Scots apprehensive, that the King of England would improve the advantage he had over them. There had never been in Scotland a Queen-Regent, and that would have been sufficient to reject the Clause of the late King's Will. But it was hoped, the Queen would prevail with the King her Brother, to leave in Peace a Country whereof she had the Government. This expectation was not disappointed. The Queen being declared Regent, and writing to the King her Brother, to entreat him not to disturb the minority of the young King his Nephew, Henry generously answered, he was equally inclined to Peace or War, and left it to the Scots to chuse which they pleased. 1514.

The Queen Dowager is Regent. Herbert. Hall.

After this declaration, probably, Scotland would have remained in quiet under the Regency of the Queen, if that Princess had not married again some months after. She chose for her consort Archibald Douglass Earl of Angus, one of the greatest Lords in Scotland, and by this second marriage filled the Kingdom with confusion and trouble. As by the late King's Will she was to be Regent only during her Widowhood, the question was to appoint another in her room. Douglass her Husband used all his endeavours to have her continued in the Regency. He affirmed, there was no other way to preserve Peace with England; and besides, Henry would be obliged to support the Queen his Sister in case any one should pretend to disturb her. But this last consideration had a quite contrary effect to what the Earl expected, upon those who dreaded his too great advancement. They knew, that being Husband to the Regent, he would always be countenanced by the King of England, and by his assistance, enabled to ingross more authority than they wished him. Alexander Hume Governor of all the Country North of the Frith, was the head of those that opposed the Queen's Regency. He was a proud and haughty Man, who could not indure a superior. During the late King's life, he had been President of the Marches bordering upon England, where he had committed such outrages, that as some say, for fear of being called to an account, he killed or caused to be killed James IV, when he was retiring out of the Battle of Floddon. However this be, Hume used all his interest to break Douglass's and the Queen's measures, and proposed John Stewart Duke of Albany for Regent. This Duke was Son of Alexander Duke of Albany, Brother of James III, who to avoid the Persecutions of the King his Brother, was forced to fly into France, where he died. He left there this Son, who being married, and adhering to the Service of Lewis XII (1). had received many favours from that Monarch, and acquired a great reputation. Though he had never been in Scotland, he was however the young King's nearest Relation, and Hume had interest enough to have him declared Regent. Whereupon the States sent Deputies to offer him the Regency, and to pray him to come instantly and govern the Realm in the King's name. Lewis XII dying whilst these things were in agitation, Francis I, his Successor, having great reasons not to displease the King of England, would not suffer the Duke of Albany to depart till he had finished his affairs with Henry. For this cause the Regent arrived not in Scotland before May 1515. During this interval, Scotland being without a Governor, the Dissensions among the great Men much increased, every one having time to form his Cabals against the Regent's Arrival.

She marries and loses the Regency.

The Duke of Albany is elected Regent.

The first day of the year 1515 was the last of Lewis XII's life (2). But the death of that Prince made no alteration in the situation of the affairs of the Kingdom. The Duke of Valois, who succeeded him by the name of Francis I, plainly discovered, by adding the title of Duke of Milan to that of King of France, that he intended to pursue his Predecessor's designs. Mean while, he did not think fit openly to declare his intentions, till he had settled his affairs both abroad and at home. 1515.

1514. By the 14th, 15th, and 16th Articles, the two Kings bound themſelves to mutual aſſiſtance in three Caſes: 1. For defence of one another's Dominions: 2. For recovery of the Territories with-held by other Princes: 3. In caſe one of the two Kings ſhould be attacked on account of the preſent Treaty, and affirmed upon his honour, it was for that cauſe. In each of theſe caſes the conditions were different (1). But in the laſt, they promiſed mutual Aid, though the Aſſailant ſhould be Relation, Friend, or Ally of one only, or of both.

Lewis included in the Treaty, as his Allies, the Pope, the Switzers, and the King of Scotland (2). On Henry's part, were named the Pope, Bologna, all the Towns of St. Peter's Patrimony, the Archduke of Auſtria, and the Switzers (3).

Scotland was included in the Treaty, but on condition that the Scots ſhould commit no Hoſtilities againſt England, after the 25th of November.

That the Treaty ſhould be ratified and ſworn by the two Kings, and confirmed by the Parliament of England, and the States-General of France.

That each of the two Kings ſhould endeavour to obtain of the Pope a Sentence of Excommunication againſt the infractor of the Peace.

II. TREATY,

Concerning the Marriage of LEWIS XII with the Princeſs MARY.

Act. Pub. XIII. p. 423. THAT Matrimony ſhould be contracted by Proxies, and per verba de præſenti, within ten days after the date of this Treaty.

That the King of England, [within two months after the Contract,] ſhould convey at his own charge, the Princeſs his Siſter to Abbeville, where within four days after her arrival, the King of France ſhould ſolemnly marry her.

That Mary ſhould have in Dower four hundred thouſand Crowns, two hundred thouſand whereof ſhould be reckoned for Jewels, &c. and in caſe of recovery, Lewis ſhould be obliged to reſtore only the Jewels, &c. which ſhould be valued at the ſum of two hundred thouſand Crowns.

That the other half, amounting to two hundred thouſand Crowns, Henry ſhould pay, by deducting the ſum out of the million the King of France was bound to pay by a late Treaty.

That the future Queen's Jointure ſhould be as great as that aſſigned to Ann of Bretagne, or any other Queen of France.

That in caſe of Lewis's death, Mary ſhould enjoy her Dower and Jointure during Life, whether ſhe reſided in France or England.

III. TREATY,

For the Payment of a Million of Crowns.

p. 428, 439. BY this Treaty Lewis XII acknowledged, that by the Treaty of Eſtaples, Charles VIII was bound to pay Henry VII, or his Succeſſors, the ſum of 745000 Crowns, and that himſelf was obliged to pay the Arrears of the ſame.

Moreover, that Charles Duke of Orleans his Father, by an Obligation dated March the 7th, 1444, had owned himſelf debter in a certain ſum to Margaret of Somerſet Grandmother of Henry VIII.

That theſe two ſums not being yet paid, Lewis bound himſelf to pay to the King of England, or his Succeſſors, a million of Crowns, as well for the Arrears of the ſaid two ſums, as on account of the good affection he bore him, and to the end their amity might be the more laſting.

That this million ſhould be paid by Lewis to the King of England, by half-yearly payments of fifty thouſand Livres Tournois, till the whole was diſcharged.

Thus the War, which had been undertaken on pretence of Religion, and for the Glory of God, ended in a Treaty, which mentions neither Religion, nor the Pope, nor the Church. 1514.

The Princeſs Mary proteſts againſt her Contract with Charles of Auſtria. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 429. July 30. Herbert.

On the other hand, though the Princeſs Mary had been ſolemnly affianced to Charles of Auſtria, Lewis XII and Henry VIII, made no difficulty concerning this ſecond marriage, neither did they ſo much as vouchſafe to demand the Pope's diſpenſation, to abſolve Mary from her firſt contract. Only, a few days before the ſigning of the Treaty, Mary declared in the preſence of a Notary Publick, and other Witneſſes, that ſhe had been forced to plight her Faith to the Prince of Caſtile, Archduke of Auſtria. That moreover the Archduke having promiſed to eſpouſe her by Proxy and per verba de præſenti, as ſoon as he was fourteen years of age, had broken his word. She added further, that ſhe was creditably informed, the Counſellors and Confidents of the Prince of Caſtile were inſtilling into him, to the utmoſt of their power, an averſion for the King of England her Brother. Upon theſe Allegations, the two Kings making themſelves judges in a cauſe which doubtleſs belonged to the Pope's cognizance, thought fit the marriage ſhould be conſummated.

Remark on the third Treaty.

I have ſtill to remark upon the third Treaty, That, though Henry had declared to the Duke of Longueville, as appears in his Letter to Wolſey, that he could not make Peace unleſs the King of France would pay him a yearly penſion of a hundred thouſand Crowns, as a compenſation for the inheritance he with-held from him, an expedient was found to ſatisfy him with much leſs. The whole was reduced to Lewis's bond to pay him a million of Crowns, two thirds of which were already due before the Treaty. Beſides, that this Bond might not be conſidered as a compenſation of the King of England's title to France, according to Henry's intentions, it was expreſsly ſaid in the Treaty, to be in payment of the arrears of the ſeven hundred forty five thouſand Crowns, due to the King of England by the Treaty of Eſtaples, of another ſum due from the late Duke of Orleans to Margaret the King's Grandmother, and laſtly, for Lewis's good affection to Henry. Hereby was cauſed to vaniſh the principal foundation, on which Henry had built his demand of a penſion of a hundred thouſand Crowns; a demand conſidered by him at firſt as the baſis of the Treaty, according to his Letter to Wolſey. It may therefore be affirmed, that Henry was no leſs over-reached by the King of France in the Treaty of Peace, than he had been by the Pope, the Emperor, and the King of Arragon, in that which had ingaged him in the War. This proceeded not from his miſunderſtanding his own intereſts, ſince it appears in his Letter, that he was very ſenſible of the conſequence of his demand. To what then can his eaſineſs be aſcribed but to the inſinuations of his Prime Miniſter, who certainly erred not out of ignorance? Probably, Lewis XII found means to make Wolſey his Friend. We ſhall ſee ſtill more plainly hereafter, that this Miniſter was much more mindful of his own than his Maſter's advantages, when they came in competition, and that he loſt no opportunity of inriching himſelf.

Death of Cardinal Bambridge. Herbert. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 404.

Whilſt Wolſey was employed with the French Ambaſſadors in negotiating the Peace, Cardinal Bambridge, Archbiſhop of York, died at Rome the 14th of July (4). The ſame day Cardinal Julius de Medici, afterwards Pope by the name of Clement VII, ſent the King notice, acquainting him withal that he had prevailed with the Pope, not to diſpoſe of the See of York before his pleaſure was known. Whereupon the King demanded the Archbiſhoprick for Thomas Wolſey, which was immediately granted. This Miniſter was then in ſo great favour, that he abſolutely directed all the King's affairs, who had for him a very great eſteem and affection. It may be preſumed that he was now doing Lewis XII ſome good Services, ſince there are in the Collection of the Publick Acts, ſeveral Letters from that Monarch to him, beginning with theſe kind words, My Lord of York, and very good Friend.

1514. Whilſt the Peace between France and England was treating at London, the Pope, Emperor, and King of Arragon omitted nothing, that they imagined would obſtruct it. They plainly perceived, it could not but turn to their prejudice, and that the burden of the War would fall upon them. They were even afraid that Henry would join againſt them with France. Leo X had ſent to Henry to perſuade him to a Peace, and yet, when he ſaw it upon the point of concluſion, would have been glad, his exhortations had not been regarded. So, to croſs the Negotiation at London as much as he could, he propoſed a new League with the King of France, imagining it would be a means to abate his eagerneſs for a Peace with England. But as Lewis took a fortnight to give him his anſwer, he was afraid of being left alone, and for that reaſon, made haſte and concluded a defenſive League with the King of Arragon for a year only.

1515. Brother. Before her Marriage, ſhe had conceived an affection for Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk, a moſt accompliſhed Lord. It is even ſaid, the King had promiſed to marry her to him. But Lewis XII coming in the way, and her Marriage with that Prince being to make the Seal of the Peace between France and England, ſhe was under a neceſſity to ſacrifice her love to the good of the two Kingdoms. The Duke of Suffolk however waited upon her into France, though he was not of the number of thoſe who were appointed to conduct her. Mezerai ſays, the Duke of Valois, preſumptive Heir to the Crown of France, cauſed that Engliſh Lord to be narrowly watched, for fear he ſhould give the King a Succeſſor. This ſhews that the Queen's inclination was no ſecret. The death of Lewis XII happening within three months after his Marriage, the Queen Dowager was not willing to run a ſecond hazard, of being given to another Husband not of her own chuſing. Henry ſuſpecting her deſign, writ to her the beginning of February, deſiring her not to marry again without his participation. But the Queen believed it would be eaſier to obtain the King's pardon when the thing was done, than his permiſſion to do it (1). So, in March, about two months after the death of Lewis XII, ſhe was privately married to the Duke of Suffolk. Next day, ſhe ſent word of it in a Letter to the King her Brother, and taking the whole blame upon herſelf, intimated to him that ſhe had in ſome meaſure forced the Duke to this raſh action. Henry ſeemed at firſt very angry, but his anger was ſoon over. Their Peace being made, they returned to Henry, and were very well received (2).

Parliament in England.

Divers Statutes. Herbert.

The Parliament was then ſitting (3), and as England was in profound Tranquillity, the Houſes were only employed in domeſtick affairs, which are of little or no conſequence to Foreigners. There were however three Statutes paſſed this Seſſion which deſerve notice. It was provided by the firſt, That unwrought Wool ſhould not be exported out of the Kingdom, for the encouragement of the Woollen Manufacture. This Act has been often revived by reaſon of its importance, and yet even now, an effectual means is wanting to prevent the clandeſtine exportation of Wool. The ſecond Statute declared all the King's ſecond Letters Patents to be void, unleſs mention was made of the firſt. This was to prevent the King from being ſurprized. The third was no leſs neceſſary. It frequently happened that towards the end of a Seſſion ſeveral Members went home, imagining, there was nothing more of moment to be done. Then the Factious took advantage of their abſence, to propoſe and paſs ſuch Bills as probably would have been thrown out, had the Houſe been more numerous. It was therefore enacted, That the Members who abſented themſelves before the end of the Seſſion, without the Speaker's and Commons leave, to be entred in the Clerk of the Parliament's Book, ſhould loſe their Wages (4). I muſt now interrupt for ſome time the recital of domeſtick, to ſpeak of foreign affairs, which are to ſerve for foundation to what will hereafter be ſaid with reſpect to England.

The Alliance between France and England renewed

Du Bellai. Guicciard. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 473. ——476.

Francis I was too much concerned to renew the Alliance between France and England, to fail of performing the Article of the Treaty, whereby the Succeſſor of him that died firſt, was to acquaint the other whether he deſigned to prolong the time of the Alliance. As he intended to paſs into Italy to recover the Duchy of Milan, it was abſolutely neceſſary to ſecure the King of England. To that purpoſe, about the middle of March, he ſent to the firſt Preſident of Roan, his Ambaſſador at London, a Commiſſion to renew the Alliance with Henry, as well as the bond for the payment of the Million, to which Lewis XII was obliged. This was done by a new Treaty, ſigned the 5th of April, and exactly like the former.

Ferdinand ſeeks Henry's Friendſhip. p. 494.

After all the frauds uſed by the King of Arragon to Henry, there was no room to hope for a perfect friendſhip between them. However, Ferdinand, who was not eaſily diſcouraged, ſent to the King his Son-in-law a new Ambaſſador, to propoſe the renewing of their Alliance. 1515. It is likely, he did not believe, Henry had ſo ſoon forgot his deceits, but it was for his intereſt that he ſhould be known to have an Ambaſſador in England. This Ambaſſador arrived in May, but was ſuffered to wait in vain till October without being diſpatched: Nay, very probably he would never have ſucceeded in his Negotiation, if Wolſey's intereſts had not cauſed the King to alter his reſolution, never to have any thing to do with the King his Father-in-law. I ſhall ſpeak more fully of this affair in another place.

His Ambaſſador is received very coldly.

Whilſt the Spaniſh Ambaſſador was waiting in vain at London, Henry had two at Bruſſels, who made no greater progreſs. He had not dealt very gallantly with the young Archduke, in giving the Princeſs his Bride to Lewis XII, without any Ceremony. Indeed, Charles had not repaired to Calais the 5th of May laſt year, as he was bound by the Treaty of Liſle: but it could not thence be inferred, he had renounced his Marriage, at leaſt before he was asked, whether he intended to conſummate it. Henry was afraid therefore, the Archduke, having lately aſſumed the Government of the Low-Countries, and made a Treaty with France, would think of revenging the Affront put upon him. So, in order to ſound him, or prevent the effects of his reſentment, he ſent two Ambaſſadors (5) to propoſe the renewing of the former Alliance between Henry VII, and Philip I, their Fathers. But theſe Ambaſſadors were ſuffered to wait a good while at Bruſſels, without being much regarded, or receiving any anſwer.

Henry tries to be reconciled with Charles the Archduke.

His Ambaſſadors are ill received.

Francis I. prepares to recover Milan. Guicciard. Mezerai. P. Daniel.

The affairs of Europe were then in a ſituation, which would not allow the young Archduke to ingage in any Party. It was neceſſary, in order to take juſt meaſures, to wait the Succeſs of the war, Francis I was preparing to carry into Italy. In all appearance, it would produce Events capable of altering the Intereſts and Projects of moſt of the Sovereigns. Since Francis's Acceſſion to the Crown, he had ſufficiently ſhewn that he intended not to ſuffer Maximilian Sforza peaceably to enjoy the Duchy of Milan. On the other hand, the King of Arragon was under apprehenſions for Naples and Navarre. Francis I was a young Prince, full of Courage and Ambition, and it could not be doubted that he had formed great projects. So the Eyes of all were upon him, to ſee in what manner he would begin his Reign. He was making preparations, which diſcovered he had ſome great deſign in his thoughts, and did not take much pains to conceal that he had Milan in view. Mean while, he uſed for pretence of his Armament, the Invaſion Burgundy was threatened with by the Switzers. But the League he had lately renewed with Venice, and his offer to Ferdinand to prolong the Truce, provided the ſecret Article concerning the Milaneſe was annulled, were plain Indications of his deſigns.

Guicciard.

Ferdinand forms a League againſt France. Guicciard.

All this was not ſufficient to make Ferdinand perfectly eaſy. He was afraid of being deceived by Francis, and that his preparations were intended for Navarre. To prevent this danger, he rejected Francis's offer, and withal made uſe of it to induce the Emperor and Switzers to join with him for the defence of the Milaneſe, intimating there was no room to queſtion, that the King of France would turn his Arms that way. As for the Emperor, he did not want much Sollicitation. He readily entered into all ſorts of Leagues, becauſe he ever found means to thrive at another's expence. There was more difficulty with regard to the Switzers, becauſe Francis had among them Adherents, who endeavoured to diſſuade them from the League. But his Enemies prevailed in the end (6), and the League was concluded between the Emperor, the King of Arragon, the Duke of Milan, and the Switzers. Ferdinand played one of his uſual artifices upon this occaſion. He perſuaded the Switzers, that to defend the Milaneſe, the ſhorteſt way was to attack the King of France in his own Kingdom. For that purpoſe, he engaged to make a powerful diverſion on the ſide of Fontarabia, whilſt the Switzers ſhould invade Burgundy, and the Emperor, by continuing the war in the State of 1515. He deceives the Switzers. Venice, hinder the Venetians from aſſiſting the common Enemy. His chief aim was to defend Navarre, in caſe Francis I had thoughts of turning his arms that way, and then to hinder that Prince from becoming maſter of the Duchy of Milan. His League with the Switzers was equally ſubſervient to both theſe ends. For if Francis I invaded Navarre, the Switzers would divert him from his purpoſe, by making an inroad into Burgundy. But if he really intended to conquer Milan, the Switzers, as next Neighbours, and moſt concerned, could not diſpenſe with aſſiſting that Duchy. What Ferdinand had foreſeen, came to paſs. Francis having ordered his Forces to file off towards the Alps, the Switzers ſent their Troops into Italy, where they ſeized the two Paſſes, through which only it was thought poſſible to enter the Milaneſe. When Ferdinand was aſſured the King of France was marching towards Milan, he disbanded the Army levied for the defence of Navarre, leaving the Milaneſe to be taken care of by the Switzers. The very army Ferdinand had in Italy, under the Command of the Viceroy of Naples, made no motion to join them. The Emperor remained without acting at Inſpruck. Leo X, who had alſo entered into the League, gave them no ſort of Aſſiſtance. Thus the whole burden of the War fell upon the Switzers, without even the other Allies ſending a penny of the Money that was promiſed them. But this was not ſtrange. The Switzers were no more exempted than the King of England, and ſo many other Princes whom Maximilian and Ferdinand had ſerved in the ſame manner.

Venice,

Guicciard. Mean while, Francis I, having found means to march his Army through a place which ſeemed impracticable (1), the Switzers who guarded the Paſſes retired to Milan, and Francis advanced alſo towards the ſame City. When he approached, he offered the Switzers a Sum of Money to return home. This Negotiation was now in great forwardneſs, when they received a Supply of fifteen thouſand Men of their Nation. This aid rendering them more ſtout, they reſolved, by the Suggeſtions of the Cardinal of Sion, immediately to attack Francis, who lay encamped at Marignano, little expecting their coming. They were defeated, and ten thouſand ſlain on the ſpot. After which, they retired into their Country, leaving Francis maſter of all the Milaneſe. Maximilian Sforza, who had ſhut himſelf up in the Caſtle of Milan, ſurrendered it by Capitulation, and was ſent into France, to live as a private perſon.

Leo X makes his Peace with Francis. Idem. Leo X had been in hopes that Francis would never be able to enter Italy. He had joined in the League againſt him, but ſo privately, that Francis knew nothing of it till he came to Verceil. During the time between the King's arrival in Italy, and the battle of Marignano, the Pope was under great perplexities. He had ſent an Army into Lombardy, to ſupport the Duke of Milan. But when he heard Francis had ſurmounted the difficulties of the Paſſage, he ſent orders to Lorenzo de Medici who commanded his army, to commit no Hoſtilities againſt the French. At the ſame time, he told the King, his army was there only to guard Parma and Placentia. Mean while, as the affair of Milan was not yet decided, he durſt not make too many advances to the King, for fear of diſpleaſing the Allies, who would have it in their power to be revenged, if the King happened to be vanquiſhed. But, after the battle of Marignano, he was immediately reconciled with him, and though he had grievouſly offended him, obtained however advantages which he could ſcarce have expected, had he taken his part from the beginning. The Popes make Leagues, and undertake Wars as temporal Princes, and when their affairs do not proſper, diſintangle themſelves as Heads of the Church, and Vicars of Jeſus Chriſt. Though Leo X's behaviour to Francis was ſuch, that he deſerved no favour from that victorious Prince, he obtained however whatever he pleaſed, and among other things, the abolition of the Pragmatick Sanction, which the Popes his Predeceſſors had hitherto in vain demanded of the King of France (2).

Guicciard. Burnet.

Henry is engaged in new troubles. Though Henry had not been able entirely to avoid the Snares laid by the Pope, the Emperor, and the King of Arragon, he had happily got clear, but with a firm reſolution never more to be thus over-reached. His affecting not to mention them in his Treaty with France, plainly ſhewed he did not much value their friendſhip. But he was not ſo fortunate as to perſiſt in this reſolution, ſince it was his own fault that he engaged in a freſh War with France, not ſo much for his own, as the Intereſt of others. His change may be aſcribed to three ſeveral cauſes. The firſt is, his Jealouſy of the glorious Succeſs of Francis's arms in Italy. The ſecond, to prevent the growing power of that Neighbour. The third and principal, Wolſey his Favorite's Intereſt, who thinking to have reaſon to complain of the King of France would be revenged. The two firſt need no farther Explanation. 'Tis well known, that Princes are ſubject to Paſſions like other Men, and that Jealouſy may induce them to run counter to their Intereſt. 'Tis known likewiſe, that policy is as it were the hinge on which almoſt all their Actions turn. But on this occaſion, Henry proceeded upon a very wrong policy, ſince nothing was more capable of ſecuring the Peace of England, than the King of France's Acquiſitions in Italy. The third cauſe requires a more particular Explanation. 1515.

Cauſes of it.

Thomas Wolſey, Archbiſhop of York, was Prime Miniſter, and chief Favorite. But this does not fully expreſs the thing. It muſt be added, that he ſo abſolutely governed the King, that he turned him which way he pleaſed. But he managed ſo artfully, that the King always fancied he took his own courſe, when he only followed the Suggeſtions of his Miniſter. Wolſey had great Talents for a perſon of his birth; but he had alſo great failings. He was exceſſively revengeful, greedy of Poſſeſſions and Honours, and intolerably proud. He no ſooner ſaw himſelf fixed in his maſter's favour, but he ſought means to remove from Court all thoſe that gave him any Jealouſy by the King's eſteem for them. Richard Fox Biſhop of Wincheſter, the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, who had been moſt in favour, received ſo many mortifications from this imperious Prelate, that at length they quitted the Court, not to be expoſed to his Inſults. Fox withdrew to his Dioceſe the beginning of this year (3). The two Dukes quickly followed (4), and Warham Archbiſhop of Canterbury retired alſo at the end of the ſame year. Theſe old Miniſters being thus removed, Wolſey became ſtill more abſolute over the King, who had only him to adviſe with in his moſt important affairs. The reſt of the Privy-Council were all the Favorite's Creatures. The Hiſtorians unanimouſly agree, that Wolſey's Intereſt was the ſole rule of the Counſels he gave the King, and as this Intereſt anſwered his reigning Paſſions, Revenge, Greedineſs, Ambition, and Pride, the Reader muſt not be ſurprized when he ſees him hereafter inducing the King to make ſo many falſe Steps.

Wolſey is afraid of loſing his Biſhoprick.

Ever ſince Francis I came to the Crown, he had been thinking of recovering Tournay out of the hands of the Engliſh. There had even paſſed in the beginning of the year a Treaty upon that ſubject, but to no purpoſe, becauſe Henry demanded in exchange of Tournay, ſome places in the neighbourhood of Calais (5), which Francis did not think proper to grant him (6). But the greateſt difficulty came from Wolſey, who was far from adviſing the King his maſter to reſign Tournay, becauſe himſelf would have loſt the Adminiſtration of that Biſhoprick and the Abby of St. Amand, which brought him a great Revenue. On the contrary, he had been very urgent with Francis I, to beſtow ſome good Benefice on Lewis Guillard Biſhop of Tournay, that he might ſuffer him peaceably to enjoy his Adminiſtration. Francis had promiſed him, but without intending to keep his word. Inſtead of aſſiſting him to keep the Adminiſtration, he ſecretly perſuaded the Biſhop to ſue to the Pope for his reſtoration, and ſeconded his petition to the utmoſt of his power. He was of opinion, that when Wolſey ceaſed to be Adminiſtrator, the reſtitution of Tournay would become much eaſier.

The Pope reſtores the Biſhop of Tournay. Herbert.

Whilſt Francis was ſtill in France, employed in preparing for his Italian Expedition, the Pope, yet uncertain of the Succeſs of that Enterprize, did not much regard the Biſhop's Sollicitations. But when he ſaw that Prince maſter of Genoa, and entered the Milaneſe at the head of a powerful army, he readily granted a Bull to Guillard, reſtoring him to his Biſhoprick, and even allowing him to make uſe of the ſecular Arm to obtain poſſeſſion. This Bull, which ſacrificed the King of England's and his Miniſter's Intereſt, to thoſe of the French King and the Biſhop

It was therefore his Intereſt to appeaſe him, by granting a favour he ſo eagerly deſired.

Herbert. Mean while, Henry was extremely offended at this Bull, which reſtored to the Biſhoprick of Tournay, a Prelate who refuſed to ſwear Fealty to him, and on which the King of France and the Biſhop of Tournay might proceed to raiſe a Sedition in the City. He therefore gave orders to his Ambaſſador at Rome, to expoſtulate with the Pope, and repreſent to him the conſequences of his partiality. Leo X could not help owning it. But at that very time Francis gaining the battle of Marignano, and preparing to make him feel the effects of his reſentment, it was no proper Seaſon to incenſe him farther by revoking the Bull. This convinced Wolſey that Francis was the real Author of the Biſhop's reſtoration. Mean while, the Pope, being embaraſſed, choſe, upon the King of England's oppoſition, to leave the affair undecided, by referring it to the examination of two Cardinals, who, probably, were ordered not to haſten the concluſion. In the mean time, Wolſey was uncertain whether he ſhould keep the Biſhoprick of Tournay. And that was preciſely what the King of France wanted, that this uncertainty might induce the ſelfiſh Miniſter to find ſome Expedient to make himſelf amends, after which it was apparent, he would no longer oppoſe the reſtitution of Tournay. At the ſame time, to preſerve his friendſhip, which was very neceſſary, by reaſon of his Credit with the King his maſter, he promiſed to aſſiſt him in procuring a Cardinal's Cap. Wolſey was extremely ambitious of that Dignity. After the death of Cardinal Bambridge, he was in hopes of ſucceeding him in the Cardinalate, as well as in the Archbiſhoprick of York. He had even employed to ſollicite it in his name, Cardinal Adrian de Corneto (1), the Pope's Collector in England, under whom Polydore Virgil ſerved as Sub-Collector. But Cardinal Adrian, inſtead of ſerving him as he had promiſed, had done him ill offices. Wolſey being informed of it, was ſo incenſed, that on ſome ſlight pretence, he committed Polydore to the Tower. Then he cauſed the King to write to the Pope with his own hand, to deſire him to appoint another Collector in Cardinal Adrian's room. The King's Letter was ſo ſtrong and paſſionate, that the Pope thought fit to comply with his requeſt. However in his Brief of advice, he told him, he knew very well his anger againſt Cardinal Adrian was inſtilled into him by Wolſey. Mean while, Polydore Virgil continued in the Tower, till at length Cardinal Julius de Medici, and the Pope himſelf interceded for him, by Letters of Auguſt the 30th, and September the 3d. As this was at the very time that Francis was ſolliciting a Cardinal's Cap for Wolſey, Wolſey did not think proper to refuſe the Pope a thing of ſo little conſequence. So Polydore came out of the Tower, where he had been about a year. This ill Treatment was, doubtleſs, one of the reaſons that induced him to remember all the ill-qualities of Cardinal Wolſey, in his Hiſtory of England.

He perſiſts in his deſign to be revenged upon the King of France. Pol. Virg. Herbert.

Wolſey having at length obtained a Cardinal's Cap, was tranſported with joy when he received the news by an Expreſs ſent by the King of France (2). But though he was highly obliged to that Monarch, this favour begat in his breaſt much leſs Gratitude, than the injury he imagined to have received in the affair of Tournay, had cauſed Reſentment. He reſolved therefore, in order to be revenged, to endeavour to ſet the King his maſter at variance with Francis, and cauſe him to enter into a new League againſt France. Herein he gratified three of his predominant paſſions; his Pride, in letting Europe ſee, that Sovereigns themſelves offended him not with impunity; his Revenge, in creating Francis great troubles; and his own Intereſt, in ſecuring the adminiſtration of the Biſhoprick of Tournay. Indeed, a rupture between the two Kings was an effectual means to hinder Guillard's reſtoration to his See. This is obſerved by Hiſtorians as the principal Cauſe of the alteration we are going to behold in Henry's Conduct. Jealouſy and Policy may have had ſome influence too, but leſs as true cauſes, than as motives uſed by Wolſey to inflame the King's mind. Probably, under colour that his honour was concerned, he repreſented to him the neceſſity of humbling the pride of the French King, and inſinuated, how dangerous it was for England that France ſhould grow too powerful. When he had prepared Henry, he privately ſent word to the Emperor, that it would not be impoſſible to diſengage the King his maſter from the intereſts of France. It may eaſily be gueſſed, Maximilian received this Overture with joy. Beſides that, being without aid and allies, he ſaw himſelf little able to preſerve his Conqueſts in Italy, he knew, which way ſoever he was treated with, he ſhould always be furniſhed with Money. Whilſt Wolſey was projecting to negotiate with the Emperor, the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, who had heavily paſſed ſome Months at London, was looked upon at Court with a much more favorable Eye. Nay, a Treaty was begun with him about renewing the alliance between England and Spain, which being ended the 19th of October, contained however only a confirmation of the antient Treaties of Amity.

Henry renews his Alliance with Ferdinand. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 520 —— 528. Guicciard.

Mean while, the Emperor, willing to improve the preſent opportunity, ſent to the King a Milaneſe Ambaſſador, to deſire aid in the name of Franceſco Sforza, who was in Germany, and had aſſumed the title of Duke of Milan, ever ſince Maximilian his Brother had reſigned his right to the King of France. Though Wolſey had taken care to diſpoſe Henry to a rupture with France, he was not, it ſeems, fully determined. Franceſco Sforza's requeſt, or rather the Emperor's, ſeemed to him ſo important, that he deſired to have the opinions of the Biſhop of Wincheſter, and the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, who to that intent were ſent for to Court. The Council being met to debate upon this affair, Cardinal Wolſey ſpeaking firſt, made a long Speech full of Reſentment againſt France, labouring to demonſtrate how much it was for the intereſt of England to oppoſe her growing power (3). The Biſhop of Durham and all the new Counſellors ſtrenuouſly ſupported the Cardinal's opinion. But the old ones endeavoured to diſſuade the King from breaking the Peace lately concluded with France, ſince the new King had given him no cauſe, and adviſed him rather to turn his arms againſt Scotland. Henry, who was already prepoſſeſſed, took a middle way, inſinuated, doubtleſs, by his Miniſter: And that was, privately to aſſiſt the Emperor and Franceſco Sforza (4). Whereupon, he ſent orders to Pace (5), his Ambaſſador to Maximilian, to treat with them, and, to promote the Treaty, returned him large ſums of Money (6). Thus was he gradually engaged, without foreſeeing that theſe ſteps muſt neceſſarily end in an open War, as Wolſey deſired.

There is in the Collection of the Publick Acts, a Paper, ſhewing that the Cardinal did not forget himſelf in his Negotiations. It is a promiſe from the Duke of Milan's Secretary, who, by virtue of an expreſs power from the Duke his Maſter, engaged to pay the Cardinal a yearly Penſion of ten thouſand Ducats, to commence from the Day of his Maſter's reſtoration. It is true, this Paper being neither dated nor ſigned, may be conſidered only as a draught of this Contract; but it is however a proof of the Cardinal's ſelfiſh temper. The Emperor no ſooner heard that Henry was inclined to aſſiſt him againſt France, than he diſpatched to England Matthew Skinner Cardinal of Sion, to negotiate a League with him. This is the ſame Prelate, who, a little before, had encouraged the Switzers to give Battle to Francis I.

The Parliament met again the 12th of November. But as it was not yet time to lay before the Houſes the King's reſolution with regard to France, there was no mention of War, or any foreign affair. The Clergy in a Synod held at the ſame time, returned an anſwer to the Pope concerning his demand of an extraordinary Subſidy, on pretence of an apparent War with the Turks. They alledged, that they were ſo exhauſted by the late War with France, undertaken at the inſtance of Julius II, for the defence of the Church, that they were not in condition to grant a new Subſidy: That beſides, by a decree of the Council of Conſtance, the Pope could lay no impoſition on the Clergy without the conſent of a General Council.

1515. Pope, whom they foreſaw, it would be more difficult to reſiſt than him at Rome, becauſe he was ſupported by the King: I mean Wolſey. Since that Prelate was promoted to the Cardinalate, he was grown more vain, proud, and imperious than ever. He never ſtirred without a Prince's retinue, always attended by a crowd of Domeſticks, cauſing the Cardinal's Hat to be carried before him like a ſort of Trophy, and having it placed on the Altar when he went to the King's Chapel (1). He was the firſt Clergyman in England that wore Silk in his Veſtments, and uſed Gold in his Saddles. In a word, he deviſed all ſorts of ways to diſtinguiſh himſelf. Every one took ſuch offence at his pride, that it was inceſſantly talked of with indignation. But no Man durſt open his Mouth before the King, ſince the old Biſhop of Wincheſter for only glancing upon it, was ſo ill received, that ſhortly after he withdrew to his Dioceſe. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury was no leſs offended than the reſt, to ſee the Archbiſhop of York affect thus ſo great a diſtinction. But what gave him moſt offence was, to ſee the Croſs of York carried before the Cardinal, though he was in the Province of Canterbury. I have ſpoken elſewhere of this conteſt between the two Archbiſhops, which, after having cauſed violent quarrels, could be decided but by the King's expreſs commands to the Archbiſhops of York, not to have the Croſs carried before them in the other Province. But Wolſey, who thought himſelf much above his Predeceſſors, prepared to revive the conteſt, in contempt of theſe Prohibitions. Warham, who was of a peaceable temper, eaſily perceived, that though he ſhould attempt to hinder it, he ſhould not ſucceed, becauſe Wolſey had an abſolute ſway over the King. So, not to have continually this object before his Eyes, he deſired the King's leave to reſign the Chancellorſhip, and retire to his Palace. His requeſt was immediately granted; and the ſame day the King gave the Seals to Cardinal Wolſey. In all appearance, he had created Warham ſo many mortifications only to oblige him to quit his Office, with which he deſired to be inveſted himſelf. To ſupport the ſplendour of his dignity with more State than any other before him, the King loaded him every day with freſh favours, Prebends, Wardſhips, and the like, which continually increaſed his Revenues. Beſides the Archbiſhoprick of York and the Chancellorſhip, he had in Farm, upon eaſy terms, the Biſhopricks of Bath and Wells, and Hereford (2), held by Italians reſiding at Rome. But this was not ſufficient to ſatisfy him. I muſt now, before I cloſe the year 1515, briefly mention the affairs of Scotland, the Knowledge whereof is requiſite for the better underſtanding the events related hereafter.

Affairs of Scotland. Buchanan. Herbert. Pol. Virg.

Alexander Duke of Albany, who had been declared Regent in 1513, arrived not in Scotland till May 1515. He found the Kingdom full of Factions and Diviſions, which made him ſenſible, the Adminiſtration committed to him would prove very troubleſome. But what gave him moſt uneaſineſs was, that the King of England was but too much concerned in what paſſed in Scotland, and fomented theſe diſſenſions to the utmoſt of his power. Under colour that Scotland had been ſometime without a Regent, Henry VIII, as Uncle of the young King, had taken the Title of Protector of Scotland, and by virtue thereof, his Ambaſſadors at Rome demanded of the Pope the Eccleſiaſtical Preferments of that Kingdom, which he beſtowed on his Creatures. But as ſoon as the Duke of Albany was arrived, he writ to the Pope, in the young King's name, ſharply complaining of the King of England's Incroachments, and the Court of Rome's condeſcenſion. He even threatned the Pope in his Letter, not to apply to him for the future upon any account whatſoever, if this Grievance were not ſpeedily redreſſed (3).

Act. Pub. XIII. p. 513. July 3.

The Duke of Albany, though of Scotch Extraction, was a ſtranger to Scotland (4), from whence the Duke his Father had retired in 1483. As he deſired, in the beginning of his Regency, to be informed of the State of the Kingdom, he unhappily applied to Hepburne Biſhop of Murray, a hot and revengeful Man, who took this occaſion to be revenged on his Enemies. The Biſhop, being Prior of St. Andrew's, had been elected Archbiſhop of that Church in the beginning of the preſent Reign. But he was forced to reſign the Archbiſhoprick to Forman Biſhop of Murray, who was armed with the Pope's Bull. However, Forman would never have ventured to make uſe of this Bull, had he not been ſupported by Alexander Hume a potent Lord before-mentioned. By his credit and authority, Forman was inſtalled in St. Andrews, having reſigned the Biſhoprick of Murray to Hepburne, and promiſed to pay him a certain Penſion. Hepburne finding he had a fair opportunity to be revenged, gave the Regent ſuch a Character of Hume, that when he came to Court he was looked upon with a very ill Eye. Hume being naturally very proud and high-ſpirited, reſolving to let the Regent ſee, no Man ſhould ſlight him with impunity, went over to the Queen Dowager, and perſuading her that the King her Son was in danger, adviſed her to carry him into England. The Regent hearing of this plot, ſuddenly went to Sterling Caſtle and ſecured the young King's Perſon. But to hinder his Enemies from putting an ill conſtruction on this action, he renewed his Oath of Allegiance to the King, and committed the care of his education to three Perſons of great credit. 1515.

Alexander Hume and his Brother William ſeeing their Plot was diſcovered, fled immediately into England, and were quickly followed by the Queen and her Spouſe the Earl of Angus. Whereupon, the Regent ſent Ambaſſadors to Henry to juſtify his conduct, and at the ſame time ſo artfully treated with the Fugitives, that he prevailed with them to return into Scotland. But the Queen being big with Child, was forced to ſtay at Harbottle Caſtle in Northumberland, where ſhe was delivered (5) of a Daughter, called Margaret (6). The ſequel of this affair ſhall be related in another place. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 534.

The death of King Ferdinand (7), in February 1516, broke the meaſures taken by Cardinal Wolſey, to ingage all Europe in a War with France. Thus, notwithſtanding the Cardinal's projects, Henry was forced to remain in peace, becauſe the intereſts of the reſt of the Princes were not agreeable to his, or rather to the paſſions of his Miniſter. But though Europe was peaceable for ſome time, it will be however neceſſary to relate in each year of this Peace, the ſituation of the affairs of the principal States, in order to ſhew the occaſion of the following Wars. 1516. Ferdinand King of Arragon's death. Herbert. Hall.

Nothing remarkable paſſed in England in the beginning of the year 1516, except the Birth of a Princeſs, whom the Queen brought into the World the eighteenth of February, and called Mary (8). Cardinal Wolſey commonly called the Cardinal of York, ever mindful of what could procure him any advantage, cauſed thoſe who had managed the King's Money, to be called to a ſtrict account. The moſt part however were ſpared. But thoſe were ſeverely puniſhed who had not the addreſs to make the Miniſter their Friend (9). Birth of Mary Henry's Daughter. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

After Ferdinand's deceaſe, the Kingdom of Arragon came of courſe to Joanna his eldeſt Daughter, already Queen of Caſtile. But that Princeſs was incapable of governing her Dominions by reaſon of her defect of underſtanding, which had obliged the King her Father to keep her confined. So the Adminiſtration of theſe two Kingdoms with all their dependencies, could not be diſputed with Charles of Auſtria, Joanna's eldeſt Son, and Sovereign of the Low-Countries. But as that Prince lived in Flanders, Ferdinand had left by his Will the Regency of Arragon to Alphonſo his natural Son Biſhop of Saragoſſa, and that of Caſtile to Cardinal Ximenes, till Charles ſhould come himſelf and aſſume the Government. Mean while, when Ximenes would have taken poſſeſſion of the Regency of Caſtile, Adrian Florentio, Doctor in Divinity, who managed the Prince of Auſtria's affairs in Spain, produced Letters Patents from his Maſter, conſtituting him Charles of Auſtria ſucceeds Ferdinand. 1516. Regent of that Kingdom. But Ximenes refuſed to acknowledge him as ſuch, pretending that Charles had not power to appoint a Regent before he was received for Governor. The conteſt was however adjuſted by this expedient, that the Orders ſhould be ſigned by both. But the Cardinal left the Doctor the bare name of Regent only, and diſcharged all the Functions himſelf. Mean while, Charles took the Title of King of Caſtile, with the conſent of the States of that Realm. But the Arragonians, more jealous of their Privileges than the Caſtilians, refuſed to give him the Title of King of Arragon, whilſt his Mother Joanna was alive. Nay, there was a party in the Kingdom who maintained, that Joanna herſelf could not pretend to the Crown of Arragon, becauſe the Daughters were excluded by the Laws of the Realm, and therefore Charles could not derive from his Mother a right ſhe never had. But others affirmed, that the excluſion of the Females extended not to their Male-Heirs. This was much the ſame caſe as happened formerly in France, in the diſpute between Edward III, and Philip of Valois. I ſhall enter no farther into the affairs of Spain. What I have ſaid is ſufficient to ſhew the neceſſity Charles was under, of going thither, and how dangerous it would have been for him, to engage in a War againſt France, in the beginning of ſo unſettled a Reign. Accordingly, he neglected nothing to renew the Treaties of Peace and Alliance as well with France as England, but with liberty to take other meaſures when his Affairs ſhould be in another ſituation. Juſt before the King of Arragon's death, he had, as Sovereign of the Low-Countries, renewed the Alliance with England, by a new Treaty concluded at Bruſſels the 24th of February this year (1). About a month after, Henry, who was contriving to form a League againſt France, ordered his Ambaſſador to treat with Charles upon that head. But Ferdinand's death ſo changed the face of affairs, that Henry was forced to be ſatisfied with a bare defenſive League, which I ſhall preſently mention, having firſt related the ſucceſs of an expedition made by the Emperor into Italy.

The Emperor's Expedition againſt Milan. Guicciard. Mezerai. Pol. Virg. Herbert.

It was not without reaſon that Maximilian had readily embraced the opportunity offered him by Cardinal Wolſey, of making War upon France. There was no more likelihood of his being able to keep his Conqueſts in the State of Venice, ſince Francis I was become maſter of the Milaneſe, and had joined Forces with the Venetians. Beſides, he could expect no farther aſſiſtance from the Pope, who had lately agreed with Francis. As for the Spaniſh Army, which was retired to Naples, it was not eaſy to cauſe them to return, ſince they were neceſſarily to march through the Eccleſiaſtical State. On the other hand, King Ferdinand's death had changed the poſture of affairs, and quite deſtroyed the Emperor's hopes. So far was the new King of Caſtile from having any thoughts of a War with France, that it highly concerned him to keep Peace with that Kingdom, in order to have time to ſettle his affairs in Spain. Thus the Emperor, contrary to his uſual method, was forced to act alone, during this year, in the expectation of ſo embroiling affairs, that other Potentates ſhould at length be conſtrained to join with him. He had already received ſome of the King of England's Money, and Cardinal Wolſey put him in hopes of ſtill larger ſums. With this aid, he aſſembled an Army of about twenty thouſand Men, Germans and Switzers, and in March entered the State of Venice, whilſt the Venetians, aſſiſted by a Body of French Troops commanded by Lautrec, were beſieging Breſcia. Upon his approach, the French and Venetians raiſed the Siege, and after making a ſhew of oppoſing his paſſages of the Rivers, retired to Milan to avoid a Battle. Thus the Emperor approached Milan without much difficulty.

The French were in ſo great Conſternation that they were like to abandon both the City and Duchy, and retire into France. If the Emperor had made all the haſte he could, he would have doubtleſs conſtrained them to execute that reſolution. But having ſpent two or three days to no purpoſe, by the time he came before Milan the French had received news, that ten thouſand Switzers of the Cantons in Alliance with France were coming to their aſſiſtance, and were within a day's march.

The arrival of the ten thouſand Switzers at Milan, threw both ſides into an equal Conſternation. The French, who conſidered theſe Troops as a ſure aid, were ſtruck with aſtoniſhment when they heard that they abſolutely refuſed to fight againſt the Switzers in the Emperor's Army. Theſe laſt, on their part, demanded their pay with ſuch boldneſs, that Maximilian was afraid, it was a pretence not to join battle with their Countrymen newly arrived at Milan. He had no Money for them, and was apprehenſive the French had but too much to corrupt them. So, when it was leaſt expected, he ſuddenly retired, after which, having no Money to pay them, the Army disbanded of themſelves. 1516.

The Emperor makes as if he would reſign the Empire to Henry. Herbert.

Having thus miſſed his aim, the Emperor was forced upon new Trials to engage the Pope, the King of England, the young King of Caſtile his Grandſon, in a League againſt France. But this project was not eaſy to be executed. The Pope had his private views, which ſuffered him not to break openly with Francis. Charles's Council were better adviſed than to agree, that their maſter ſhould ingage to gratify his Grandfather's paſſion at a time when he was neceſſarily obliged to go into Spain, and take poſſeſſion of his Kingdoms. Thus the Emperor's whole refuge lay in the aſſiſtance he could expect from England. But as there was no likelihood, that Henry would undertake a War of which he was to bear all the expence, Maximilian bethought himſelf of a Device to preſerve his good diſpoſition towards him, or at leaſt to draw Money from him; and that was, to declare to Robert Wingfield the Engliſh Ambaſſador at his Court, that he was tired with the burden of the Empire, and having a particular eſteem for the King his maſter, intended to reſign it to him. For that purpoſe, he charged him to write to the King, that if he would come to Triers, he would call a Diet and ſettle that grand affair, after which, he offered to wait upon him to Rome, to ſee him receive the Imperial Crown. Moreover, he put him in hopes, he would reſign to him his right to the Duchy of Milan, and aſſiſt him to conquer it. Henry eaſily perceived Maximilian's aim in making ſuch an offer, and therefore writ to his Ambaſſador to thank the Emperor for his good Intention, deſiring him to defer the execution of this project to a more convenient Seaſon, when the French ſhould be expelled out of Italy. Mean while, in return for his goodwill, he ſent him ſome Money, excuſing the former defect of payment, with laying the blame on a Genoa Banker (2).

Francis I. forms the Project of invading Naples, but does not do it. Mezerai. Guicciard.

Whilſt the Emperor was endeavouring to imbroil the French affairs, Francis was forming new projects. He had good reaſon to be pleaſed with his glorious Campain, which, in a ſhort time, had regained him the Duchy of Milan. Mean while, Ferdinand's death inſpiring him with freſh hopes, he formed the deſign of ſeizing the Kingdom of Naples, imagining, the new King of Spain would be unable to defend it, before he was thoroughly ſettled in his Kingdoms. Beſides, he believed he had ſo attached the Pope to his Intereſts, by the Treaty of Bologna, that he did not doubt to find in him all the aſſiſtance neceſſary to his undertaking, looking upon him as his beſt Friend. But he did not know Leo X. That Pontiff did by no means deſire, the French ſhould become more powerful in Italy, and if he teſtified to the King, that he was in his Intereſts, it was only to prevent his oppoſing the projects he had himſelf formed in favour of his own Houſe. The Emperor's Invaſion of the Milaneſe this year, interrupted the execution of Francis's deſign upon Naples, and what afterwards happened, cauſed him to lay aſide all thoughts of it. However, his deſire to conquer that Kingdom occaſioned a defenſive League againſt him towards the end of the year, as will be related, after a word or two more of the Italian affairs.

The Pope diſpoſſeſſes the Duke of Urbino. Cimarelli. Guicciard.

Leo X was no ſooner reconciled with Francis I, than he deprived, upon a frivolous pretence, the Duke of Urbino of his Duchy, and inveſted Lorenzo de Medici, who aſſumed from thenceforward, the title of Duke of Urbino, and the old diſpoſſeſſed Duke retired to Mantua.

He endeavours to drive the French out of Italy.

It was in order to accompliſh this deſign, that the Pope had flattered Francis with the hopes of aſſiſting him in the Conqueſt of Naples. But after he was become maſter of Urbino, by that Monarch's Connivance, inſtead of thanking him for it, he thought only how to drive the French out of the Duchy of Milan. To that end, he held ſecret Intelligence with the Emperor, the King of England, and the new King of Spain, and uſed his utmoſt endeavours, by the help of his Emiſſaries, to perſuade the Switzers to break their Alliance with France. Though he acted with all poſſible precaution, he could not treat ſo privately but that his ſecret practices came to the King's knowledge, who pretended however to be ignorant of them. On the contrary, he did all that lay in his power to gain the Pope in reality to his Intereſt, otherwiſe he was ſenſible his attempt upon Naples would never ſucceed. Leo X deſired nothing better than to amuſe him, whilſt he was ſecretly acting againſt him. But at length, Francis perceiving more and more his Inſincerity, loſt all thoughts of the Conqueſt of Naples, and reſolved to treat with the 1516. King of Spain, who in the preſent ſituation of his affairs, could not but wiſh to live in a good underſtanding with him. Thus the two Kings being equally inclined to a Peace, ſent their Plenipotentiaries to Noyon to conclude it.

Treaty of Noyon between Francis and Charles. Mezerai. Herbert. Du Bellai. Guicciard.

The Treaty was ſigned the 26th of Auguſt, the Subſtance whereof was, That Charles ſhould eſpouſe Louiſa, Francis's Daughter, then about a year old. That he ſhould have with her the King of France's pretenſions to the Kingdom of Naples, and till the Marriage ſhould be conſummated, he (1) ſhould give for the young Princeſs's maintenance, a hundred thouſand Crowns a year. That within ſix months he ſhould reſign the Kingdom of Navarre to Henry d'Albret Son of John d'Albret, and Catherine, King and Queen of Navarre, who were diſpoſſeſſed by Ferdinand, and in caſe Charles ſhould not perform this Article, Francis ſhould be allowed to aſſiſt the King of Navarre. Laſtly, That the Emperor ſhould reſtore Verona to the Venetians, who in return ſhould pay him two hundred thouſand Crowns, and give him a full diſcharge for the Sum of three hundred thouſand Crowns lent him by King Lewis XII, to maintain the war againſt Venice. It is very viſible, that in a Treaty ſo advantagious to France, Charles meant only to gain time, by granting him whatever he could deſire, for fear of being hindered from going to take poſſeſſion of his Kingdoms. Accordingly, this Treaty was afterwards very ill obſerved.

Intereſts of the Princes.

The Peace of Noyon was directly contrary to the deſigns of the Pope, the Emperor, and the King of England. The Pope was extremely deſirous the French ſhould be expelled out of Italy. Maximilian was wholly intent upon raiſing enemies to Francis, to hinder his aſſiſting the Venetians. He ſaw, he muſt reſolve either to ratify the Treaty of Noyon, and conſequently reſtore Verona, or defend his Conqueſt without the aſſiſtance of any Ally. To avoid both theſe extremes, he tried all poſſible ways to embroil affairs, and kindle a new war which might occaſion a League againſt France. He hoped thereby to be able to reject without danger the Treaty of Noyon, which he believed very prejudicial to his Intereſts. It is true, the reſtitution of Verona would be worth to him five hundred thouſand Crowns. But out of that Sum were deducted the three hundred thouſand, he owed the King of France, but never intended to pay him. So for the Sum of two hundred thouſand Crowns, he was bound to reſtore Verona, that is to ſay, he was to be ſhut out of Italy, the only thing that made him conſiderable in the preſent ſituation of the affairs of Europe. Henry VIII was no leſs deſirous of a war with France, being prompted thereto by Cardinal Wolſey, or by his Jealouſy of Francis. But it was not the ſame with the Archduke, to whom a Peace for ſome time was very advantageous.

Negotiations againſt France, Act. Pub. XIII. p 547.

This was the ſubject of the ſeveral Negotiations, ſet on foot from the Concluſion of the Treaty of Noyon to the end of October. The chief aim of the Pope, the Emperor, and the King of England, was to diſengage the eight Swiſs Cantons in Alliance with France, from the Intereſt of that Crown, that their Troops might ſerve to invade the Milaneſe. Mean while, they were labouring to form a League, wherein they paſſionately deſired to engage the new King of Spain. But all they could obtain was, his conſent to a defenſive League, in caſe Francis attacked any of the Confederates. Leo X according to his uſual Cuſtom, would not openly declare himſelf, but intimated, he would freely join in the League when concluded, if a place was left for him. As to the Switzers, it was reſolved to include them, though they deſired it not, upon the hopes of ingaging them by means of ſome of their Nation, who had been gained.

which end only in a defenſive League. Ib. p. 556.

Articles of the League of London. Ibid.

This League was therefore concluded at London the 29th of October, about two months after the Treaty of Noyon. It ran, that the Emperor, the Kings of England and Spain, ingaged to defend one another againſt any Prince that ſhould attack one of the three, and the number of Troops, each was to find, was ſettled (2). That all Princes, Potentates, Republicks, and States, which deſired to enter into the League, ſhould be admitted: That as the Confederates had reaſon to hope the Pope would be willing to be admitted, they declared him head of the League. Finally, That all the Swiſs Cantons ſhould be deemed included in the League, provided they ratified it, and to that end the Penſions, which ſhould be agreed upon with them, ſhould be aſſigned them. By a private Article, ſigned two days after, it was agreed what each of the Allies was to pay towards the Penſions which ſhould be diſtributed to the Switzers, as well to the publick as to private perſons (3), (which are the very words) to induce them to come into the League. This ſhews there was no certainty of gaining them, and that the chief reliance was upon the cabals of ſome private perſons of their Nation. 1516.

The Emperor makes Peace with Venice.

To this League, ſo inconſiderable in itſelf, tended all the motions of the Pope, the Emperor, and the King of England, during the courſe of this year. The Emperor had been in hopes of ſomething more; and though by the Treaty the Allies were, in ſome meaſure, bound to aſſiſt him, if the King of France continued to aid the Venetians, he ſoon diſ-reliſhed a League which procured him no Money. Before the year was expired, he accepted and ratified the Treaty of Noyon. At the ſame time, he concluded with the Venetians a Truce for ſome months, and with one conſent they put the reſt of their differences to arbitration. The Emperor's reſolution entirely changed the face of affairs, as will be ſeen the next year. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that preſently after the League was ſigned, Henry ſent Richard Pace to the Switzers, to perſuade them to come into the League; but it was to no purpoſe. On the contrary, the Emperor reſolving to make Peace with the Venetians, agreed, that the five Cantons who had refuſed to join with France ſhould come into the Treaty made by the other eight with that Crown. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 570.

Affairs of Scotland.

Before I end the occurrences of the year 1516, it will be neceſſary briefly to mention what paſſed in Scotland. Henry having formed great projects againſt France, and knowing how much the Duke of Albany had at heart the good of that Kingdom, reſolved to compel the Scots to remove him from the Regency. To that purpoſe, he deſired them to ſend Ambaſſadors, to whom he might impart certain matters advantageous to both Kingdoms. This Negotiation tended only to preſs the great Men of Scotland to expel the Duke of Albany. He even writ to the Parliament of Scotland, that the beſt way to preſerve Peace between the two Nations, was to ſend back the Regent into France, under colour that it was dangerous to truſt the preſumptive Heir to the Crown, with the Guardianſhip of the young King; intimating withal, that in caſe of refuſal, he ſhould be obliged to take care himſelf by proper methods, of the ſafety of the King his Nephew. He alſo gave to underſtand, that he claimed the Regency as Uncle to the young King. But the Parliament returned ſuch an anſwer, as fully convinced hin, the Scots were by no means inclined to comply with his will (4). Ib. p. 549, 566.

Whether Hume was concerned in the King of England's proceedings, or was only ſuſpected, the Parliament ſummoned him to come and anſwer to the accuſations brought againſt him. Hume not thinking fit to appear, was condemned for default. He looked upon this Sentence as unjuſt, and in revenge committed Hoſtilities upon ſome of his enemies. Whereupon the Parliament granted to the Viceroy, a Levy of ten thouſand Men to chaſtiſe the Rebel. But his friends adviſing him to ſubmit, he caſt himſelf upon the Regent's mercy, who ſent him to Edinburgh, and committed him to the Cuſtody of James Hamilton (5) his Brother-in-law. Shortly after, Hume perſuaded the Lord Hamilton to eſcape with him, and claim the Regency, as Son of James the third's Siſter (6), and conſequently as nearly related to the King as the Duke of Albany. He ſaid, if the Duke could alledge, he was deſcended from the Male-line, it might be objected, he was Son of a Fugitive, born out of the Kingdom, and hardly able to ſpeak the Country Language. The Regent hearing of their Flight and Contrivance, marched againſt Hamilton Caſtle and took it in a few days. Then Hume perceiving it was time to throw off the maſk, raiſed Troops, and taking Dunbar, utterly deſtroyed the Town.

prolonged. P. 577.

These are the most considerable events which passed in the several States of Europe during the year 1516. I shall only add a word concerning the Council of Lateran, which still continued its Sessions without having much to do. As the Council meddled neither with the Reformation of the Church, though they seemed to be called for that very purpose, nor with the extirpation of Heresy, they resolved, in order to keep themselves employed, to reform the Calendar, which was become very faulty. To that end, the Pope causing memorandums to be drawn, undertook to write to all the Christian Princes, inviting them to send their best Astronomers to Rome, or at least order them to examine what had been proposed upon that subject. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, the Brief addressed to Henry VIII, where the Pope says he had adjourned the next Session to December, to give the Mathematicians time to send in their opinions.

1517. The Emperor having ratified the Treaty of Noyon as far as it concerned him, restored Verona to the Venetians, the 15th of January 1517, having received two hundred thousand Crowns, and an acquittance for what he owed the King of France. Moreover, to give the Arbitrators time to adjust the differences he still had with Venice, he agreed that the Truce should be prolonged for five years; but on condition that, during the Truce, the Venetians should pay him yearly twenty thousand Crowns. It was almost impossible to make a Treaty with him, and Money not accrue to him from it. Thus ended at length a War which may be deemed a consequence of the League of Cambray. The Venetians were engaged in it from the beginning to the end, and expended no less than five millions of Ducats of the publick Treasure, besides the infinite damages sustained by the Subjects.

The Emperor restores Verona to the Venetians, and prolongs the Truce for five years. Guicciard.

Maximilian having thus desisted from his designs upon Italy, went into the Low-Countries to see his Grandson Charles before he departed for Spain. During his stay there, he concluded with him and the King of France a League against the Turks, wherein a place was reserved for the King of England. The Pope and the Council of Lateran earnestly pressed all the Princes of Christendom to join in this League, on pretence of the progress the Turks were making in Egypt against the Mamalucks (1), after which, he pretended, their design was to attack the Christians. But what followed shewed the Pope's sole view was to heap up Money for his own use, and to inrich his Family.

He concludes with Francis and Charles a League against the Turks. Herbert. Leo X excites the Christian Princes to war upon the Turks. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 178. Jan. Guicciard.

Mean while, Charles, the new King of Spain, thought only of speedily going to take possession of his Kingdoms. He had just made with Francis I a Peace so advantagious to France, that he did not fear, that Prince would break it, because it would not be for his interest. So, when the English Ambassador pressed him to ratify the London League, he deferred it some time on divers pretences, because, deeming it needless, he was afraid of offending the King of France. He ratified it however after some alterations, and at length in August departed for Spain, where his presence was absolutely necessary. Upon his Arrival, he dismissed Cardinal Ximenes, who died with grief. After that, he so gave himself up to the Flemings, whom he had brought with him, that the Spaniards conceived such a jealousy as carried them afterwards to great extremities.

Charles ratifies the League of London. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 171. He arrives in Spain, and dismisses Ximenes.

The Pope, as I have observed, continually amused Francis with the hopes of a strict Alliance with him, at the very time he was raising him Enemies on all sides. Francis was partly informed of his proceedings, but did not know all. So, in expectation of really attaching him in the end to his interests, he omitted nothing he thought capable of gaining him, even feigning to deem him his best Friend, when he most suspected him. But as the Pope knew in his conscience, he had not deserved Francis's Friendship, he could not believe his advances sincere. Mean while, it was for his interest that Francis should publickly appear to be his Friend, and therefore he kept very fair with him, and not without cause. In the beginning of the year 1517, Francisco Maria della Rovere, who had been dispossessed of the Duchy of Urbino, prepared to recover his Dominions. When by the Truce concluded between the Emperor and the Venetians, the Spanish Troops in the State of Venice were become useless, la Rovere found means to gain and employ them in his service. With these supplies he took Urbino, and carried terror into Tuscany and the Ecclesiastical State. Lorenzo de Medici, the new Duke of Urbino, or rather the Pope his Uncle, being then unable to recover that Duchy, he was forced to have recourse to the assistance of the Christian Princes, under colour that the Church was grievously oppressed, the interest of the House of the Medici being then the same with those of the Church. Francis I, who had the gaining of the Pope ever in view, made use of this opportunity to do him a signal service, in sending him a good Body of Troops, under the command of Lescun Brother of Laütrec. This War however lasted seven or eight months, during which the Pope never ceased to press all the Christian Princes to contribute to the charges of a War, which, according to him, ought to have affected all the World. Henry VIII being sollicited like the rest, refused to interpose. But the Pope found means to ingage his Subjects, by levying a Tenth upon the Clergy, of which Cardinal Wolsey was appointed Collector. The War of Urbino ended in a way la Rovere did not expect. The Pope bribed the Spaniards in his Service, who came to an Agreement for him, which he was obliged to accept. Thus being once more constrained to relinquish his Dominions, he retired to Mantua.

The Pope levies a Tenth upon the Clergy. Act. Pub. XIII. p. 592. June 10. p. 596, 598. La Rovere is driven from Urbino.

Whilst the Pope was employed in the War of Urbino, he discovered a Plot against his Person, contrived by the Cardinal of Sienna, who had bribed a Surgeon to poison him. The Cardinal being absent from Rome when the discovery was made, the Pope, who passionately desired to have him in his power, scrupled not to use fraud to compass his ends. He sent him a Safe-Conduct, and moreover, promised the Spanish Ambassador that he would do him no hurt. The Cardinal being so weak as to come to Rome upon the faith of the Safe-Conduct, was immediately confined in the Castle of St. Angelo, and afterwards strangled in Prison. The Spanish Ambassador complained of this breach of faith; but was told by the Pope, a Safe-Conduct was never reckoned to extend to High-Treason, without express mention of the case. Some other Cardinals accused or suspected of being concerned in the Plot, were deposed, imprisoned, or severely fined.

Conspiracy against the Pope. p. 589. Guicciard.

Francis I never ceased courting the Pope to gain his Friendship, fearing that by his secret practices he would re-kindle the War, to deprive him of Milan. He imagined to have found at last an infallible means to attach him to his interests, in procuring Lorenzo de Medici a very advantagious marriage, with Magdalen Heiress of the House of Boulogne. This proposal was gladly accepted, and Lorenzo repairing to Paris for that purpose, stood Godfather in the Pope's name, to the French Dauphin, born the beginning of this year. In acknowledgment for the King's favour to Lorenzo, the Pope granted him Tenths upon the Clergy, under colour of the War to be waged with the Turks. But he took care to assign fifty thousand Livres for the charges of the Wedding, which was to be solemnized at Paris.

Marriage of Lorenzo de Medici with the Heiress of Boulogne. Guicciard.

The pretended War Christendom was to undertake against the Turks, seemed to the Pope to be a fair opportunity to inrich himself by the contributions of the Christians. To that end, he granted plenary Indulgences to all that would contribute, and caused them to be publickly sold at so moderate a price, that a Man must have been very careless of his Salvation not to purchase them. But it was this that made the Pope expect to reap an immense profit, for, probably, there would not be a Christian without them. Mean while, that the Money arising from the Sale might be regularly collected, all Christendom was parted into so many divisions, and in each were appointed Collectors to receive the Money, and Preachers to extol the Benefit of Indulgences (2). But,

Sale of Indulgences on pretence of the War with the Turks. Guicciard. Sleidan.

The Pope and Francis dissemble their Thoughts of one another.

(1) The Word Mamaluck signifies in Syriac, a hired Soldier. Jovius says, they were Circassian Slaves sold by the Tartars and Podolians to the Merchants, and being trained up at Cairo in military Exercises, were picked out for the Soldan's Guard, and preferred to the highest Posts, who in 1255 resolved to obtain the Kingdom of Egypt for themselves. The Government was elective, and the Son could claim no Inheritancee but his Father's personal Estate. Every Mamaluck, whose Number in all was about sixteen or eighteen thousand, had a Vote in the Election, and required a Gold Ducat of the Soldan as soon as chosen. There were in all of this Race sixteen Kings, from the year before-mentioned, to the present year 1517, when Tonombeius II, their last King, was conquered in the first year of his Reign by Selimus I. Thus Egypt became a Province of the Turkish Empire, as it still continues. Heylin, &c. Guicciard.

(2) It had been still taught and believed for a good while, that the Pope, out of the inexhaustible Treasure of the Church, arising from the Merits of Christ, and Works of Supererogation of the Saints, had a power of distributing Indulgences on certain Conditions prescribed by him, to the greatest and most profligate Sinners for a plenary Remission of Sin, (as it is practised at this day in Portugal, &c.) These Indulgences are supposed at first to reach only to relaxation of Penances or Ecclesiastical Discipline. Urban II, in the beginning of the XIth Century, was the first that granted a full Remission of all Sins to those who should take up Arms for the recovery of the Holy-Land from the Infidels. Which Custom was kept up by his Successors, some of whom extended the Benefit of their Indulgences to such Persons who being unwilling or unable to go, maintained a Soldier in their room. At length these Spiritual Favours were distributed to those who took the Field against the Enemies of Holy Church or Hereticks.

1517. But, by an accident which at first seemed of no consequence, the Archbishop of Mentz, who was commissioned to appoint the preachers in Germany, happened to assign Saxony to the Jacobins, whereas in the former Crusades, the Augustines had been employed in that Office. The injury done to these last, rouzed their jealousy. They narrowly examined the Behaviour of the Preachers as well as Collectors, ridiculed them, and afterwards publickly complained of them. At length, Martin Luther, an Augustine Fryar and Professor in Divinity in the new University of Wirtemberg, published some Writings against them, not without satyrical remarks upon the Indulgences themselves. This boldness drew upon him Enemies, who, by their opposition, obliged him by degrees to inquire more carefully into the grounds of those Indulgences. In short, he was convinced, they had no foundation in the Holy Scriptures. From thenceforward, he used his utmost endeavours to undeceive the Publick concerning the hitherto received opinion of the papal Power. Hence sprung the Reformation which spread it self afterwards through Germany, and several other States of Europe.

The Pope at first did not much regard Luther's representations. He never imagined that the papal power, which seemed to stand upon unmoveable foundations, could be prejudiced by a single Fryar. So despising this inconsiderable opposition, he continued without interruption to sell his Indulgences. He every where published, that a powerful effort was going to be made upon the Infidels, and exhorted all Christians to contribute, according to their abilities, towards so necessary a War, which would procure them, besides many temporal advantages, deliverance from the pains of Purgatory, provided they would qualify themselves for the Indulgences. There was however one thing which very much cooled the zeal of many Christians for the Crusade. It was discovered that the Pope had beforehand disposed, for his temporal concerns, of the Money which was to arise from the sale of the Indulgences. For instance, he had assigned to Magdalen de Medici his Sister, Wife to Francisco Cibo, natural Son of Innocent VIII, part of the Money to be raised in Germany. Mean while, he continued his Sollicitations in all the States of Europe. He forgot not to write to Henry VIII, exhorting him to join his Forces with those of the other Christian Princes, and to excite him to this good Work, by great commendations of his constant zeal for the defence of the Holy See, and the exaltation of the Faith. All these encomiums ended in demanding two hundred thousand Ducats for the pretended War against the Infidels. But it does not appear, the King complied with his request. The Turks were then employed in Egypt and Persia, and the Crusade was founded only upon a bare conjecture that after ending these Wars, they would invade Christendom. A Man must have wilfully shut his Eyes, not to see, it was but a pretence to fill the Pope's Coffers. Besides, in the present situation of the affairs of Europe, Henry had no great occasion for the Pope.

The Pope continues to sollicite a Crusade.

He demands Money of Henry, who denies him.

Mean time, Cardinal Wolsey perceiving, the League of London would come to nothing, because Francis was not disposed to commence a new War with any of the Confederates, dreaded his making use of this time of Peace to move the affair of the Bishoprick of Tournay. On the other hand, he plainly saw by the time, passed since that business had been put into the hands of the Commissioners, that he was greatly regarded, as having an absolute sway over the King his Master. Indeed, nothing could be expected from the King but through his means, and for that reason all the Princes studiously made their Court to him, to gain him to their interests. We find in the Collection of the Publick Acts, that Charles King of Spain assigned him this year an annual Pension of three thousand Livres, though he had yet received no Services from him. And therefore it was for those he hoped to receive for the future. Mean while, Wolsey was uneasy about Tournay. As the Pope and the King of France regarded him only for the sake of what he could do for them, he was in danger of losing the respect they showed for him, in case they should ever come to stand no longer in need of him. He began therefore privately to intimate to Francis I, that it would not be impossible to perswade Henry to restore Tournay for a sum which should be agreed upon, provided he himself was recompensed for the Administration of the Bishoprick. I shall relate next year the success of this Negotiation.

1517. Henry enjoying this year great Tranquillity, resolved to see what the Emperor intended with respect to the resignation of the Empire, which he had caused to be mentioned to him. Maximilian being in Flanders with the King of Castile his Grandson, Henry sent the Bishop of Winchester, with Doctor Cuthbert Tunstal, to renew the Negotiation with him, acquainting him withal, if he would appoint a convenient place, he would come and confer with him in person. The Emperor, who had never intended to resign the Empire to him, and still less at that time, very civilly answered, that to save the King the trouble of crossing the Sea, he would come himself and confer with him in England. But when the Ambassadors pressed him upon the affair they were charged with, they found he sought only to evade his own offer. One while he said, he would resign the Empire to Henry, but first would try to obtain of the Diet, that himself and Posterity might preserve the title of King of the Romans. Another while, he talked of making Charles his Grandson Emperor, Henry King of the Romans, Ferdinand Brother to Charles, King of Austria, and himself only Marshal of the Empire. These Alterations convinced the Ambassadors, nothing was to be expected from the Negotiation; and acquainting the King, he was satisfied Maximilian had no other design than to draw Money from him.

This same year the Sweating Sickness made great ravages in the Kingdom, and especially at London. Most of those that were seized with it, died within three hours, and no cure could be found. As this Distemper was peculiar to England, it was called Sudor Anglicus, or the English Sweat (2).

The Sweating Sickness Hall. Stow.

The affairs of Scotland were still in great disorder, by reason of the Factions in the Kingdom. Alexander Hume and his Brother William, after several Pardons, were at last beheaded (3). After the death of the two Brothers, the Duke of Albany, hoping Scotland would be in perfect Tranquillity, resolved to take a Journey into France, promising to return in few Months. But being detained there longer than he expected, by accidents mentioned hereafter, the affairs of Scotland fell into very great confusion, because of the Dissensions of the great Men, which were inflamed by those who designed to take advantage of them.

1518. Mean while, the Pope earnestly pushed the affair of the pretended War, contriving, with the Ambassadors residing at his Court, projects which would have required more Zeal than Princes usually have, and greater Union among them. To execute his designs, he should have amassed vast Sums of Money, and that was the secret intent of the League proposed by the Pope, of which he was to be Head and Director. To that end, he exhausted, if I may so say, the Church's Treasures, to incourage the Faithful to exchange their perishing riches for everlasting advantages. This affair was carried so far, that he sent Legates to all the Courts, to excite the Sovereigns to join their Forces together, for the Destruction of the Infidels. There was not one but what outwardly showed an extreme desire to apply himself to so holy a work, provided he could be secured from being disturbed by his Neighbours. But that was the thing which rendered the execution of the project very difficult, because they had no Confidence in one another. They had no more for the Pope himself, who, since the beginning of his Pontificate, had but too plainly discovered, that the concerns of Religion were not what affected him most. So, in seeing him act with that Zeal, they could not help suspecting, that the desire of inriching himself by the voluntary Contributions of Christians, by the sale of the Indulgences, by the Tenths of the Clergy, and by the Bounties of the Sovereigns, was what most fired his Zeal. Nevertheless, not one of them showed any aversion to the reticks. Great Sums were raised by this means, but seldom applied to the ends for which they were intended. Leo X resolving to follow so good Precedents, opened a General Mart for Indulgences, the benefit whereof was to extend even to the Dead, whose Souls, upon payment of so much Money, were immediately redeemed out of Purgatory. People had likewise the liberty of eating Eggs and White-meats on Fast Days, and of chusing their Confessor, and the like. Guicciardini says, That the Powers for releasing Souls out of Purgatory were openly played for in Taverns. B. 13.

(1) The chief Author of this Insurrection (which began April 28.) was one John Lincoln a Broker. He drew up a Paper full of Complaints against the foreign Merchants, which he got Doctor Bele, a noted Preacher, to read in his Pulpit on Easter Tuesday; whereupon the Mob assembled, and committed several Outrages. The Reader may see a full account of this Insurrection in Hall, fol. 59---63. Hollingsh. p. 840, &c.

(2) This Distemper continued from July till the middle of December. Many Knights, Gentlemen, and Officers of the King's Court died thereof, as the Lord Clinton, Lord Grey of Wilton, and of the common sort of People so many, as in some Towns it swept away half, in others a third of the Inhabitants. Hall, fol. 63. Herbert, p. 28 ----- There was also so great a Drougth this year, that it did not rain from the beginning of September, till the May following. 1518. design, lest he should be taxed with not having a due regard for Religion. But they gave only Words, whereas the Pope wanted Deeds. Hence the Pope's project of an universal League had not, as will hereafter be seen, the Success he expected. However, the project, though chimerical, served for pretence and a cloak to many other designs. The Emperor, desiring to have one of his Grandson chosen King of the Romans, used the pretence of the imaginary War Christendom was in danger of from the Turks, to show the necessity of continuing the Imperial Dignity in the House of Austria, there being no other in Germany, able by its own strength to withstand their Arms. Charles King of Spain made use of the same pretence for the same purpose. Besides that, as he wanted some years of Peace, he strenuously insisted upon the project of a general Truce, that the Christian Princes might be free to unite their Forces against the Turks. Francis I, plainly saw, by the defensive League made against him, that a pretence was only sought to invade him, and take away the Duchy of Milan. So, a general Truce could not but be advantagious to him in his present Circumstances. Besides, he had in view the recovery of Tournay, which could be accomplished but during a Peace. Henry VIII, knowing that the Pope, the Emperor, and the Kings of France and Spain had joined in a League against the Turks, was apprehensive that League covered some design against him. For that reason, he would not refuse to enter into the same ingagement, for fear of giving them a pretence. Thus the chief Potentates of Europe being concerned to improve the Crusade, or at least, not to reject it, the lesser Powers were also obliged to follow the Torrent. This gave the Pope great hopes he should at last effect his designs. But as in truth, not one of the Princes thought the thing practicable, the project was still very far from being executed.
